SIR,—In the November number of your valuable paper there appeared a letter from Mr. G. D. W. Lennon, giving an account of the constitution and history of the "Apollo Club" of Boston, U.S.A.; and in the December number one from Mr. James Stevens, describing the "Victoria Glee Club" of London. As it may prove interesting to the members of those and similar clubs, and to the musical public at large, I crave a portion of your space in order to inform you of what is being done to advance the same branch of musical art in Melbourne.

In the year 1873 a society called the "Metropolitan Liedertafel" was formed "for the cultivation and practice of part-singing for male voices only," under the conductorship of Mr. Julius Herz. The society at once took a leading position, and from that time to the present has enjoyed an uninterrupted prosperity.

We have ninety performing members, of whom at least one-half belong to the first and second tenors. There are also nearly 800 subscribers, the annual subscription being one guinea. The entire business management is vested in the performing members, and all candidates for admission, whether as performing or subscribing members, are submitted to a ballot. The privilege of membership is so highly prized that, like the Boston Club, we always have a long list of applicants waiting to fill any vacancies that may occur.

Eight concerts are given during the year, four for ladies and gentlemen, and four for gentlemen only (smoking nights). Each subscriber is entitled to introduce one lady to the "mixed concerts." He may also purchase a limited number of extra tickets, and has the further privilege of attending the weekly rehearsals, should he so desire.

The revenue of the society, which last year amounted to over £1,500, is all expended in connection with the concerts and in providing new music.

Our library is very valuable, and includes the "Orpheus" and Chickering collections of part-songs; English glees by Hatton, Smart, Sullivan, &c.; male-voice choruses from various operas, and many compositions and arrangements by local musicians, prominent amongst whom is Mr. C. G. Elsasser. The larger works which have been performed by us comprise Mendelssohn's "Œdipus," "Antigone," and "Fest-Gesang," Wagner's "Twelve Apostles," Saint-Saëns's "Soldiers of Gideon," and others. In order to vary the programmes at many of our concerts, orchestral works of a high class are presented, and the best outside talent is also engaged. The list of artists who have appeared from time to time, embraces the names of Anna Bishop, Ilma di Murska, Carlotta Patti, Jenny Claus, Camilla Urso, Johannes Elmblad, Ernest De Munck, August Wilhelmj, Henri Kowalski, and most vocalists and instrumentalists of note who have visited Australia.

There is also another well-supported Liedertafel in Melbourne, conducted by Herr Julius Siede, whilst at Ballarat, Sydney, and Nelson, N.Z., similar associations have recently been successfully established; and, as a further proof of the popularity of the style of entertainment provided at the concerts of these societies, I may mention that during the Christmas holidays eighty performing members of the Metropolitan Liedertafel paid a visit to Sydney, a distance of nearly 600 miles by railway, and gave five concerts in one week, singing each time to an immense audience.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

D. WRIGHT, Hon Sec.

ORGAN PEDALS ATTACHED TO PIANOFORTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—A letter appeared in your number for last August from Mr. Joseph Shaw, of Leeds, in answer to a letter signed "Parish Organist," inquiring whether any more satisfactory mode of pedal attachments to pianofortes existed than were in use up to that time.

Many persons as well as myself were, no doubt, deeply interested in the reply, setting forth, as it did, the unsatisfactory actions ordinarily in use, and the various reasons; and also that the whole of these objections and difficulties had been completely overcome by the writer, he inviting inspection of a set attached to a pianoforte at his house in Leeds. I was curious enough to pay such visit, and judge for myself. To my agreeable surprise I found that they were in every way satisfactory, and perfectly answered every requirement.

The notes on the keyboard were full, round, and perfectly crisp and even; no matter whether the pedals were put down quickly or slowly, I found there was no difference in sound, but that every note was of perfect equality. Moreover, I was assured that no amount of heavy or indiscreet pedalling could in any way injure the piano. I was not allowed to look at the action, the invention not being in any way protected; but I was perfectly satisfied with the result. I was also informed that there was next to no wear, and that they were never out of order.

I have since written to Mr. Shaw, asking if they are yet patented, but I am sorry to say his reply is in the negative; as from the unsatisfactory and expensive state of our Patent Laws, he says he does not see his way, single-handed, to patent his action; for, even if he did, it would be only the beginning of the great expense which would necessarily follow. I feel sure I am expressing the wishes of very many when I say that such an invention would be a most valuable boon, if patented and publicly brought out; and I do sincerely hope that some practical house or influential person may be found, who would be the means of giving to the public, and especially those who are most wishful to be familiar with music requiring a pedal clavier, the inestimable boon of such an invention.

I may add that I have no personal knowledge of Mr. Shaw beyond the only visit I paid, and my only reason for reopening this question is purely and honestly to possess the result of so valuable an invention.

I am, sir, yours obediently,

ALFRED SPRING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Last year there was some correspondence in your valuable paper about organ pedals attached to pianofortes. This I read with great interest, having had a set of pedals put to my piano, which have caused me nothing but expense and trouble for the last two years, and are of no use at all, as they are never in order. I gave £5 10s. for them, but the twines are simply absurd. I wrote to Mr. Shaw about his attachment, but he will not reveal the action without a patent. I am only an amateur of the organ, but I should be so thankful to any one who will kindly give me any idea of a method to make my pedals effective.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

MARIA ALBIN BAILY.

ANCIENT MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—It was with great pleasure I read—as no doubt many others of your readers did—the very interesting article on the "Angelus ad Virginem," with the music in modern notation. Permit me to express a hope that the "Alma Redemptoris Mater" will shortly follow, and to ask if it would not be possible for a few gentlemen to form themselves into a little society to publish the music and words to many a forgotten hymn or sequence formerly used in the services of the Church.—Faithfully yours, 55, Wiltshire Road, Brixton, S.W.

W. MARSH.

BANFF.—The members of the Musical Association gave a Miscellaneous Concert in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 11th ult., before a large and thoroughly appreciative audience. The programme included Macfarren's May Day and several choral pieces, which were excellently rendered. Amongst the instrumental compositions performed may be mentioned Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, finely played by Herr Hofmann, and a Concertante by Charles Dancila, for two violins and pianoforte (Miss Dickson and Herr Hofmann as violinists and Miss Isa Ramsay as pianist), which was warmly and deservedly applauded. In Macfarren's Cantata Miss M. Coutts, as the May Queen, was highly successful; and vocal solos were also contributed during the evening by Miss Dickson, Miss Isa Ramsay and Miss K. Martin presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively.

BARTON-IN-WESTMORLAND.—An excellent Concert was given in the Schoolroom on the 12th ult. by the members of the Musical Society, assisted by Miss Wakefield, Miss Bayly, Mrs. C. The first part, which was sacred, included Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer (the solo well rendered by Miss Wakefield) and Laudate pueri Dominum by Capocci, of Rome, written for tenor solo, with soprano and alto chorus, which was produced for the first time in this country, and for the effective performance of which both Mr. Howson (who sang the solos) and the members of the Society deserve warm commendation. In the second part of the programme Miss Bayly played with much success Schumann's Nocturne in E, and several vocal solos were given by the singers already named. Mr. Aldous was an efficient Conductor.

BASINGSTOKE.—A Concert was given in the Town Hall on the 13th ult. by the Choral Society, when George Fox's Cantata The Jackdaw of Rheims was performed. The solos were rendered by Mrs. E. Adams, Miss F. Nichols, Mr. Thatcher, and Mr. David White. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, and included a selection from Gounod's Faust and songs by Miss Florence Nichols and Mrs. E. Adams. Mr. J. Old conducted.

An excellent programme of standard English music was successfully performed, most of the compositions being redemanded. On the following afternoon an Organ Recital was given by Mr. W. G. Wood, F.C.O., Organist of Christ Church, Woburn Square, in St. Mary's Church. Miss Ambler and Mr. W. H. The church was well filled, and the proceeds were handed over to the fund for the restoration of the church.

BELFAST.—An excellent Chamber Concert was given in the Assembly Hall on the 12th ult. by Herr Adolf Beyschlag, the Conductor of the Philharmonic Society. Beethoven's Trio in B flat major (Op. 97), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, was finely rendered by Herr Beyschlag, Mr. Cohen, and Herr Reimers; Mendelssohn's Variations in D major, for pianoforte and violoncello, in which the concert-giver was associated with Herr Reimers, was also an important feature in the selection; and Haydn's Trio in C major, played by the three artists already mentioned, concluded the Concert with much effect. Herr Beyschlag was ably assisted in the vocal department by Miss Burne and Miss Johnstone.

BERWICK-ON-TWEED.—The Annual Concert of the Choral Union was given in the Corn Exchange on March 30. The first part of the programme contained choruses from Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and St. Paul, Handel's "Then round about the starry throne," and a Nunc dimittis by the Conductor of the Society (Mr. Barker), all of which were performed with much precision and effect. Gounod's "Nazareth" was also very well sung by Mr. Richardson. The second part was secular, and consisted of an excellent selection of glees, songs, and duets, Mrs. Richardson contributing a solo, "The flowers of the forest," which was highly appreciated. Miss Cuthbertson was a skilful accompanist, and Mr. Barker conducted with his accustomed ability.

St. B. Goldsmith rendered Randegger's "I Naviganti" capitolly, and Miss Louch's "He was despised" (Handel) was loudly redemanded. The second and last People's Concert, under the direction of Mr. C. Lavington, was given at the Town Hall on the 17th ult., but, judging from the attendance, good music provided at a low rate of admission is a boon that the inhabitants hardly seem to appreciate as they should.

BRIMINGTON.—A Concert was given on Tuesday, the 12th ult., under the auspices of the Brimington and District Choral Society. The programme consisted of extracts from Cowen's Rose Maiden and a miscellaneous selection. The Society was assisted by the Misses Coker, Miss Dampier, Miss Bagdaley, and Messrs. T. Wardle, J. The performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie was, thanks to the careful training of Mr. Weekes, in every respect thoroughly satisfactory, Miss Lampen and Mrs. Trelawny, in the principal parts, eliciting warm and well-deserved applause, and the singing of the choir being everything that could be desired. The second part was miscellaneous, Miss Marian McKenzie achieving a marked success in all her songs, and a feature in the instrumental selections being a spirited performance of the Overture to William Tell.

DINGWALL.—On the 21st ult. the Musical Association gave its closing Concert for the season before a large and appreciative audience, when a varied programme was provided. The Recital was in the highest degree interesting, and was listened to by a large and most appreciative audience.

—On Thursday, the 6th ult., a testimonial was presented to Mr. William Adlington, A.R.A.M., by those who have been his pupils at the Institution for Music. The testimonial, which was given on the occasion of Mr. Adlington's leaving Edinburgh, consisted of a beautiful suite of gold and oxidised silver cabinet ornaments, accompanied by a letter containing the signatures of the pupils. Mr. Adlington is equally respected and admired by all who have had the privilege of receiving his instruction, and his departure is a cause of deep and universal regret. He is succeeded as Director of the Institution of Music, of which he was himself the founder, by Mr. Lindsay G. Deas, A.R.A.M. —A successful Concert by the present and former private pupils of Mr. Millar Craig was given in the Freemasons' Hall on the evening of Wednesday, the 19th ult. The choir numbered over seventy voices, and the programme was varied and interesting. Mr. Smith (of Peterborough Cathedral) sang Gounod's "Nazareth" with much success, and also took part in Cimarosa's duet "Le fiato in corpo avete," in conjunction with Mr. Ives. Mr. Banks (of Peterborough Cathedral) sang "Know'st thou the land," and Miss Noble gave Schubert's "Gretchen's prayer to the Virgin" and "Tears, idle tears" with excellent effect. The other soloists were Misses Alice Raleigh, McNeill, C. Clark, and Messrs. McArthur, Dodds, Gledhill, Whyte, Reid, and Wood, all of whom acquitted themselves with much credit. A few madrigals and part-songs were also well performed. Mr. Tom Craig (piano), Mr. W. Waddell (harmonium), and Mr. R. C. Mackenzie (violin), were thoroughly efficient, and Mr. Millar Craig was an able Conductor.

FOLKESTONE.—Mendelssohn's Christus was sung at the Parish Church at a special Evening Service in Holy Week. The choir numbered over fifty voices. The recitatives were well rendered by Mr. Speakman, a member of the choir. Miss Spearpoint presided at the organ, and Mr. F. J. Dugard, the Organist and Choirmaster, conducted. —The Services at the Church of St. Michael and All Angels on Easter Day were of an interesting character, the choir being considerably augmented and accompanied by a full orchestra (from London), organ, and pianoforte. At the Morning Service the Introit was "But as for His people" (Israel in Egypt), and the Communion Service Gounod's "Messe Solennelle"; portions of the latter were very finely rendered, especially the Credo and Sanctus. During the offertory "Whosoever drinketh of this water," from The Woman of Samaria, was artistically sung by Mr. Rhodes (of Canterbury Cathedral), and at the end of the Service "Rejoice greatly" (Messiah) was effectively rendered by Madame Worrell. The concluding Voluntary was Gounod's "Marche Solennelle." The Evening Service commenced with a processional hymn, "We march to victory," composed by the Rev. E. Husband, the Incumbent; after which "The people that walked in darkness" (Messiah) was sung by Mr. Rhodes.

The Anthem was "The sons of strangers shall build up thy walls," composed expressly for the Festival by the Rev. E. Husband; and after the sermon Sullivan's Festival Te Deum was finely sung, the soprano solo, "When Thou tookest upon Thee," being excellently given by Madame Worrell. At the conclusion of the Te Deum, Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas Overture was played, Miss Bessie Spearpoint was the organist, Mr. R. J. Pitt the pianist, and the Rev. E. Husband conducted with much skill and care throughout the Festival. —On the following day a Concert was given in the Town Hall by the artists who had taken part in the previous day's Festival at St. Michael's. There was a large and enthusiastic audience, and all the vocalists and instrumentalists acquitted themselves admirably. Mr. John Jefferys was a very careful accompanist, and Mr. Louis D'Egville and the Rev. E. Husband conducted.

GLASGOW.—The members of the choir of Cathcart Road Wesleyan Church gave their annual Concert on Thursday, March 28, when Dr. F. E. Gladstone's Cantata Nicodemus was performed. The solos were well sung by Mrs. Simpson and Mr. Jonathan Howell. Mr. Birch conducted, and Mr. George Hopper accompanied on the organ.

GLOUCESTER.—The committee of the Choral Society acted wisely in selecting Mendelssohn's Elijah for performance on Tuesday, the 11th ult., at the closing Concert for the present season. Miss Marianne Fenna, Mr. Henry Guy, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Francis were the principal vocalists; Mr. A. H. Brewer was the organist; and, to give due effect to the accompaniments, on which the success of Mendelssohn's works so much depends, the help of a band of twenty-four performers, under the direction of Mr. E. G. Woodward, was secured. All the solo-singers were thoroughly satisfactory, and the choruses were faultlessly rendered. Mr. C. H. Lloyd conducted with his usual ability. In the interval at the close of the first part of the Oratorio Mr. Gambier Parry, the President of the Society, presented to Mr. Lloyd a testimonial, consisting of a handsome silver coffee-pot and a case of silver knives and forks. The inscription was: "Presented to Charles Harford Lloyd, Esq., M.A., Mus. Bac., by the members and friends of the Gloucester Choral Society, to mark their appreciation of his services as Honorary Conductor. April 11, 1882." In reply to a highly complimentary speech (in which Mr. Parry dwelt upon the services rendered by the Conductor to the Society, and to his position amongst the musicians of England), Mr. Lloyd said that when he undertook the duties of Conductor it was not with any anticipation that he would receive any reward for his services, much less that they would be recognised in the handsome and substantial manner in which they had been that evening. He had only hoped that he might be able to render them some assistance in the study and practice of music; but for their success they were really indebted to the help of his friend, their excellent Choirmaster, Mr. Hunt. It had been to him a source of extreme satisfaction to do what he had been able in connection with the Society, and he thanked them all very heartily, not only for this present, but also for the attention they had ever paid to him, and for the kindly feeling always shown towards him.

GOUROW.—The services in St. Bartholomew's Church on Easter Day were of a very hearty and joyous character. The music, under the conductorship of Mr. Robb, was well rendered, the Anthem both morning and evening being "The Lord is my strength," by Smart. The new organ was used for the first time, being played by Mr. Berry, the Organist of Trinity Church, Glasgow. It is the work of Messrs. James Conacher and Sons, Huddersfield, and reflects the highest credit on this well-known firm. It contains eleven stops with three couplers, is inclosed in a varnished pitch-pine case, and has tastefully decorated front pipes. The Rev. Mr. Leveson, the Incumbent, took occasion at the services to congratulate the builders on the excellence of their work, and the congregation on this acquisition to their already beautiful little church.

GOVAN.—The choir of Dean Park Parish Church gave its annual Service of Sacred Music on March 30. The programme included the "Hallelujah" from The Mount of Olives, "Honour and arms," Sullivan's "It came upon a midnight clear," "Like as a father," by Hatton, and several choruses from The Messiah, all of which were well rendered.

GRANTHAM.—A Concert was given in the Exchange Hall, on Tuesday, the 11th ult., by the Amateur Vocal Society, assisted by some of the members of the County Choral Society and other friends, under the conductorship of Dr. Dixon, Organist of the Parish Church. The first part was devoted to Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, and the second part to Van Bree's St. Cecilia's Day, with orchestral accompaniments. The success of the Concert fully repaid Dr. Dixon for the pains he had taken in its preparation.

GREENOCK.—The members of the Choral Union gave their final Concert for the present season on Friday, March 31, in the Town Hall, when a well-arranged programme was excellently rendered. Miss Macauley accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. Middleton conducted.

HALIFAX.—On Wednesday, the 10th ult., the members of the Amateur Society, numbering sixty voices, under the conductorship of Dr. Roberts, gave their annual Concert in the Dean Clough Institute, before a large audience. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, the principal vocalists being Miss Hoyle, Miss Crossley, Mr. Osborn, and Mr. Ward. The second part was devoted to Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maiden, the soloists being Miss M. Wayman, Miss Greville, Mr. W. Milligan, and Mr. Tillotson, all of whom are members of the class. The two Cantatas were admirably rendered, Dr. Roberts accompanying throughout on the pianoforte. The Concert was given in aid of the Halifax Infirmary, and a handsome balance will be handed over to that institution.

HARTLEPOOL.—The Choral Society gave its annual Concert on March 30, when Haydn's Creation was performed, with full band and chorus, in the Temperance Hall, which was well filled by an appreciative audience. Madame Shepherd, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. A. McCall were the principal vocalists, and Mr. George Hoggett was the Conductor.

HASTINGS.—On Tuesday evening, the 18th ult., the formal opening of the magnificent new Organ at Christ Church took place, the occasion being marked by the performance of Handel's Oratorio The MESSIAH. The choruses were rendered by the Christ Church Festival Choir, numbering about 200 voices. Mr. T. Harper was solo trumpet, and Mr. Goss Custard presided at the organ. The choral parts were exceptionally well given. Dr. Abram conducted with his usual ability.

Pianoforte solos were contributed by the Misses Courtney, Miss Pygott, and Miss Wachter, and the solo vocalists were Mrs. Blythe Bushell and Miss Richardson. Some pianoforte and harmonium duets were well played by Dr. and Mr. G. N. S. Prior. Dr. Prior's choir gave a good rendering of several glees and part-songs.

HULME.—On Good Friday The Messiah was given in the Town Hall by the Amateur Orchestral Band and the Choral Society; and considering the short time that both these associations have been practising, the performance was a very fair one, some of the choruses being rendered with good effect. The principal vocalists were Miss M. Sutton, Miss L. Bowmont, Mr. H. Taylor, and Mr. Rickard. The band and chorus numbered about 150 performers. Mr. Thomas Batley conducted and Mr. Harris presided at the harmonium.

IRVINE.—On Friday evening, the 7th ult., a performance of The Creation was given in the Parish Church by the members of the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. M'Arthur. The choruses were rendered in an excellent manner, more especially "The heavens are telling" and "Achieved is the glorious work." The soloists were Miss Irvine, Mr. J. T. Murray, and Mr. Gideon Duncan, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. Hinchliffe played the organ accompaniments with his accustomed ability.

ISLE OF MAN.—Lady Loch, on March 31, distributed to the successful students of the Douglas Singing Class the prizes and certificates which they had obtained in connection with the Trinity College Local Examinations and those of the Tonic Sol-fa College in the Elementary Theory of Music, when a well-written address was read to her by Miss Wood, under whose direction the class has advanced to its present state of perfection. Lady Loch, who is about to leave the island, in her reply paid a high compliment to the zeal and talent displayed by Miss Wood in the training of the pupils intrusted to her, and especially referred to her method of teaching harmony, which under her instruction, she said, was "a delightful study." The prize-list proves that music in the Isle of Man is making rapid and highly satisfactory progress.

KELSO, N.B.—The Choral Union performed Handel's Judas Maccabeus in the Corn Exchange on the 13th ult., before a large audience. The soloists were Miss Mackenzie, Miss Young, and Messrs. Welsh and Nutton. The local orchestra was augmented by professional artists from Manchester, Edinburgh and Glasgow. Mr. Daly led the band, and Mr. Alfred Heap conducted.

KENDAL.—A performance of Sullivan's Light of the World was given by the Choral Society in St. George's Hall on the 19th ult., before a large and enthusiastic audience. The chorus, numbering above 100 voices, sang steadily and with much expression throughout the work. The band included leading instrumentalists from the first Manchester orchestras. Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Wakefield, and Messrs. Macdonald and M'Call were the principal vocalists. Mr. W. B. Armstrong and Mr. W. Smallwood officiated as Conductors.

KETTERING.—On Wednesday, the 19th ult., the members of the Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season at the Corn Exchange, on which occasion Judas Maccabeus was successfully performed, under the conductorship of Mr. H. G. Gotch. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Frank Peach, and Mr. Franklin Clive, by whom the solos were efficiently rendered. The choruses were well sustained throughout. There was a large and appreciative audience.

KILMARNOCK.—The Philharmonic Society, on the 14th ult., performed Handel's Oratorio Samson with much success. The choruses were rendered with a precision which reflected the utmost credit upon the training by the Conductor, Mr. W. Newsome. Mr. Thomas Barry presided at the organ, and the orchestra, under Mr. W. H. Cole, rendered valuable assistance.

LANCASTER.—On the 18th ult. the Choral Society gave a Concert in the Music Hall, the work selected for the occasion being Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral The May Queen and Handel's Serenata Acis and Galatea. The Society was most ably assisted by Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. H. E. Welch and Mr. Higginson; Mrs. Austin, Mrs. Riley, and Mr. Howson also taking prominent parts in the performance. The compositions were excellently rendered, but the hall was not so well filled as might have been expected from the attractive nature of the programme.

LEAMINGTON.—An excellent performance of Handel's Oratorio Samson was given by the Philharmonic Society, in the Public Hall, on March 28. The principal vocalists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Kempton. Both the solo and choral parts of the work were most effectively rendered, Miss Dones in "Return, O God of Hosts," and Mr. Kempton (who possesses a bass voice of exceptionally fine quality) in "Honour and arms," being especially deserving of the warmest praise. Mr. Ward conducted with his usual ability, and Mr. Bottomley presided at the pianoforte. The Choral Society gave its second Concert at the Public Hall on Thursday evening, the 13th ult., but the attendance was not nearly so large as the character of the Concert deserved. The solo vocalists were Miss Clara Montague, Mdlle. Laure Labeauville, Mr. Richard Clarke, and Mr. Piercy Watson, the solo pianist and accompanist being Mr. Charles S. Birch. The choir numbered forty voices.

The programme was miscellaneous, comprising in the first part a Cantata, The Wedding Morn, a very clever composition by Mr. Piercy Watson, and concluding with the comic Cantata of John Gilpin. Mr. Birch showed great skill and taste in both solos and accompaniments. Mr. Piercy Watson conducted.

LEICESTER.—The last of the series of Concerts given throughout the winter season by the New Choral Society took place in the Temperance Hall on Thursday, March 30, when the Lobgesang and Dr. J. F. Bridge's Cantata Boadicea were performed before a crowded and appreciative audience. The solos were well sung by Miss A. Marriott, Mr. J. Maas, Mr. Bridson, and two lady amateurs. Both the compositions were carefully rendered, and at the conclusion of the Concert Dr. Bridge, who conducted his own work, received quite an ovation.

LEWES.—On Easter Day, and on Sunday, the 16th ult., being the octave of Easter, there was a Special Service at St. Anne's Church, when selections from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, &c., were given on the organ by Mr. P. J. Starnes. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Scammell, also sang the Anthem, "They have taken away my Lord," the solo being well rendered by Master Ralph Morphew. There was a very large congregation, nearly all remaining until the concluding voluntary.

LICHFIELD.—The newly formed Musical Society gave its second and last Concert on the 20th ult. in St. James's Hall. The band and chorus numbered about 120, and were under the direction of Mr. J. B. Lott, Mus. Bac., Oxon., the Organist of the Cathedral. The first part consisted of Cowen's Rose Maiden, the solos being well rendered by Mrs. Bellamy, Miss Gillard, Messrs. Grayson and Harrison, and the choruses given in excellent style. The second part was miscellaneous, and included songs by the above-named vocalists, glees by the choir, the "Barcarole" from Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte Concerto, well performed by Mr. Walker, and the Overtures Die Felsenmühle (Reissiger) and William Tell, played by the band. Mr. Abbott led, and Mr. Lott conducted.

LIVERPOOL.—On the afternoon of the 7th ult. selections from The Messiah were given at St. George's Hall. The performance was organised by a committee of ladies and gentlemen for the benefit of the poorer classes, to whom tickets were distributed by the committee, as well as through the clergy of the different denominations. Mr. John Branner was the chairman of the committee, and Mr. Henry Ludlow acted as secretary. So great was the demand for tickets that 9,000 were applied for—4,000 in excess of the number issued. The principal vocalists were Madame Billinie Porter, Madame Ternan, Mr. Thomas Foulkes, and Mr. Bridson. Mr. Branscombe presided at the organ, Mr. Max Bruch conducted, and the choir was composed of the members of the different musical societies of Liverpool and Birkenhead. The vocalists, organist, and conductor gave their services gratuitously, and the use of the hall was granted by the Town Council free of charge. The Apollo Glee Club held its annual Dinner on the 20th ult., under the presidency of the Mayor. Several of the most eminent musicians of Liverpool were present, and an admirable programme of music was performed by Messrs. Barber, Haswell, Hughes, Josef Cantor, Queen, Batty, Clarke, Armstrong, and Skeaf, including some excellent compositions written expressly for the club upwards of fifty years ago. It may not be generally known that the Liverpool Apollo Glee Club is the oldest but one (if not actually the oldest) musical society in existence, having been established here in 1796. It possesses a magnificent library of music, embracing every English glee and catch of note. The cordial support awarded to this, the eighty-sixth annual gathering of the club, induces the belief that, with judicious energy on the part of those having the interests of male-voice singing at heart, glee clubs may yet be as popular as in the days of Calcott, Danby, Spofforth, and Samuel Webbe.

LOUTH.—On Monday evening, the 17th ult., at the conclusion of the usual practice of the Choral Society, a handsome timepiece and gold locket were presented by the members, through their President (the Rev. The presentation was accompanied by an address on vellum (bearing the names of ninety-seven subscribers) beautifully illuminated by Mr. Davis, of Louth.

MANSFIELD.—A Concert was given by the Choral Society in the Temperance Hall on the 11th ult., when the second part of The Messiah was exceedingly well performed, Miss Lily Parratt, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. A. M'Call being the principal vocalists; Mr. Robinson presided at the harmonium. Mr. E. C. Haylock, Organist of St. Peter's Church, conducted.

MARGATE.—Mr. J. W. Pearson gave his first annual Concert in the Cliftonville Hall on Thursday, March 30. Fenna, Miss T. Mortlock, Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. F. Bevan, vocalists; and Mr. Bampfylde, solo pianist. Mr. C. Gann led the orchestra, Mr. Bellerby, Mus. Bac., Organist of the Parish Church, accompanied, and Mr. Pearson conducted.

Larkcom, Mr. May, Mr. J. Brown, and Mr. A. McCall. The accompaniments were ably played by Mr. W. J. Smith, and Mr. W. Metcalfe was an efficient Conductor.

MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.—A Harvest Thanksgiving was celebrated at All Saints' Church on February 2. The choir consisted of twenty men and twenty-six boys. Dr. Hayes's Anthem "Praise the Lord" was excellently rendered, and a selection from The Creation was sung during the offertory. The new tunes recently composed by Mr. Summers, Organist of the church, were sung with much spirit. The church was richly decorated with fruits, flowers, and shrubs.

MERTHYR.—The Lenten Musical Services at St. David's Church, under the able direction of the Organist, Mr. Edward Lawrance, have been highly appreciated by large congregations. The selections included not only some of the best specimens of sacred vocal music, but several organ solos, and in every case the rendering of the works was thoroughly satisfactory.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The members of Mr. T. A. Alderson's choir gave their fifth Invitation Concert in the Town Hall on Friday, March 31. The programme consisted of Benedict's Cantata The Legend of St. Cecilia, Dr. Bridge's Cantata Boadicea, and Hecht's choral Scene, "The Charge of the Light Brigade." Mr. G. F. Brockbank; Mary, Master Pooley; Judas, Mr. Smith; Joseph, Mr. Thousless. The Choir, augmented by the Festival Chorus and others, numbered fifty voices, and were located in the organ gallery, their proximity to the organist preventing the necessity of a conductor. The work was most impressively rendered, the overture and accompaniments being admirably played by Mr. Atkinson. At the conclusion of the service the stewards made a collection, the overplus being given to the Choir Benevolent Fund. A sum of £24 was realised, leaving a balance to the fund of £9 12s. 6d. The whole of the arrangements were excellently carried out by the Rev. Precator Barrett and Mr. Brockbank.

The work was extremely well rendered, and highly appreciated by a large audience. The principal vocalists, who were all members of the choir, acquitted themselves admirably. Miss L. M. Nunn, R.A.M., was principal violin, and played the difficult obbligato to the song "A mother's love" extremely well. Mr. Richard White, jun., presided at the organ, and Mr. J. H. BOOK I.—EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES.
PRICE 2s. 6d.

In this edition much help is offered toward a correct and effective rendering of Bach's Organ Music. The distribution of the parts between the two hands is clearly shown. The notes most conveniently played by the right hand are printed on the upper, and those best taken by the left hand on the lower, of the two manual staves. The pedalling is indicated where necessary. Marks of expression and phrasing are added occasionally, and suggestions for the effective use of the organ are given throughout. The preface contains many useful hints.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of
LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where notes are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Primà Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Juror at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON's Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

MRS. W. H. MONK is most sincerely grateful to many kind friends for valuable suggestions sent to her respecting the pitiable case for which she pleads. There is no vacancy at any suitable haven of rest where the hapless "incurable" would be received gratuitously without the tedious, expensive, and uncertain process of canvassing. To ameliorate her trying sufferings the patient needs to have sunlight and pure fresh air. There is a prospect of being able to establish her in a nursing home away from London, if a few friends will kindly help Mrs. Monk to place her there by generously undertaking to subscribe a few pence weekly towards defraying the necessary expense during the last lingering days of her sorrowful life. This powerless and sorely afflicted widow has been known for many years to some of the clergy, and to Mrs. W. H. Monk, Glebe Field, Stoke Newington.

WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL.—There is a VACANCY for a CHORISTER, who will be educated, boarded, and lodged free of expense. ### "PARSIFAL"

AN ANALYSIS OF WAGNER'S FESTIVAL DRAMA

BY F. CORDER.

We have now to consider Wagner's latest achievement, a work constructed on the same lines as those we have just dealt with, and one which—when performed—we hope will prove in no wise inferior to any of them. Wagner has been even more original and happy than ever in his choice of a subject, and (save for a few points which will be commented on later) the libretto may be reckoned one of his very best. The source of the legend is mainly Wolfram von Eschenbach's poem of "Parsival and Titirel," but the "Morte d'Arthur" and other books of the same kind have also been consulted. The mysterious character of Kundry (the only female in the drama) is almost wholly Wagner's own. The verse in which the drama is written is quite a novelty, being principally blank verse of very irregular metre, with occasional rhymes and alliterations. The lyric portions, such as the choruses, are in regular rhymed verse of considerable beauty.

Now as to the music. It was generally reported and believed, while as yet only a favoured few had had portions played to them by the composer, that Wagner had entirely changed his style. Not a bit of it. The music is very like a combination of "Tristan" and the "Götterdämmerung," with the chromaticness and passion of the former and all the weird wildness of the latter—both, if possible, intensified. That is to say, "Parsifal" is fully as "advanced" as anything that Wagner has written. The music has, as usual, a special characteristic, in this respect differing from all the other works. In "Tristan" this characteristic was intense passion, in the "Meistersinger" a genial mediævalism, in the "Ring" a wild heathen savageness. In "Parsifal" it is a holy and solemn grief which pervades the music. We are constantly being reminded of the Divine Tragedy of Calvary; the whole legend is, in fact, an allegory of the Redemption. Not one of the characters but is afflicted with the sorrow of sin in some form. This profound tone of gloom may be detrimental to the success of the drama with the public, but incontestably enhances its dignity and nobility as a great work of art.

We would here pause to remark upon the extraordinary attention which a work of this composer now commands. The libretto was written and published in 1877, when a large edition was immediately sold; the music was only completed a few weeks ago, yet musicians have eagerly striven for a sight of it before publication, and two full analytical accounts have appeared in German papers, while a minute thematic guide by Herr von Wolzogen and some drawing-room arrangements by J. Rubinstein have been for some little time before the public, the vocal score being only just now, as we write these words, completed. Not only this, but nearly three months before the production at Bayreuth photographs of the scenery and dresses are being sold. What a triumph for the genius who thirty years ago could not gain a hearing anywhere!

The drama opens, as usual, with a short orchestral prelude announcing the principal motives, but doing little else. The greater part of it we meet with again, note for note, at the end of the first act. Three motives first claim our earnest attention, the first especially. This is the "blessing"-motive, used at the consecration of the bread and wine in the sacramental "Grail" scene. It is here given out by strings and wood in unison, followed by brilliant harp cadenzas, and then repeated in harmony. It is then repeated in the same manner in the minor, and we must again quote it to show the remarkable union attempted between the alien keys of C minor and E minor:—

No. 1a.

Take my Bo-dy . . and eat, take and drink my Blood:

. . thus be our love . . re - mem - ber - ed.

Take and drink my Blood, take my Bo-dy and eat:

. . do this and think . . . of me.

The beginning and end of this theme, it will be noticed, are taken from the Gregorian tones. The phrase a is used as a distinct motive—that of the magic spear. Next we have the motive of the Holy Grail itself announced by the brass. This phrase is a very old friend—that intonation of the Credo which exerts such a strange fascination on musicians. Without stopping to think of others, we can name the "Jupiter" Symphony finale, the Crusaders' Chorus in Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," and the first movement of Raff's second Violin Sonata, besides fugues innumerable, all founded on those first three notes:—

No. 2.

Brass.

Wood.

Then, after several imperfect attempts, a hymn-like Song of Faith is uttered by the wood-wind, and taken up by strings and brass in turn:—

No. 3.

It reminds us of the chorus of Younger Pilgrims in "Tannhäuser." Following this we have some working, against a tremolo accompaniment, of No. 1 and the spear-motive, out of which springs a short but pregnant phrase, the "mercy"-motive—and this quickly melts into the subject of a chorus heard later: the anguish-telling motive of the Redeemer. After this, the last of the religious motives, the prelude fades away on syncopated chords of the seventh on E flat.

The curtain opens, and discloses a forest-glade on Mount Monsalvat, where an old knight of the Grail, Gurnemanz, and two youthful esquires are sleeping under a tree. From the neighbouring but unseen castle of the Grail the solemn tones of trombones and trumpets announce the dawn of day with the motives 1, 2, and 3. The sleepers start up, and then fall on their knees to offer up a silent morning prayer as the strings of the orchestra take up No. 3, and carry it out to a melody twelve bars long. Gurnemanz bids the esquires then to go and prepare the king's bath, and on the entry of two knights asks anxiously after the monarch's health. Immediately the motive of the sick king, Amfortas— is hinted at, for in this work Wagner gives us nearly the whole of his thematic material in the first few pages, an arrangement which does not tend to the ready appreciation of the numerous motives. On hearing that Amfortas is no better, Gurnemanz remarks—

Fools are we, alleviation seeking!
When but one salve relieves him!
For every simple, every potion,
We have sought all through the world,
When helps but one thing—
And but one man—

when the oracle of the Grail (quoted later on—No. 8) explains his meaning. An interruption now occurs. The mysterious wild woman, Kundry, is seen riding toward in frenzied haste, the figure representing her headlong ride being this harsh phrase:—

No. 6.

She rushes in with a flask of some rare balsam, which she has ridden to Arabia to seek, this short but wild phrase being the Kundry-motive:—

No. 7.

Now King Amfortas appears, borne in a litter and attended by a train of knights, on his way to bathe in a neighbouring lake. He suffers from an incurable wound in the side, and therefore has to go through the whole of his arduous part in a recumbent position, which must be unpleasant for the singer. Kundry refuses to be thanked for her help, and lies sullenly crouching on the ground like a wild beast. On the departure of the king the young esquires express their opinion that she is "no canny," but Gurnemanz takes her part, and reminds them how she has done nothing but good to them. This conversation leads to an explanation—in several very long speeches of Gurnemanz—of various matters connected with the plot, which we had better here narrate in due order.

Titurel, a pious knight, was the original holder of the Grail, the sacred cup from which Christ drank at the Last Supper, also the spear which pierced His side. In the wild mountains of gothic Spain he built a castle for the preservation of these relics, and he and his true knights guarded them, being endowed with powers of heavenly magic. No profane foot could seek Monsalvat, for it was invisible to ordinary eyes. An evil sorcerer named Klingsor attempted in vain to get possession of the relics to use them for his own aggrandisement, but failing, he built a magic castle as near Monsalvat as possible, and contented himself with enticing the Knights of the Grail by his bands of nymphs, when they became his slaves. When Titurel became old, his son Amfortas reigned in his stead. One unhappy day he went out boldly to attack the sorcerer single-handed, bearing the magic spear. Gurnemanz thus relates the issue of his mad adventure:—

While near the walls the king from us was ta'en;
A woman fair as sin had turned his brain.
He lay bewitched, her form enfolding,
The spear escaped his holding.
A deathly cry! I rushed anigh;
But laughing, Klingsor fled before,
The sacred spear with him he bore.
I fought to aid the flying king's returning:
Ah, what a spear-wound in his side was burning!
That wound it is which none may make to close.

Armed with this spear Klingsor can attack even the holy knights, and hopes to gain the Grail. Meanwhile the wretched Amfortas is in a sad plight. The Knights of the Grail live only on the sacramental supper of bread and wine, at the taking of which the Grail is always exhibited, and fills them with strength and joy. It is only the uncovering of the Grail which keeps life in the aged Titurel, who is otherwise, physically speaking, dead. But each time that Amfortas uncovers the Grail his wound bursts forth afresh, and his agonies of remorse, as well as pain, recommence. The Grail itself has recently given him a ray of comfort in the following oracular utterance:—

By pi - ty 'lightened, the guile - less Fool:..

wait for him, my cho - sen tool.

Just as Gurnemanz relates this, and the listening esquires repeat the oracle with deep awe, there is a strange interruption. Cries of horror and indignation are heard, and a wounded swan flutters feebly from the lake, falling dead on the stage. Knights and esquires rush on with excited exclamations, dragging with them the murderer, as they call him—a strange youth who can give no account of himself, and who does not even know his own name. A martial theme is the "Parsifal"-motive, of somewhat the character of the "Lohengrin"-motive:—

No. 9.

Horns.

Gurnemanz rebukes him in touching words for his cruel deed (here the swan-motive from "Lohengrin" is prominent), and Parsifal, powerfully touched, breaks his bow and arrows, and casts them away. He is then questioned as to his birth, parentage, and intentions, but only makes reply: "I do not know," an answer which causes Gurnemanz to remark: "A dolt so dull I never found, save Kundry here." Parsifal only knows that he has a mother named Heart's Affliction—

No. 10.

Celli a 4.

and that he dwelt in the desert with her till the sight of some glittering knights made him run away from home to follow them and seek to be like them. Here Kundry unexpectedly strikes in and tells more of his history, finishing, to Parsifal's horror, with the blunt information that his mother died of a broken heart on losing him. Parsifal, maddened by the news, seeks to do Kundry a mischief, but, on being restrained, turns faint and weak, whereon Kundry brings water and tends him. On Gurnemanz praising her Christian spirit she turns sadly away, saying—

I do no good thing; but rest I long for . .
No! I'll sleep not! terror grips me!
Vain to resist! the time has come:
Slumber—slumber: I must!

She is seized with a strange kind of fit, while Gurnemanz is attending to Parsifal, and crawls into a thicket, where she sinks down and is seen no more. Now the king and his people pass homewards, whither Gurnemanz offers to take Parsifal, with the secret hope that he may be the "pure Fool" named by the Grail. The scene changes with an elaborate panorama, showing the whole way to the castle of the Grail. During this, a phrase, usually taken in imitation (No. 12 below), and founded on the notes of four great bells, which are presently heard pealing—is powerfully worked out in combination with the Grail themes. As we approach the castle bells are heard nearer and nearer, forming a "ground-bass" to the solemn march, while trombones behind the scenes occasionally weave No. 1 into the musical web.

The new scene is a mighty domed hall, like a cathedral, where the guardians of the Grail assemble. The knights enter in procession, singing a solemn unison chorus against the pompous march and pealing bells—a truly splendid specimen of Wagner's abilities in polyphony. During this chorus and the two following a procession enters the hall bearing and attending Amfortas, who is deposited on a couch in the centre, while another procession brings in a draped shrine containing the Grail, which is set down before the king. After the chorus of knights the voices of youths (altos and tenors) are heard from an unseen gallery in the mid-height of the hall, singing to this chromatic and mournful theme (the motive of the Redemption)—

As anguished and lowly,
His life-stream's spilling,
For sinners He did offer;
For the Saviour holy,
With heart free and willing,
My blood I now will proffer.

which is then followed by a chorus of boys (sopranos and altos) from the summit of the dome, singing the Hymn of Faith (No. 3):—

His love endures,
The dove upsoars,
The Saviour's sacred token.
Take the wine red,
For you 'twas shed;
Let bread of life be broken.

There is a solemn silence after this, and then the faint voice of the aged Titirel sounds from his grave, calling on Amfortas to quicken him once more with a sight of the Grail. The wretched sufferer answers with a wild outburst of anguish, a lengthy solo, of which the written notes probably convey but little idea of the effect. Mental and physical torment are vividly portrayed in every word and note. It ends with Amfortas falling back senseless, after a wild appeal to Heaven for mercy. The sweet voices of the boys from the dome respond with the oracle (No. 8), the knights whisper—

Thus came to thee the fiat.
Wait on in hope:
Fulfil thy duty now!—

and again Titirel's voice urges him to uncover the Grail. Then comes the exquisite climax. The Grail is taken out and set before Amfortas, while the voices on high sing the blessing (No. 1) just as it stands in the prelude, with the lovely harp passages which thrill one to the heart. Darkness spreads over the hall; but from the Grail, as the king waves it above the kneeling crowd, issues a bright purple light, which Titirel hails with rapture. The pages now distribute the consecrated elements to the knights, while the Grail's light fades, and, the cup being returned to its shrine, the hall resumes its normal appearance. During the meal a beautiful hymn is sung by the different choirs in turn: the verse sung by the knights is perfectly electrifying in its bold vigour. In place of an "Amen" at the end, the Grail theme (No. 2) is taken up by the three choirs, rising higher and higher till it seems to vanish in heaven, with the words "Blesséd in loving—Blesséd believing."

The wretched Amfortas's wound has again burst forth; he is carried away senseless, the various trains of knights and esquires leave the hall, and there only remain Gurnemanz and Parsifal. The latter, from the first anguished cry of Amfortas, has stood as if petrified, clutching his heart and noticing nothing, not even sharing in the meal. Gurnemanz now roughly shakes him and asks if he understands what he has seen. Parsifal only shakes his head vacantly, whereon the disappointed knight turns him out of the hall without ceremony, saying, as he slams the door on him:—

Come! away on thy road begone,
And put my rede to use:
Leave thou our swans for the future alone,
And seek thyself, gander, a goose!

But as the curtain closes a voice on high is heard singing "By pity lightened, the guileless Fool," and the boys' voices repeat the "Blesséd believing," while the faintly pealing bells are heard—a mysterious end to this mysterious and exquisitely poetic act.

THE MENDELSSOHN FAMILY.*

[SECOND NOTICE.]

AFTER the Festival at Düsseldorf in June, 1833, Felix Mendelssohn came to England, and his father, Abraham, accompanied him. The elder man was a stranger to our "tight little island" and its capital, which even then, with only 1,400,000 inhabitants, had repute as a big thing in cities. During his stay here, Abraham frequently wrote home, and his remarks are often worth transcription. He took a fair view of our London Sunday:—

"The street is perfectly quiet, and not only do I think this stillness very pleasant, but the whole tenor of the London Sunday appears to me perfectly explained by its strict necessity; whereas hitherto the prejudiced and stupid accounts of travellers and authors have made me consider it ridiculous and incredible. Sunday is as indispensable to the Londoners as fallow-time is to the fields, winter to vegetation, night to day. Sunday is not kept only because a law commands it; but that law is here more than anywhere else the evident expression of the general wish, the urgent want. If the London people lived one year without the Sunday, they would all and each turn mad or imbecile; and the more straining, fatiguing, and thoroughly exciting the life of all classes of the population in London is during the six weekdays, the more strictly will the great mass keep Sunday without any compulsion."

Abraham Mendelssohn makes the further acute observation that in London foreigners are ignored so far as special arrangements for their peculiar ideas of comfort are concerned:—

"Strangers are not to exist; there are English people only. A foreigner must entirely renounce his national and individual peculiarities, and must quite desert over to Anglisation and Londonisation to enjoy existence or opinions. This explains to me and somewhat excuses why foreigners who have lived a certain time in England appear much more like apes to us than those coming from France. You are almost compelled to go through an ape-like existence, until the adopted habits grow into a second nature."

He complains further that the guineas run away very fast in London, and waxes almost angry at the abortions produced by our painters. Here is a slashing criticism on the Royal Academy Exhibition of 1833:—

"Nowhere and never have I seen such a heap of rubbish; not a single picture that betrayed anything but want of taste and talent; not one, I venture to say, that bore a trace of practical knowledge. Felix does not quite agree with me; he thinks a painting by Wilkie—a young Capuchin at confession—interesting and good, and for the sake of peace I give in, and acknowledge one-half of his praise. The aged Pater who receives the confession is sufficiently hard and grim, but, as for the young one, I maintain that he must have taken an emetic for the occasion, and is just going to bring up his confession. There are numbers of the most wretched portraits, family groups, landscapes—altogether an abomination; a pity for the large room, very favourably lighted from above, in which these monsters were hanging."

Abraham remained in London longer than he had intended, in consequence of an accident to his leg, and only towards the end of August did father and son start for Berlin, to be received with open arms by the beloved family. Rather more than two years later (November, 1835) that family sustained its first crushing blow by the removal of its head. How desolate this made the outlook of life appear to Felix those who have read his published letters well know.

Fanny Hensel attended the Festival at which "St. Paul" was produced in 1836, and her letters there-are full of interest. In one we read something of one of Beethoven's "Leonora" overtures:—

"Ah! Rebecca! we have heard an overture to 'Leonora,' a rare piece! It has actually never been played, for Beethoven disliked it and put it aside. The man had no taste! I know few things so pretty, so charming, and so full of interest. Haslinger has printed a complete edition of his works without including it; but perhaps he will after the present success."

Concerning the Ninth Symphony, which she knew only by score, Fanny remarks:—

"This gigantic Ninth Symphony, which is so grand and in parts so abominable, as only the work of the greatest of men could be, was played as if by one man; the finest nuances, the most hidden meanings, were expressed to perfection; the masses fell into shape, the symphony became comprehensible, and then it was really exquisitely beautiful. A gigantic tragedy, with a conclusion meant to be dithyrambic, but falling into the opposite extreme—the height of burlesque."

In September, 1836, Felix Mendelssohn was betrothed to Cécile Jeanrenaud, and we have here the short note in which he announced the event to his mother. It is dated Frankfort, September 9, 1836, and runs as follows:—

"Dear Mother,—I have only this moment returned to my home, but I can settle to nothing till I have written to tell you that I have just been accepted by Cécile Jeanrenaud. My head is quite giddy from the events of the day; it is already late at night, and I have nothing else to say; but I must write to you, I feel so rich and happy. To-morrow I will, if I can, write a long letter, and so, if possible, will my dear betrothed. . . . Farewell, and keep me always in your thoughts.—FELIX."

The lover's happy excitement at this time may be imagined only by those who know of what a sensitive temperament is capable under such circumstances. Some of it appears to the dullest perception in a letter addressed to Fanny, and written when on a visit to the Jeanrenauds. He has no words wherewith to express his joy, and is even ready to make 163 formal calls in obedience to social custom: "But really I do not mind even that, I am so happy." Of course, everything about the family was nice and pleasant, and "altogether I can exclaim with heartfelt thankfulness, What a happy man I am!"

The wedding took place in March, 1837, and one letter from the bridegroom gives us a glimpse of the "Felician" honeymoon. Writing at Freiburg, he says: "You may fancy how lovely it all is, and that as we saunter about the whole afternoon in the warm sunshine, standing still now and then to look around and talk over the past and the future, I may well say with true thankfulness that I am a happy man." Felix is naturally full of ambitions at such a moment. "I intend to work very hard and bring out a great many new works and make real progress. . . . I composed at Spire three organ preludes, which I think you will like; a book of Songs without Words is nearly ready for printing, but I do not mean to publish any more of them just now, as I would rather write greater things."

In 1839, Fanny Hensel, with her husband, visited Italy, and spent the winter in Rome, whence she wrote a series of admirable letters. These communications form one of the most interesting portions of the book under review. They are full of shrewdness, humour, and perceptiveness; and their style is so bright and flowing that it is hard, having once taken them up, to put them down. We shall consult the pleasure of our readers if we cull from them choice morsels of genuine artistic interest. To begin with, Fanny loved Italian organists no more than did her brother Felix or Hector Berlioz:—

* "The Mendelssohn Family (1729-1847)." From Letters and Journals. By Sebastian Hensel. 2 Vols. London: Sampson Low, Marston, Leach, and Rivington. 1881.

"It is just striking eleven, and regularly at six in the morning the pifferari arouse me from my slumbers. There is the most horrid noise ever produced by human lungs and goat's-hide, and can, indeed, only be outdone by the playing of the Italian organists. No one who has not heard it would believe what that is like; to me the priest singing mass is the divinest music, because it silences the organ."

Then we have a glimpse of the painter Ingres, at that time head of the French Academy at Rome:—

"Yesterday we dined for the first time with Ingres, Director of the French Academy, who received us most kindly. He retains an affectionate remembrance of Paul, whom, to distinguish from Felix, he always calls 'Votre frère qui joue si bien de la basse.' As you know, he (Ingres) is a great fiddler before the Lord, and after dinner we had trios, as is the case every Sunday. The whole French Academy were assembled, all looking thorough jeune France, with beards and hair à la Raphael, and nearly all handsome young men, whom I could not blame for longing after the fleshpots of Egypt in the shape of the balls Horace Vernet used to give."

We are also introduced to Vernet:—

"We spent the evening with Ingres, to meet Vernet, who was very pleasant, but might have been taken for an Arab, as his long beard, marked features, sparkling eyes, and brown complexion are quite in keeping with his oriental costume. His wearing this sounds ridiculous to those who have not seen him, and we were quite prepared to laugh; but there is really no feeling of masquerade about it, as all is in harmony with the picturesque dress, which is made still more effective by his European cleanliness and innate taste; his manners, too, have a flavour of the East, which makes the tout ensemble interesting and impressive."

Fanny heard the "Passion" sung to the usual Gregorian version in the Sistine Chapel on Good Friday, and says of it, with great acuteness:—

"I was deeply interested, and my attention did not flag for a single moment, but Sebastian Bach was in my mind all the time. These obsolete forms of singing strongly remind me of ancient mosaic, but they strike me as even more stiff and deathlike. This likeness is easily explained, for the two forms of art date from the same period. I believe, too, that in a Byzantine church my ear would not have been offended by such singing, as it was here in the Sistine, where art has been carried to the culminating point of perfection—nay, almost beyond it—and where, in consequence, the utter poverty of the music is felt to be the more incongruous."

Allegri's famous "Miserere" is described as a "very simple four-part versetto in G minor, repeated with little alteration ten times, and used by the singers merely as a canvas to be embroidered with their traditional and somewhat rococo embellishments." As for the musical service at the Armenian Church, Madame Hensel could liken it to nothing but the howling of cats. At this time Gounod was a member of the Academy at Rome, and reference is here and there made to him in these letters. On one occasion Madame Hensel played a concerto by Bach, and all the people gathered round her with their congratulations: "Among those who found the greatest difficulty in composing themselves was Gounod, who, lively as he is, declares himself quite at a loss for words to express his appreciation of my influence over him and his happiness in our society. There is a great difference between him and Bousquet, who is much calmer, and has a decided preference for the French classical school; while Gounod, romantic to a degree and full of passion, seems quite upset by his introduction to German music. It has startled him like a bombshell, and I should not wonder if it did as much damage." In another place we read: "Magnus came in, and our Frenchmen, or, as we now call them, the three caprices—for Bousquet has surnamed himself Caprice en la, Gounod Caprice en mi, and Dugasseau Caprice en si bemolle. . . . Bousquet showed me a cantata he is at work upon, which seemed to contain much that was beautiful. His acquaintance with German music will be an unmixed benefit, I believe, but so far Gounod seems only bewildered and upset by it. He strikes me as much less matured than his comrade, but as yet I know nothing of his music, for a scherzo he played to me the other day, and asked me to accept, was too bad to be taken into account at all. I thought I discerned some traces of German influence in it." Again we read: "In the evening the Frenchmen dropped in, and Wilhelm began their portraits, a great deal of fun going on, of course, in the meantime. Each sitter was allowed to order me to play whatever he chose, and in this manner I went nearly through 'Fidelio,' besides several other things, and ended with Beethoven's Sonata in C major. Gounod behaved almost as if he were intoxicated, and talked a lot of nonsense; but when it came to his exclaiming, with immense enthusiasm, 'Beethoven est un polisson!' the others pronounced it high time for him to be in bed, and carried him off." Once more—and this is curious, as throwing light upon the religious tendencies of Gounod's nature: "We had talked much of Gounod before, and Bousquet lavished alternate abuse and pity upon him for having given up all participation in those delightful last days. Now he has told us how far Gounod had allowed himself to be drawn into engagements of a religious nature, the result of which he much feared for one of his weak character. . . . During the winter he (Père Lacordaire) tried to win over both Bousquet and Gounod, and the latter, excitable and easily influenced as he is, has so thoroughly embraced his views that Bousquet is afraid he will give up music and take to the cowl. . . . The Society of St. John the Evangelist in Paris consists entirely of young artists, who have bound themselves together with the motive of employing Christian art to convert the worldly minded, and Gounod is said to have joined it."

One other extract from these charming letters, and we must pass on. It concerns an Irish family named Palisser, thus described by Madame Hensel: "They consist of three gigantic daughters—with handsome English faces on long, slender flower-stalks, who all ride horses and paint landscapes, talk German, French, and Italian fluently, and sing badly—a tall son, a number of children, a pleasant mother and a good-looking father." All these were so amiable and friendly as to astonish Madame Hensel till she learned that they were not English. A propos, the English then get a bit of Madame Hensel's mind:—

"With regard to the English in general, it would be impossible to find a ruder or more churlish person than an Englishman with whom you are not acquainted. I get quite vexed with them every day. They live here in such a compact mass as almost to form a nationality of themselves, but they seem somehow out of place, and in consequence their ways offend one's taste, as they would not do in their own country. I avoid playing at English parties as much as possible, for, however languid the conversation may have been during the whole evening, it becomes as animated as possible the moment music begins, and again flags as soon as it stops. The national pride, which enables them to do such great things as a nation, seems intolerable arrogance in the individual, and even when they take pains to be kind, they are generally as clumsy as bears."

This is plain speaking, and not untruthful; but it is speaking to which John Bull long ago grew accustomed without therefore altering his ways one bit. His churlishness, clumsiness, and indifference to music at private parties seem bred in his bones, and cannot be exorcised by talk.

A letter from Fanny to Felix, dated Berlin, December 5, 1840, is of interest as showing that the master once contemplated an opera on the subject of the Nibelungen, and, anticipating Wagner, thought to prepare his own libretto. It appears, moreover, that Madame Hensel had previously attempted the same literary task:—

"I am heartily glad to hear that you are entering into the idea of the Nibelungen with so much zest. As you have procured Raupach's work on the subject, your sketch is most likely at this moment far more advanced than mine ever was; indeed, I thought rather of the characters and plot as a whole than on the arrangement of the scenes. The conclusion strikes me as the greatest difficulty, for who would finish an opera with all that horrible carnage? And yet what else is to be done? The sinking of the Nibelungen hoard takes place in this manner: After Hagen has murdered Siegfried, he casts envious eyes upon Chriemhild's treasures, brought, if I mistake not, from the Nibelungen land, and, dreading lest by their means she might rouse friends who would avenge her wrongs, he takes them from her and sinks them in the Rhine. Do let me hear from time to time how the plan progresses."

What would a Nibelungen opera have been from Mendelssohn's hands? Something bright and beautiful, we may well believe, and something retaining the true nobility of the poem with all its high significance.

The first performance, at the Berlin Theatre, of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with Mendelssohn's then new music, gave occasion for a very lively letter from Fanny to Rebecca. It is worth transcribing entire, but we must be satisfied to reproduce parts only. A merry party assembled at the Mendelssohns' for the occasion: "They are Hiller, David, Gade, and a delightful little Hungarian, Joachim, who, though only twelve, is such a clever violinist that David can teach him nothing more, and such a sensible boy that he travelled here alone, and lives by himself in the Rhenish Hotel, all of which seems quite natural and proper." The performance being delayed for a few days, these good people had ample opportunity for enjoying themselves together, "and everybody that could fiddle fiddled, and everybody that could play played." Then, all being ready, the great event came off: "The fairies, about thirty children from the school of dancing, were charming, and when they trooped into the theatre to the strain of that lovely march, the effect was magical. But the most beautiful part of the whole piece . . . is the last scene, where the court goes off in procession to the splendid wedding march, and you hear the music gradually dying away in the distance, till it suddenly breaks upon the theme of the overture, and Puck and the fairies reappear on the empty stage. I assure you it is enough to make one cry. . . . The three middle acts are separated by music alone, the curtain not falling at all; after the second scene comes a wonderful piece representing Hermia seeking Lysander, which suddenly changes to a mad burlesque at the moment that the Clowns appear in the forest, expressing their delight at the beauty of the scene by comical gestures. It is irresistibly ludicrous. How delighted all the children of Berlin will be with this piece, for the Lion and the Ass are splendid. The Ass opens its mouth wide and puts out its tongue, and when pretty Peasblossom, in a little red cap, and tiny Mustard-seed set to work to scratch its head, I can assure you, Walter, it is fine. But I must describe the Lion's costume. His jacket and trousers are of yellow-grey felt; his wig, made of shavings, hangs down to the ground, and his tail is an enormously long wisp of straw fastened on in an almost indecorously natural manner. Thisbe's attire is rather too extravagant for my taste; one of her stockings is hanging down, and she pulls it up, when one of the courtiers remarks that Pyramus might hang himself with her garter; she has nothing womanly about her except a towel arranged as drapery. The dead march for her and Pyramus is really stupendous; I could scarcely believe up to the last that Felix would have the impudence to bring it before the public, for it is exactly like the mock preludes he plays when you cannot get him to be serious."

Subsequently we have an amusing incident of the first performance at Potsdam: "Moonshine had a live dog at Potsdam, but the beast rushed up to the Lion and bit him, so he appeared yesterday with a stuffed one under his arm. He gets into such a state of mind over his part that at last he cries, which has a most amusing effect."

Here we must bring to an end our culling from these delightful volumes, for the reader's interest in which enough and more has been said. Beyond question "The Mendelssohn Family" is the most important contribution to Mendelssohn literature that has appeared since the famous correspondence was issued. It throws a flood of light, not only upon the composer, already well known, but upon the remarkable household to which he belonged. More, it excites our sympathy for one and all. We cannot but feel for and with those gifted men and women, rejoicing in their joy and sorrowing in their grief. The volumes should be in the library of every one who studies human nature in its highest expression.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XI.—CHOPIN (continued from page 259).

WE are indebted to the great kindness of Mr. A. J. Hipkins, of the firm of Broadwood and Sons, for a most interesting paper on Chopin in England. The communication needs neither preface nor comment. It is clear, full, and authoritative as to the matter of which it treats.

Athenæum, April 8, 1848, p. 374: "Mr. Osborne, too, has come. But the amateurs and professors of the pianoforte will hear with still greater interest that M. Chopin is expected, if not already here;—it is even added to remain in England. As the most individual composer for his instrument now writing (at whatever figure his individuality may be rated), as a player, too, less hackneyed before the public than any contemporary—M. Chopin's visit is an event for which we most heartily thank the French Republic."

Chopin really arrived April 21, 1848, and went to 10, Bentinck Street; in a few days to settle in more suitable lodgings at 48, Dover Street, where a blue plate might now bear record to his having lived there. The Athenæum of April 29, p. 444, simply records that M. Chopin has arrived. But he had been in England incognito before. In "Mendelssohn, Letters and Recollections," by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, translated by M. E. von Glehn (Macmillan, 1874, p. 101), there is a letter from Mendelssohn to Hiller, written in London under date of September 1, 1837, wherein he says: "It seems that Chopin came over here quite suddenly a fortnight ago, paid no visits and saw nobody, played very beautifully at Broadwood's one evening, and then took himself off again. They say he is still very ill and miserable." He was, in fact, in London from the 11th to the 22nd of July, 1837, and the remark of Mendelssohn that he was ill and miserable gives the cue to the object of his visit being for medical advice. He came with Camille Pleyel, who very naturally called upon his old friend James Broadwood, and taking Chopin with him, introduced him as M. Fritz. Mr. Broadwood invited Pleyel and his friend to dine with him at his house in Bryanston Square, and it was there that Chopin played so beautifully, as recorded by Mendelssohn. Mr. Broadwood did not suspect that he was entertaining an angel unawares, but the ladies of the family soon divined the composer in the player, and their questions quickly elicited that M. Fritz was no other than Frederic Chopin himself.

Probably through this incident, immediately upon his arrival in London, in April, 1848, he renewed his acquaintance with the Broadwoods, and during his stay in England (and Scotland) made use, in public as well as private, of their pianos, the action and tone of which suited him. He had nearly always used Pleyel's piano in Paris, being reported to have said on one occasion: "Quand je suis mal disposé je joue sur un piano d'Erard, et j'y trouve facilement un son fait. Mais quand je me sens en verve et assez fort pour trouver mon son à moi, il me faut un piano de Pleyel." Although far from being "assez fort," Chopin brought a piano of Pleyel's to London with him. Miss Stirling, a pupil and great friend of Chopin, ultimately bought this instrument, and left it to Chopin's niece. Mr. Henry Fowler Broadwood had a concert instrument constructed expressly for Chopin, the first grand piano made in a complete iron frame. The pianist did not live to play upon it, but the maker has never parted with it. It was used once in public by Chopin's distinguished pupil, the Princess Czartoryska. When Chopin returned to Paris he resumed the Pleyel pianos, the good qualities of which were so congenial to him. It is astonishing in these days of Chopin-playing—pseudo-Chopin, I fear we must call it, for it comes filtered through the school and traditions of quite another piano genius, Liszt—how little stir the arrival of Chopin in London made. He was but one of the flight of distinguished pianists the French Revolution had sent here: of these Kalkbrenner, Hallé, Bilet, and our own Osborne were far better known, and Thalberg was here, at the time considered the first pianist of the day. The late Frederick Beale attached himself to Chopin, who had, besides the Misses Stirling and his young pupil, the Norwegian Tellefsen to look after him. One of the first houses he played at was Gore House, Kensington, at the invitation of the Countess of Blessington. Mr. Beale at once took from Chopin the two Waltzes (Op. 64), in D flat major and C sharp minor, that are now perhaps the best known in England of his works. Mr. Chorley expatiated upon them in the Athenæum of May 6 (p. 467), as follows: "Whereas other more robust pianists announce a Concert, or see company at Erard's or Broadwood's, by way of acquainting the 'Monster London' with the arrival of themselves and suite—M. Chopin, whose extreme fragility of health is, unhappily, historical as the cause of his few and uncertain public appearances, quietly publishes two waltzes—his sixty-fourth work. Nor must the offering be counted as a frivolous one because of its title. These waltzes, it is true, are less developed than the three in A minor, D flat major, and F major (Op. 34); but they have still more originality and style than many a heap of notes calling itself sonata or concerto by contemporary composer, thinking to claim honours as a classical writer. It is true that one, in D flat major, is dreamy; that the other in C sharp minor, though more vigorous, is wild and quaint" [surely Chorley had reversed those]—"both totally unlike the buoyant and piquant tunes by which Strauss, Lanner, Labitzky, and Gung'l set the world dancing in a four-in-a-bar step (so absurd is Fashion!). It is true that M. Chopin's notation is, by fits, needlessly teasing—that his harmonies, from time to time, are such as require his own sliding, smooth, delicate finger to 'carry off.' It is true that old-fashioned, steady pianoforte-players, who have no touch of waywardness, or gipsy wildness, or insanity in their treatment of the instrument, will point to single bars with Mr. Burchell's monosyllable—utterly unable, moreover, to make anything of the whole. But there is a world of real, as well as of affected, romance in Art, and, although no wise man could confine himself exclusively to this, no liberal one will refuse to enter it in turn. And seeing that nothing stands still or is exactly reproduced, and believing that romantic music appears so simultaneously just now in all the countries of Europe as to indicate a desire that will have satisfaction, such individual rêveries, such delicately tinted sketches, such melodies near akin to the æolian harp's caprices as M. Chopin gives us must be allowed to possess the general value of artistic significance and consistency, as well as an exquisite charm for particular listeners when in a particular mood. He is distinctly, gracefully, poetically natural; and therefore, as we long ago said, when there was small idea of his ever coming to England (Athenæum, No. 740), well worth studying in his writings. Those are fortunate who have means of gaining a further insight into the matter by hearing the composer perform his own compositions."

In the Athenæum, June 10, p. 588, the pleasant rumour is mentioned that M. Chopin may shortly be heard in public—a matinée or concert being in projection, his health permitting.

Athenæum, June 17, p. 613: "M. Chopin's matinée (another attraction of the choicest possible quality) will be held on Friday next."

The matinée came off at Madame Sartoris's, 99, Eaton Place, on June 23. The Athenæum critic again comes to the fore (July 1, p. 660) with a long and appreciative notice:—

"M. Chopin's Matinée.—It is not too much to say that, at a period when so many sources of pleasure appear to be exhausted—when mechanical skill, too, has been carried to a point precluding the hope of much further discovery—M. Chopin gave his audience, yesterday week, an hour and a half of such musical enjoyment as only great beauty combined with great novelty can command. We have had by turns this great player and the other great composer—we have been treated to the smooth, the splendid, the sentimental, the severe in style, upon the pianoforte, one after the other: M. Chopin has proved to us that the instrument is capable of yet another 'mode'—one in which delicacy, picturesqueness, elegance, and humour may be blended so as to produce that rare thing a new delight. His treatment of the pianoforte is peculiar, and though we know that a system is not to be 'explained in one word,' we will mention a point or two so entirely novel that even the distant amateur may in part conceive how from such motions an original style of performance, and thence of composition, must inevitably result. Whereas other pianists have proceeded on the intention of equalising the power of the fingers, M. Chopin's plans are arranged so as to utilise their natural inequality of power, and, if carried out, provide varieties of expression not to be attained by those with whom evenness is the first excellence. Allied with this fancy are M. Chopin's peculiar mode of treating the scale and the shake, and his manner of sliding with one and the same finger from note to note, by way of producing a peculiar legato, and of passing the third over the fourth finger. All these innovations are 'art and part' of his music as properly rendered, and as enacted by himself they charm by an ease and grace which, though superfine, are totally distinct from affectation. After the 'hammer and tongs' work on the pianoforte to which we have of late years been accustomed, the delicacy of M. Chopin's tone and the elasticity of his passages are delicious to the ear. He makes a free use of tempo rubato; leaning about within his bars more than any player we recollect, but still subject to a presiding sentiment of measure such as presently habituates the ear to the liberties taken. In music not his own we happen to know he can be as staid as a metronome: while his mazurkas, &c., lose half their characteristic wildness if played without a certain freak and license—impossible to imitate, but irresistible if the player at all feel the music. This we have always fancied while reading M. Chopin's works:—we are now sure of it after hearing him perform them himself.

"The pieces which M. Chopin gave at his matinée were Nocturni—Studies—'La Berceuse' (a delicate and lulling dream with that most matter-of-fact substratum, a ground bass), two Mazurkas, and the two Waltzes (ante, p. 467). Most of these might be called 'gems' without misuse of the well-worn symbol. Yet if fantasy be allowed to characterise what is essentially fantastic, they are not so much gems as pearls—pearls in the changeful delicacy of their colour—in occasional irregularities of form, not destructive, however, of symmetry—pearls in their not being the products of health and strength. They will not displace and supersede other of our musical treasures, being different in tone and quality to any possessions we already enjoy: but inasmuch as art is not final, nor invention to be narrowed within the limits of experience, no musician, be he ever so straight-laced or severe—or vowed to his own school—can be indifferent to their exquisite and peculiar charm. It is to be hoped that M. Chopin will play again: and the next time some of his more developed compositions,—such as ballads, Scherzi, &c., if not his Sonatas and Concerti. Few of his audience will be at all contented by a single hearing."

The second matinée Chopin gave took place on July 7, at the residence of Lord Falmouth, 2, St. James's Square. Here he had the assistance of Madame Viardot-Garcia. Mr. Chorley again wrote a notice in the Athenæum, under date of July 15, 1848 (p. 708), which is, as far as concerned Chopin, here transcribed:—

Athenæum, July 15, 1848, p. 708: "M. Chopin's Second Matinée.—Little is to be added to the general character of this charming and individual artist which we gave on a former occasion (ante, p. 660). But M. Chopin played better at his second than at his first matinée—not with more delicacy (that could hardly be), but with more force and brio. Two among what may be called M. Chopin's more serious compositions were especially welcome to us—his 'Scherzo' in B flat minor and his 'Study' in C sharp minor. The former we have long admired for its quaintness, grace, and remarkable variety—though it is not guiltless of a needlessly crude and hazardous modulation or two; the latter, again, is a masterpiece—original, expressive, and grand. No individual genius, we are inclined to theorise, is one-sided, however fondly the public is apt to fasten upon one characteristic, and disproportionately to foster its development; and if this crotchet be based on a sound harmony, M. Chopin could hardly be so intimately and exquisitely graceful as he is, if he could not on occasion be also grandiose. . . . The other attraction of M. Chopin's matinée was the singing of Madame Viardot-Garcia, who, besides her inimitably Spanish airs with Mlle. de Mendi, and her queerly piquant 'Mazurkas,' gave the 'Cenerentola' rondo, graced with great brilliancy, and a song by Beethoven, 'Ich denke dein.' . . ."

It is strange that Mr. Ella should have been absent from a concert given at the house of his great friend Lord Falmouth, yet such was the case; and the one occasion when he heard Chopin play at Benedict's was the only one he has recorded. Chopin took part in a concert given at Stafford House by the Duchess of Sutherland, and Benedict joined him then in a duet, one of Mozart's. Sir Julius's memory is very clear about the great pains Chopin insisted should be taken in rehearsing it, to make the rendering of it in the concert as perfect as possible.* For these semi-public performances Chopin was accustomed to try his piano first at Broadwood's, where it was necessary a flight of stairs should be ascended to reach the piano-room. Mr. Black or Mr. Murray of that firm would lift poor Chopin like a child, and save him loss of breath that would ensue from the ascent, by carrying him. Once seated at the piano he was himself again. In the month of August Chopin went to Manchester to play in a concert there, becoming for the time being the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Salis Schwabe. Thence he proceeded to Scotland.

Chopin appears to have left London for Scotland on August 4 or 5, 1848. He must have gone to Edinburgh, but to whose house I do not know; I should say it was to that of a friend of Miss Stirling. Mr. Montignani (now one of the proprietors of Wood and Co.) was present at the Recital given in the Hopetoun Rooms, Queen Street, and remembers that it was a public concert, the tickets being sold. Broadwood sent the piano to the care of Mr. George Wood (now of Cramer and Co., Regent Street); the same piano would, of course, go on to Glasgow. But between August 23 and September 7 Chopin was with the Salis Schwabes at Manchester, giving a public performance there, Broadwood again sending a piano. The Glasgow Recital took place on September 27, and a local critic declared that Chopin's playing was more fitted for the home circle than the concert-room. With regard to this performance and Chopin's visit generally, Mr. Muir Wood kindly writes:—

"I believe it was Miss Stirling, a favourite pupil of Chopin, who induced him to come across, in the hope probably that the change of scene and of climate would be beneficial and brace up his relaxed system. The Stirlings were one of the old merchant families of Glasgow, highly respected for the strict, honourable principles with which all their extensive dealings were carried on. They moved in the best society of the country, so Chopin had every door open to him. Whether Mrs. Houston of Johnstone Castle had also been a former pupil of his I do not know, but there he settled down for a time. The castle is in a healthy locality, and at a convenient distance from Glasgow—some ten miles only. I fear I cannot tell you much more. I think I gave you the date of the concert, but in the meantime I have forgotten it. I was then a comparative stranger in Glasgow, but I was told that so many private carriages had never before been seen at any concert in the town. In fact, it was the country people who turned out, with a few of the élite of Glasgow society. Being a morning concert, the citizens were busy otherwise, and half-a-guinea was considered too high a sum for their wives and daughters."

From November 3 to 23 Chopin was in London again—this time at 4, St. James's Place. He would play at the Polish Ball given on November 16 in the Guildhall, although his friends dissuaded him, and the performance was, so to speak, a disappointment to him. He was surrounded by perspiring dancers, only too anxious to get back to the ball-room. Broadwood sent the piano. It was his last appearance in public. Karasowski tells us how glad he was to leave England and get back to Paris again.

The foregoing, which throws for the first time a light upon Chopin in England, may be supplemented here by extracts from the Master's own letters, as published by Karasowski. Writing to Grzymala, he said: *—

"I have played at a Concert in Glasgow before all the haute volée. To-day I feel very much depressed. Oh! this fog! Although the window at which I am writing commands the same beautiful prospect with which, as you will remember, Robert Bruce was so delighted,—Stirling Castle, mountains, lakes, a charming park, in a word, the most splendid view in Scotland—I can see nothing except when the sun breaks momentarily through the mist. If it would but do this a little oftener! I shall soon forget Polish, and speak French like an Englishman and English like a Scotchman. If I do not write you a jeremiad it is not because I mistrust your sympathy, but because you only know everything; and if I once begin I shall go on complaining for ever, and always in the same strain. But, no; I am wrong in saying it is always the same, for I grow worse every day. I feel weaker and weaker, and cannot compose, not for want of inclination, but from physical causes, and besides I am in a different place every week. But what am I to do? I must at least lay by something for the winter."

Chopin's physical condition, which may be inferred from the statement that he was carried upstairs at Broadwood's, is clearly enough described by himself in a letter to the same friend: †—

"I am quite incapable of doing anything all the morning, and when I am dressed I feel so exhausted that I am obliged to rest. After dinner I have to sit two hours with the gentlemen, listen to their conversation, and look on while they drink. I feel ready to die with weariness, and think of other things all the time till I go into the drawing-room, when I have to use all my efforts to rouse myself, for everybody is curious to hear me play. After this my good Daniel carries me upstairs, undresses and puts me to bed; he leaves the light burning, and I am once more at leisure to sigh and dream, and look forward to passing another day in the same manner. If I ever arrange to do anything I am sure to be carried off in another direction, for my Scotch friends—although with the best intentions in the world—give me no rest. They want to introduce me to all their relations; they will kill me with their kindness, but for politeness' sake I must put up with it all."

Subsequently he wrote: ‡—

"I am going to Manchester, where there is to be a grand concert, and I am going to play twice without orchestral accompaniment. Alboni is also to perform, but I take no interest in this or anything else. I shall just sit down and play, and what I shall do afterwards I do not yet know."

The wretchedness implied in the foregoing extracts deepened into despair. What can be more miserable than the spirit of these words? *—

"Why I should trouble you with all this I do not know, for I really do not care about anything. . . . I never yet cursed any one, but I am now so overwhelmed by the weariness of life that I am ready to curse Lucrezia. But there is pain in this, too, which is all the worse as one grows older in wickedness every day. . . . It is no good their troubling about me at home. I cannot be more wretched than I am, and there is no chance of my being less so. In general I feel nothing, and wait my end with patience."

The master's last letter from English soil runs thus: †—

"On Thursday I am to leave terrible London. In addition to other ills I have got neuralgia. Tell Pleyel to send me in a piano on Thursday evening, and have it covered; buy a bunch of violets to make the room smell sweet. I should like, when I return, to find some books of poetry in my bedroom, to which I shall probably be confined for some time. So on Friday evening I hope to be in Paris; a day longer here and I should go mad or die. My Scotch lady friends are good, but very wearisome. They have made so much of me that I cannot easily get quit of them. Let the house be thoroughly warmed and well dusted. Perhaps, I may get well again."

Alas! no. Chopin returned to Paris to die.

MUSICAL ACTIVITY OF THE YEAR

By HENRY C. LUNN.

THE increased and increasing diffusion of music in the present day peremptorily demands that all who write upon the art shall no longer be considered critics because they chronicle the events passing around them, and have mastered the meaning of a few technical terms which, like the cabalistic words forming the stock-in-trade of the domestic "wizard," constitute their only superiority over those who meekly confide in them. Modern criticism must be founded upon an intimate knowledge not only of the works and the workers of an age when music was struggling to escape from the bonds of pedantry and to assert its real power in the world, but of the theories—right or wrong—of those more recent thinkers the deductions from which, as shown in their compositions, can only be fairly debated when the premises have been rightly understood. In this age of rapid progress, then, it is scarcely to be wondered at that musicians, like politicians, should be divided in opinion, and that conservative and liberal writers should with equal intelligence endeavour to win adherents to their cause. On the one hand we are told that the creations of the great men who have laboured within the received canons of art are those which should continue to occupy the positions they have always held; whilst, on the other hand, we are assured that these canons are partially superseded by a discovery of the true mission of music as an exponent of philosophical thought, and even as a medium for colouring and intensifying actual events, so that without an analysis of the composer's intention the merits of a work cannot be properly judged. It is probable that the truth lies between these extreme creeds; but meanwhile we feel that the art is on its trial, and are glad, therefore, to draw attention to the fact that the majority of the advocates on both sides are now fully competent to the task which lies before them. There can be no question that at a time when music was treated, even by many recognised critics, as an agreeable relaxation after the fatigues of the day, such compositions as Beethoven's Symphonies, for example, could scarcely be understood sufficiently to receive any justice at their hands; and it was not, therefore, until the art became estimated by a higher standard that the general public was led to regard it rather as an intellectual study than a pleasant pastime. Let us then admit that the judges will always be formed by the works to be judged; and in looking back think leniently of those who taught according to the knowledge of the day, and in looking forward trust that earnestness of purpose and a desire to uphold the true intent of music will ever continue to rule the writings of all to whom the responsible office of criticism may be confided.

It is well, indeed, that so much of the intellectual thought of the day should be directed towards music; for never, within our recollection, has opinion on all sides been so much courted as at the present moment. The musical activity of the year 1882 is so remarkable that it will doubtless form an epoch in the history of the art. In London, although Italian Opera still asserts its right to be heard, German music, with German executants, surrounds us on all sides; and even the enthusiast who wishes to make the most of the attractions held out to him, is almost perplexed by the number of operas and concerts at which the best specimens of modern German art are to be heard. Ever since the memorable performance at Bayreuth, Wagner's "Nibelung's Ring" has been constantly talked of in this country, and now we have this representative work of the representative composer sung by German vocalists, with a German orchestra and a German Conductor, on the very stage where, as long as we can recollect, during the fashionable season, Italian Opera has reigned supreme. Then at Drury Lane Theatre there is German Opera, rendered by native singers in the language of the country; and, better still, in the language to which the music was originally written. The "Richter Concerts," conducted by an artist who has already proved his right to the position he occupies as a highly intellectual reader of the greatest works in musical art, still remain amongst the attractions of the season; and the "Symphony Concerts," under the able conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé, with a fine orchestra and "Beethoven Choir of 350 performers," appeal with irresistible force to the lovers of classical music; both these excellently organised enterprises being so well patronised as to demonstrate beyond the possibility of doubt that there is a public ready and willing to listen when good music, well performed, is placed within reach. In addition to these Orchestral Concerts, we have had, for the first time, those given by Mr. Walter Macfarren, and numerous Recitals of chamber music, amongst which may be mentioned a series by Herr Franke at the Marlborough Rooms; and it is announced that a competition between the French Orphéons (similar to that given at Brighton last year) will take place during the present month at the Royal Albert Hall.

Extraordinary, however, as the season of 1882 will prove in London—for it must be remembered that renewed exertions also characterise the performances by our English Societies—at Bayreuth we find that preparations are proceeding with vigour for the production of Wagner's latest opera-drama, "Parsifal," which is to be given in July, with the best solo singers that can be procured, and the Munich Court Orchestra, which has been secured by the special order of the King of Bavaria. American papers also record the many excellent performances given this year in the United States, amongst which the Boston Symphony Concerts take high rank; and in our last number we drew attention to the first Biennial Festival of the Chicago Musical Association, which was announced to commence during the past month.

It might reasonably be supposed that after so busy a season the year would die away without any other special event to mark its decline. The culminating point of this musical activity, however, occurs in what the Americans call the "Fall." At the Birmingham Festival, commencing in the latter part of August, Gounod's new Oratorio, "The Redemption," will be produced, conducted by the composer. We need not here recount the incidents which enabled the committee of the Festival to secure this important work for a first performance in a locality which has been the scene of so many former triumphs. These have been fully laid before our readers in THE MUSICAL TIMES of December last; and it only remains to say that the interest naturally attached to the production of this Oratorio has been considerably strengthened by the announcement upon the title-page, by the composer himself, that he considers it "the work of his life." The value of the composition to the financial prospects of this great musical gathering may be estimated by the resolution of the committee to perform it twice during the Festival. This, we believe, is quite without precedent; but it will doubtless be a great boon, not only to the many who may be unable to gain admission at the first representation, but to those desirous of hearing it once more before the vast organisation of high-class executants assembled on the occasion is dispersed.

A great portion of the musical activity of the year in London is obviously due to the visit of so many German artists to the metropolis, with the view of bringing the operatic works of their country in the original language before English audiences; and it is a pleasure to record that they have been as cordially received as emissaries in a foreign land should ever be. It is truly said that "after a storm comes a calm." If then, during this musical "storm," some long-cherished notions should be uprooted and scattered around, let us hope that in the "calm" which succeeds it, all that is sound and healthful will be carefully gathered together, and the future growth of the art even benefited by the ordeal through which it has passed.

BRÜNNHILDE.

TO FRAU VOGL.

HER clinging arms she loosened. Can it be?

He clasped her not, touched not the unbound hair,
Kissed not her lips, nor held the bowed head there
Upon his breast! "Siegfried, thou knowest not me?"

Her answer lay in his changed eyes, and she

Once circled by close walls of blinding flame,

Must stand alone, unshielded in her shame

Of womanhood betrayed. Oh, Brünnhild, we

Women of these late days, beholding thee,

Weep for thy loss, and ours, and with low breath

Question how chanced it after. Did fierce Death,

The god thou soughtest—did he set thee free

From thy deep grief, and, priest-like at the pyre,

Re-wed thee to thy love, amid the fire?

May 16, 1882.

SOON after the burning of the Ring Theatre, at Vienna, numerous articles appeared in the English journals advocating most earnestly the absolute necessity not only of providing every precaution against such a calamity at all places of entertainment in this country, and of seeing that all these precautions are at once available in case of need, but, on the part of the audience, of repressing as much as lies within the power of each individual present any attempt at wildly rushing to the doors until the necessity absolutely arises. Since then two incidents have occurred which decisively prove the control one person may exercise over a large assembly, even in cases of the utmost emergency. At the Court Theatre, whilst the audience filled every part of the building, an explosion took place upon the stage, and there can be no question that a frightful panic would instantly have ensued had not the Prince of Wales—to his honour be it said—come forward to the front of his box, and by his gestures pacified the people and restored order. In our "Foreign Notes" last month we read that the Opera House at Schwerin has been completely destroyed by fire, which broke out during the performance. The Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin addressed the audience, and implored them to disperse quietly; a wire curtain was lowered, in front of which the actors and singers appeared; and, thus reassured, every person left the house in perfect order, not one casualty being reported. Although in the latter of these cases only there was any real cause for alarm, the loss of life in each might have been equally great had a scene of confusion been created. There may not always be a Prince or a Duke present on such occasions to allay the fears of the audience. Whilst impressing lessees, therefore, with the importance of providing against these accidents, let us earnestly hope that they may confidently rely upon the public to aid them, by the calming influence of good example, in the prevention of anything which might raise a barrier to the facilities for exit.

EXPERIENCE has proved to us that, although as a rule a person thoroughly conversant with his art will modestly give his opinion upon the authenticity of a work, those with but a limited knowledge of the matter are never deterred by this fact from pronouncing judgment at once; and this not only in conversation, but in print. Doubts, for example, have recently been thrown upon the authorship of the composition popularly known as "Locke's Music to 'Macbeth,'" and many who have earned the right to speak on the subject give us the result of their researches in the public journals; but although the question is still under consideration by eminent artists, we constantly read authoritative announcements from anonymous concert critics in country papers that the music is by Locke, as if the debate were at once to be closed by such entirely unsupported opinions. Another instance has lately come before us. It may be remembered that some time ago in this journal a discussion was raised as to whether the work so long recognised as "Mozart's Twelfth Mass" is really by that composer; and many interesting communications resulted from this controversy. A correspondent now forwards us a Scotch paper, in which, speaking of the performance of the composition in question, the learned writer of the notice says: "On the whole, the Mass, which is certainly not Mozart's, though the name is too important, for publishing reasons evidently, to be taken away from it, is hardly worth the study of any Society of intelligence and taste." We should be sorry to believe that this critic could make such an assertion without being in the possession of facts hitherto unknown to prove it. But, apart from this, it does appear strange that, presuming the Mass not to be by Mozart, it should suddenly be discovered that it is "hardly worth the study of any Society of intelligence and taste." For our part—knowing the work tolerably well from years of study—we cannot but think it a great pity that, if Mozart were not the composer of it, the real author did not write another.

It is often asserted that one half of the world does not know what the other half is doing; but may it not be asserted with equal truth that one half the world does not know what the other half is saying? The manner in which, for example, musical opinion is shaping itself in this country is known to all, because not only journals devoted to the art are constantly before us; but we daily meet and converse with professional and amateur musicians who faithfully reflect the tone of English thought upon the subject. But only those who, like ourselves, constantly peruse the American papers, can form an idea of the rapid manner in which the critics on the other side of the Atlantic have decided upon the merits of all the new lights in musical composition, and how many have already devoted themselves to the task of extinguishing the old ones. In an article upon the Symphony, for instance, published in a journal professing to represent American opinion, after naming some of the modern Symphonic composers, we read: "Tschaiowsky, a Russian, is another of the new school of writers, a school which is justly supplanting the time-worn and obsolete, dry and unmusical methods of writing which are so essentially German, so unmistakably solid, and from which the divine afflatus is so painfully and conspicuously absent." As the author of this criticism admits that Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (and only this one) is of the "first rank," we may imagine that he does not consider this old-world composer entirely destitute of the "divine afflatus"; but since he afterwards says, "Our next step, perhaps, is in the direction of Mozowski, whose possibilities are so wonderful," it is evident that he cannot enlarge upon the merits of these two writers (whose claims to attention we fully admit) without disparaging the genius of the great men who have preceded them.

GREAT discredit has recently been thrown upon the term "drawing-room music," because works written to display the powers of the performer rather than of the composer are usually advertised with this heading. But it must be remembered that, in reality, "chamber music" means precisely the same thing, and we need scarcely remind our readers what a mine of wealth is comprehended under this title. Yet, thoroughly to enjoy this class of composition, it is absolutely essential that the space in which it is performed should be limited, so that the minute details of a work should be fully realised to the listeners; and it gives us much pleasure, therefore, to read that a series of "Drawing-room Concerts" has lately been given, where the highest classical music is played amidst luxurious surroundings. To carry out this object, a large room has been engaged and furnished as an elegant drawing-room, with comfortable lounges, thick carpet, small mirrors, flowers, and shrubs. A platform is placed in the centre of the room for the performers, and a brief interval for conversation is arranged, when tea and coffee are handed round. The organisation of this enterprise is undertaken by a committee, and the subscription is limited, so that the room is usually comfortably filled, and never crowded. The idea of combining social intercourse with the enjoyment of excellently performed music is one worthy of public encouragement. Nottingham has the honour of setting the example, and we already hear that other towns are likely to profit by it. In a concert-room without its stiffness and discomfort, and a drawing-room without its formality and frivolity, chamber music can be heard to the greatest advantage, and we are certain that all true lovers of the art will wish every success to the undertaking.

"THE NIBELUNG'S RING" AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT AT BAYREUTH
IN 1876.

HERR ANGELO NEUMANN had faith when he resolved to bring over from Germany principal artists, band, chorus, scenery, dresses, and appointments in quantity and quality sufficient for the representation of Wagner's trilogy at Her Majesty's Theatre. Such confidence, at a time when it may truly be said, "Things are not what they seem," is almost touching. I am told, and can well believe it, that £15,000 will do little more than cover the expenses of the enterprise. This is a large sum to entice from the pockets of London society at a time when the multifarious attractions of the summer season are in full force. Presumably Herr Neumann was told so with all the emphasis of friendship, but nothing can disabuse the foreign mind of a notion that the British purse-strings are always open, and that its gold is inexhaustible. The impresario seems, however, to have acted upon an idea yet more suggestive of a sanguine nature. Not only the inception of the enterprise itself, but the enormous prices of admission, show that Herr Neumann reckoned upon an overwhelming feeling of curiosity. He thought that our public would be treading upon each other's heels in their eagerness to get within hearing of the trilogy. His belief, we are bound to add, was not without a measure of justification. Artistic movements touch, in the first instance, classes limited as to number, but with unbounded opportunities of bringing their views and opinions into prominence. Thus it often happens that principles commanding few adherents acquire a publicity and excite a range and force of discussion such as cannot fail to convey a false idea of their real influence. That which is sometimes called "Wagnerism," and exemplified, not by "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser," but by "Der Ring des Nibelungen" and "Tristan und Isolde," affords a case in point. Few art matters have been more talked of or written about, yet the result of Herr Neumann's appeal to the curiosity thus excited shows how few were really possessed by it. "Wagnerism," as a matter provocative of active interest, has scarcely dawned upon the great mass even of so-called cultured society, while to the vast inert substratum it remains a name and nothing more, if indeed so much. Putting aside, therefore, all question of beauty and truth in Wagnerism—nay, assuming that it possesses both in a measure easily recognisable—Herr Neumann's venture was a foreordained loss. While certain of support from the few, it needed that of the many, but the many were indifferent or ignorant, and devoted to other things. Nevertheless, all who are interested for the art-credit of our country owe the German manager a debt which they could not discharge with coin if they would. He has brought the most remarkable work of modern times to our doors, and paid Englishmen the compliment of inviting their opinion upon a cultus which makes no profession of supplying "milk for babes."

Looking at the many and great responsibilities involved, and at the meritorious features in the performance, it seems ungracious to charge Herr Neumann with having exposed some weak points to the shafts of criticism. This, however, must be done. I am not going to set up a comparison between the Bayreuth representation six years ago and that at Her Majesty's Theatre. Such unreasonableness would only recoil upon myself. But I am entitled to discuss the points in which the recent performances fell below moderate expectation. Against the principal artists there is little or nothing to be said. They understood their work and did it more or less well. Per contra, the orchestra should never have been brought to England as the interpreter of an elaborate score, and for the sake of the Wagner Theatre at Berlin I trust there is some error in the statement that this band belongs to it. Some of the important wind instruments were coarsely played throughout, while the too few strings were poor in tone to a degree that made a proper orchestral effect out of the question. It is impossible to over-estimate the bad influence thus exercised upon the work and its performance. Far better would it have been to strengthen the orchestra at the expense of the stage than to follow the opposite course, since the former concentrates within itself all musical interest, and is at once the representative of Wagner's system and genius. We were led to expect the scenery and stage appointments used at Bayreuth, but very little of either excited reminiscences of 1876, and, as a matter of fact, much was left to desire, for those, at least, who are accustomed to the lavish outlay of our English stage. Foreigners who mount dramas in this country should be told that we are not exactly outer barbarians, but that in the matter of stage effects we hold our own against the world. This has made us fastidious, and inclined to smile where perhaps an entertainer from abroad would expect us to be impressed. On the whole, I cannot say that the "Nibelung's Ring" has been adequately put before the English public. It is a work fiercely intolerant of executive shortcomings, and herein, by the way, lies one element of the unpracticalness that must always impede the march of Wagner's trilogy.

My present duty does not include a full description of the plot, and an exhaustive discussion of the artistic principles involved in its musical and dramatic treatment. An attempt at this was made by me in THE MUSICAL TIMES for 1876, but it is more to the purpose perhaps that every London journal, daily and weekly, has recently printed column upon column of description. I assume, therefore, that readers of these lines know all that I could tell them as to matters of fact, and there only remains to comment upon certain questions that lie within the domain of opinion. The character and incidents of the story are naturally much debated—by some from the standpoint of public morality; by others from that of realistic truth. Among the former—if the egoism of the remark be permissible—I number myself. At the same time, I do not forget that Wagner wrote "Der Ring des Nibelungen" for Germans, and as an embodiment of a new German art. It is possible that even the peculiar Scandinavian-Icelandic-Germanic mixture presented in the great Festival Play commends itself to the patriotic Teuton for whom it was intended. On that point I have small right to speak, and absolutely none to assume the attitude of a critic. But when the trilogy, coming out of Germany, appeals to cosmopolitan taste, I am entitled to regard it from an extra-German point of view, and that state of things being in presence, I contend that the story is not edifying—barely, indeed, permissible. Wagner obviously invites comparison with the masterpieces of Greek drama, in which, as we all know, there are horrors enough. But Æschylus and Euripides wrote on matters intensely real to the public of their day, and always with some high moral purport which the audience had no difficulty in perceiving. The deities of Greek plays were Greek deities, and the plays themselves were illustrations, according to the prevailing light, of the ways of the gods to men; or their heroes were Greek heroes, the lesson of whose lives was preached without faltering or equivocation. Wagner's trilogy comes under conditions exactly the reverse. Its characters have to us no more substance than those of a shadow pantomime. They are far removed indeed; and belong to a time and to mental and moral conditions which preclude the idea of sympathy and even of human interest. The lesson of the story, moreover—and there is a lesson—is so obscured by the complexity of the means used to enforce it that the one is lost in the other. I can, of course, understand Wagner's choice of the subject, purposing, as he did, to create a great drama for Germany; but even with that object in view he should have acted upon his original intention and treated only the life of the hero, Siegfried. The moment he wandered from this central line into the maze of surrounding circumstances he began to weaken the lively interest that must ever attach itself to characters like our own Arthur, mythical though they be. It is further unfortunate that the moral atmosphere of the drama is offensive. I freely admit that Wagner could not "whitewash" his characters for the purpose of making them respectable; nor, having determined upon his subject, was it in his power to evade dealing with it truthfully and frankly. This has been strongly urged of late with particular reference to one scene, and I do not deny the logical character of the position taken up. But the real question for us is, not what comports with the state of the world under the rule of Wotan, but what is fit to be presented in public at a time when, rightly or wrongly, very different ideas prevail.

A noteworthy feature in the musical method of the "Nibelung's Ring" is that which studiously hinders the listener from forgetting the subject in its treatment. Many other lyric dramas deal with highly objectionable people, but in most cases it is possible to get away from the characters and incidents, and to have attention absorbed by the allied art. This may not be right in principle, though often agreeable in practice; nor am I prepared to say that Wagner is theoretically wrong when he strives for a more complete and essential union of music and drama. A complete and essential union, however, necessitates great care in the choice of a dramatic subject, which should be one fit at all points for musical treatment, and not less for contemplation at any and every moment. Whether the "Nibelung's Ring" meets this condition need hardly be discussed; the thing to be observed is that Wagner's system of representative themes, binding the orchestra down to the task of commenting upon, anticipating, or reviewing the action of the play, allows no release from its dramatic characters, incidents and motives. Were these unobjectionable, there would be, from a purely illustrative point of view, a distinct gain, but as matters stand one longs for an opportunity of, so to speak, going out of the action on the wings of music. That opportunity rarely comes, and, when it does, we have it in spite of Wagner's system rather than as a contemplated end. I am not sure that the musical method of the trilogy need be discussed from other and more familiar points of view. The subject has been well "thrashed" of late, and, besides, much of it lies within the domain of taste, where, as proverbial philosophy tells us, no room for controversy is found. I shall be more practical if I draw attention to one of the causes that will ever operate against the popularity of the work—namely, the excessive labour required for its intelligent and complete appreciation. The drama alone, owing to its enormous length and complicated action, demands careful study, but far more exacting than the drama is a system of musical treatment which absolutely requires as a preliminary step the committal to memory of nearly a hundred themes, and next exacts the power to recognise those themes when variously modified and brought into relations with each other. Waiving the point whether a composer has any right to load his audience with such obligations, I am very sure that his interest does not consist in doing so. He thereby limits the influence of his genius to a few, and becomes the victim of his own theories. It may be said that the "Nibelung's Ring" exemplifies the drama of the future, and was written, not for our age, but for another better able to meet its exactions. Possibly. I am no prophet, and will not presume to anticipate the lyric drama of a hundred years hence. But I know that human nature is a pretty constant factor in the problem of events, and that it must change considerably before accepting Wagner's application of music to lyric drama, with all the connected need to make a toil of pleasure.

Is it necessary here to admit the enormous talent shown by Wagner in carrying out his ideas? Surely not. The time has gone by for sneering at this man. We may condemn his principles as inimical to the best interests of art, but we must do so with profound respect for the ability with which they are enforced. For my own part I see in the music to the "Nibelung's Ring" a latter-day phenomenon—a fact as indicative of sturdy life in an age sometimes called limp, as of a restless striving after hitherto unattained good. The only cause for complaint and regret is that Richard Wagner's powerful faculties, controlled by an overwhelming self-consciousness, are devoted to the establishment of a new creed having no support in traditions sprung from the nature of things; no support in the practice of the greatest masters, and none anywhere save from quidnuncs, and those who approach the matter on the side of "philosophy, falsely so-called."

The first "cycle" began at Her Majesty's Theatre on Friday, the 5th ult., and there was a large, though not crowded, attendance of amateurs; the vast majority then making the acquaintance of the work for the first time. Because of reasons already stated these were placed at a disadvantage, from which we who had witnessed the Bayreuth representations were free. However, it is unlikely that shortcomings in the orchestra or on the stage much affected the general verdict. Wagner's work is of so pronounced a character that it cannot fail to be accepted or rejected for those broad features and fundamental principles which the nature of the performance affects little or not at all. I am entitled to say, at any rate, that the "Rhinegold" was heard with profound attention and, as far as could be gathered, in a judicial spirit. Indeed, a good deal of sympathy with the work and its performers was shown, the applause at times being hearty and general. In some well-informed—I will not say fanatical—quarters there may even have been enthusiasm, but, truth to tell, enthusiasm is not a plant which the "Rhinegold," especially as then given, readily fosters. Both argument and music in "Rhinegold" are less interesting than the argument and music of any other section of the work, while the absence of a character with which sympathy can be felt is a sensible drawback to enjoyment. As regards the music, Wagner seems to have been influenced unfavourably by the personages and incidents with which he had to deal. He would probably boast of this as in harmony with the principles upon which he works; and it is certainly true that he rises or sinks with the dramatic situation more faithfully than any composer who ever wrote for the stage. But the result is sometimes unpleasant in its action upon the audience, who find their companionship with a lot of objectionable beings, engaged in "ways that are dark and tricks that are mean," unrelieved by the charm of musical beauty. On the other hand, where Wagner's system does not admit this charm, it appeals to an intellectual perceptiveness the exercise of which certainly affords pleasure. There is always an interest at least in observing with what astonishing ingenuity and invariable propriety he introduces his "representative themes." But only a small minority of the audience who listened to the "Rhinegold" were able to look at the work from this point of view. The rest, we may declare without risk, did not recognise the themes when they heard them, were ignorant, therefore, of their applied meaning, and could only regard them as music pure and simple, which was not Wagner's intention. So it will be always with the majority; and in the end the fact will appear that the exigent nature of the master's system is one of the greatest hindrances to its adoption.

Coming to the performance of "Rhinegold," it will be assumed that we have to mention particular blemishes already indicated in a general way. The orchestra, from which a good deal was expected, proved at once inadequate to the heavy burdens laid upon it; the chief faults being the weakness of the strings and the uncertain intonation of some of the wind instruments, combined with a general lack of necessary precision. As for the mise-en-scène, it was terribly deficient. The view of Walhalla excited amusement, so badly was it painted; while the rainbow bridge would have been rejected by the manager of a transpontine theatre. I am sorry to speak thus with reference to a spirited and costly enterprise, but the truth must be told, especially as it has a distinct bearing upon the reception of the work in London. My task, as regards the principal artists, is more grateful, because most were efficient and some excellent. The Wotan of Herr Scaria had a certain ponderosity which, though it soon wearied, could not be set down as wanting accord with a character that holds a first rank among the solemn bores of the stage. Herr Otto Schelper played Alberich with a true perception of the character, and a resolve to present it in all its deformity. This was a real gothic creation—as grimly fantastic as any gargoyle ever evolved from the inner consciousness of a mediæval workman. The Fricka of Frau Reicher-Kindermann was not less remarkable for propriety; Fräulein Schreiber well filled the small but interesting part of Freia, and Herr Vogl was a Loge of the highest class. This artist's impersonation of the subtle Fire-god at Bayreuth, in 1876, made a deep impression, but he has since improved upon it, till now it ranks among the most finished efforts in lyric drama. Herr Vogl sings, or perhaps we should say declaims, as well as he acts, and altogether his performance will be long remembered. Herr Seidl conducted with vigour and such dexterity as the artists on the stage could best appreciate, so well did he accompany and sustain them in their trying task. I may add that the single long act of "Rhinegold" was divided into two, and that at each descent of the curtain the performers were recalled amid loud applause.

On the following night, "The Walkyrie" attracted a large audience, though the theatre was by no means full, and—ominous sign—there were a good many fresh faces to be seen in places deserted by their occupants of the previous evening. I repeat here that the comparatively uninteresting "Rhinegold," with its spun-out dialogues, opens the Festival Play badly by wearying those who have no special fund of enthusiasm or curiosity to draw upon. This is a misfortune all the greater, because the "Walkyrie," both as drama and music, secures and retains attention. It has plenty of varied action, some of the situations are powerful, and the music often makes a more direct appeal to feeling than the system upon which it is constructed allows elsewhere. I need hardly go into details for proof of all this, since the reader can easily recall the scene in Hunding's house; the touching interview of Brünnhilde and Siegmond; the dramatic climax of the fight between the Walsung and the man whose wife he had borne away, the exciting business of the Walkyrie rock, and the pathetic, though too long drawn out, parting of Wotan with his disobedient daughter. In each situation there is genuine interest, only one indefensible episode marring the pleasure of the looker-on. The result was that the audience heard without weariness, and the prospects of success for the "Nibelung's Ring" became bright. Let it be remarked here that the most attractive and interesting parts of the "Walkyrie" were those in which Wagner nearly approaches the ordinary musical form of lyric drama. I refer, of course, to the love duet in the first act, to that for Brünnhilde and Siegmond in the second, and to the Walkyrie chorus in the third. In each of these cases the music is subordinated to prolonged and well-marked feeling, and is worked out with fulness and power. It is not a question here of "motives" and their meaning, nor is the listener called upon for an active instead of a passive form of receptivity. His feelings are chords to which the music appeals, "moving all the man with secret art." Thus have the great masters worked, and therein lay their true vocation. Wagner often, perhaps unwittingly, illustrates the fact. The force of his artistic instinct sometimes overrides the claims of an artificial system, and makes him successful in spite of it. The performance of the "Walkyrie," if not uniformly good, had excellent features, chief among them the Brünnhilde of Frau Vogl, who more than justified her reputation as a Wagnerian artist. Frau Vogl is eminently picturesque in all she does. She uses the slow movement and frequent immobility of Germany's "new art" for the purpose of pleasing the eye by statuesque attitudes, and gestures of grace and dignity. I shall presently have to recur to this matter; but let it now be fully stated that Frau Vogl presented the character and declaimed the dialogue with a power and significance that the most obtuse must have perceived and admired. Her greatest effects were made in the interview with Siegmond and in the scene of Wotan's farewell. Nothing more beautiful and touching could be desired. Frau Reicher-Kindermann was again a capital Fricka, while Frau Sachs-Hofmeister played Sieglinde with rare passion and pathos. She made an interesting figure on the stage, and her singing throughout the so-called "love duet" was that of an artist. Herr Scaria once more bravely struggled with the thankless and depressing part of Wotan; Herr Niemann, with worn voice but grand artistic purpose, impersonated Siegmond; and Herr Wiegand, whose declamation could hardly be styled agreeable, was a rough Hunding. Against the good in all this must be placed the inefficiency of the orchestra, owing to want of precision and poverty of tone. The celebrated "Walkyrie Ride" was made almost of no effect by these causes, while, as regards stage-pictures, the contrast between Her Majesty's Theatre and Bayreuth could hardly have been greater. I should add that the audience were far more enthusiastic than on the "Rhinegold" night. They had reason so to be.

On Monday, the 8th ult., "Siegfried," the third part of the enormous drama, claimed attention from an audience prepared to enjoy its much-talked-of "forest music" and to make the acquaintance of the real hero of the story. Opinion may always be divided upon the question whether the "Walkyrie" or "Siegfried" deserves precedence on the score of dramatic and musical power, but I need not discuss that point here. In both there are masterful pages; and if "Siegfried" cannot compare with the "Walkyrie" for lyric charm, it makes up for the disadvantage by such splendid conceptions as the "Sword Song," and the exultant music attendant upon the awakening of Brünnhilde to life and love. These things and the forest scene give "Siegfried" the position it occupies in general esteem—a position hardly gained, because the advance to it is opposed by much of a depressing or repelling sort. The unpromising character of Wagner's work receives no fuller illustration than in "Siegfried." Take, for example, the long and dreary dialogue in which Wotan and Mime ask each other riddles; and take also the ludicrous combat with the talking Dragon, if that can be called a combat where one antagonist emits a harmless puff of steam from his mouth and then stands still to be butchered. How rude is all this! It carries us back to the age of the miracle-plays, and assumes that the world is as childish now as undoubtedly it was then. Happily the personality of Siegfried runs through the work, and we can take refuge from burlesque and pantomime in that grand and fearless hero. Happily, too, it brings us once again face to face with Brünnhilde, in whom we see spring up a woman's tender graces and supreme devotion, to take the place of the harsher attributes of the godhood she has lost. In these two characters lies the charm of the play, and only they are able to command respect by the nobility of their actions and the innocence of their motives. Against the background of disreputable gods and monsters, Siegfried and Brünnhilde stand out for wearied eyes to rest upon with pleasure. Fittingly, therefore, has Wagner given them some of his finest music. The "Sword Song" is all palpitating life and heroic exultation; the music to Siegfried's self-communings in the forest breathes poetry and grace, while the final duet ranks among the most intense expressions of emotion that art can show. For such things much weariness and indifference can be endured, and to them was owing the cordial appreciation shown by most of the audience. Merit and demerit marked the performance in about the usual measure. Again the mise-en-scène was inadequate, and the orchestra poor; failing conspicuously, moreover, in the "Waldweben" music, which those who heard it then for the only time cannot, in one sense, be said to have heard at all. On the other hand, most of the principal characters were well represented, three of them standing out conspicuous for excellence. I refer to the Brünnhilde of Frau Vogl, the Mime of Herr Schlösser, and the Siegfried of Herr Vogl. The first was most artistic in the scene of the awakening; the delight of a return to life and to a sight of the sun and the glowing world being beautifully expressed. Frau Vogl's triumph here and throughout the following love-scene was mainly dramatic. Her action was impassioned yet natural, while her attitudes, set off by exceedingly skilful management of ample white drapery, could not fail to please an artistic eye. I shall set up no comparison between Frau Vogl and Frau Materna, the Brünnhilde of Bayreuth, but it is certain that the part now has two representatives who are competent to the task it involves. Herr Schlösser had thankless work on hand. Mime is not a delectable personage, nor one adapted to excite an artist's enthusiasm. Herr Schlösser played it, nevertheless, with the minutest care for even the most repulsive detail, and I am disposed to regard his Mime as the greatest impersonation of the cycle. Not only was the Nibelung put bodily before the eye, but all his low cunning, his cowardice, and his mental crookedness appeared with equal clearness to the mind. In fact the embodiment claimed, as in 1876, rank among dramatic triumphs. The Siegfried of Bayreuth exceeded in bodily height him of Her Majesty's Theatre, and would be called a "finer man," but Herr Georg Unger has, in other respects, no advantage over Herr Heinrich Vogl, who played throughout with rare spirit and dignity. He delivered the Sword Song in splendid style, but, as a vocal artist, was heard to best advantage in the scene with Brünnhilde. Here there was singing to be done, and Herr Vogl rose to the occasion, showing himself qualified for the lyric stage by more than pronounced histrionic powers. Herr Scaria appeared for the third time as Wotan (Der Wanderer), Herr Schelper continuing the part of Alberich, and Fräulein Reigler that of Erda. The reception of "Siegfried" by a majority of the audience was decidedly favourable, loud applause attending each fall of the curtain.

"Götterdämmerung" followed, on Tuesday, the 9th ult., and with it the first cycle of the great drama came to an end. Events in this concluding section reach a crisis, and, save a few episodes like the conference of the Norns in the prologue, and Siegfried's long story in the last act, they move briskly, exciting keener and more varied dramatic interest than usual. Indeed, the libretto of "Götterdämmerung," some portions excepted, might commend itself to Verdi or any other melodramatic writer for the lyric stage, so striking in character and broad in treatment are the principal scenes. Yet it is by no means agreed that the music of "Götterdämmerung" stands on the same level as that of "Die Walküre" or "Siegfried"; popular taste inclining naturally to the strains in which Wagner has expressed the most poetic ideas of his story. The "Dusk of the Gods" affords no such opportunity as the tender and touching scenes of its predecessors. It is full of dark passion or darker treachery from beginning to end, relieved only by the self-sacrifice which brings the whole to a tragic close. Yet if we look away from emotional experiences to the structure of the music, it will be found that "Götterdämmerung" affords a more surprising example of Wagner's system and Wagner's skill than any of the preceding sections. Each act increases the number of "representative themes," and, in an equal ratio, the difficulty of weaving them into the musical texture. But Wagner triumphs easily. The more this extraordinary man has to do, the better he does it, till, in Siegfried's death-march, he contrives to present a complete retrospect of the hero's life by means of a piece of music which, even abstractedly considered, is profoundly impressive. From the point of view of Wagner's system, therefore, "Götterdämmerung" is most interesting. But it happens that the system does not contemplate exclusively the natural employment of music, and the skill shown in this specimen of it is by consequence not likely to meet with wide appreciation. The work suffers also from its enormous length. Knowing what we do of Wagner's inflexible adherence to his theory of epicfulness, there is nothing surprising in the Norn scene, that of Waltraute with Brünnhilde, or that of Alberich with Hagen, which delay rather than advance the action. But, from a practical point of view, the introduction of these episodes is a mistake. And, after all, the loftiest art must keep an eye on the lowly ground of the practical. Even in such matters it is possible to "kick against the pricks," with the usual result of wounds for the kicker. Many of the remarks made about the performance of previous sections apply to that of "Götterdämmerung"; and, were I to be minute, I should have once again to speak of an inefficient orchestra and a mise-en-scène leaving much to desire. There is, however, no need to be minute, nor, perhaps, does justice demand persistent reference to shortcomings which, under the circumstances, were easily anticipated. It was no light matter to bring the "Nibelung's Ring" to London from Germany, and, while regretting drawbacks, it is possibly easy to excuse them. Coming to the principal artists, Frau Vogl followed up her success as Brünnhilde, and brought it to a splendid climax in the scene where the heroine sacrifices herself and restores the fatal gold to its original guardians. The lady's performance throughout impressed by its picturesque character as well as by its sustained and powerful display of feeling. Her declamation always went to the point, and her grasp of every situation proclaimed, in loudest tones, the great artist whom it was an honour as well as a pleasure to have amongst us. That the husband's Siegfried proved worthy of the wife's Brünnhilde need hardly be insisted on. Herr Vogl again commanded admiration by his spirited and appropriate embodiment of the hero, whose native grandeur of soul appeared in all he did. Nothing could be better than the relation of Siegfried's story in the last act. Something of sadness, like the shadow of doom, clouded its frank and unsuspecting utterance. After the two Vogls came, longo intervallo, the representatives of Gutrune, Gunther, and Hagen; but more noticeable, perhaps, than even the embodiment of these important characters were the appearance and work of the chorus, now for the first time introduced. What a relief came with the sonorous voices of Gunther's men all who were present must recollect. And the men not only sang but acted well. They were among the dramatis personæ; entering into the situation, one and all, like trained actors. There were times, unfortunately, when Wagner kept them silent, though they might have spoken, but their grouping and general stage-bearing materially heightened the effect. At the close of the play long and loud applause brought on to the stage not only the leading artists, but the conductor, Herr Seidl, to whom much of the success achieved under circumstances not altogether favourable, was fairly due.

The second cycle began, with certain changes in the cast, on the 12th ult.; the third on the 19th, and the fourth on the 25th. There was not an increasing audience, and it is to be feared that Herr Neumann's spirited enterprise has ended in a serious loss. Looking away from the artistic principles involved we must all regret this. Englishmen are admirers of "pluck," and sometimes favour those who show it even when they doubt the justice of their cause. That there are some amongst us who reject Wagner's theory as destructive is beyond question, but these are no less sensible than others of an obligation to Herr Neumann, and of sorrow that the result of his venture has not proved such as he had hoped.

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

THE performances of German Opera announced to be given at Drury Lane Theatre under the joint directorship of Messrs. Franke and Pollini began very auspiciously on Thursday, the 18th ult., with "Lohengrin." Expectation ran high as regards what was to be done, mainly on account of Herr Hans Richter, who, it was felt, would never associate his name with an enterprise unworthy of the reputation he has gained in this country. The Viennese conductor acted as a tower of strength to the project. There were people, no doubt, who went to hear his orchestra play "Lohengrin" and were but slightly concerned as to anything else. These were rewarded; but the representation was above the average of merit all round, and won the admiration of a house which, if not absolutely crowded with amateurs, was well filled and remarkably appreciative. The excellence of the performance, when analysed, is found made up of two fine impersonations and a careful ensemble. The Opera has, no doubt, been better cast on the Italian stage. The Elsa of Madame Albani, for instance, is a superb effort, while we have had representatives of Telramund and Ortrud with whom those at Drury Lane could not compare. But never before in our experience has "Lohengrin" been so evenly played. There was no point of decided weakness, from the prima donna to the "super" who—mirabile dictu—took a lively rather than a languid interest in the business before him. The "super" or, at any rate, the chorus-singer may typify the distinctive merit of the performance, because he had been trained to act, instead of standing about for the mere purpose of giving the music the benefit of his voice. What an effect this had in "Lohengrin" is easy to imagine. The stage seemed to gain immeasurably in life and interest; nor can it be said that what was won to the drama was lost to the music, since every chorus went well, and some numbers, notably the vocal part of the processional march, with more point and significance than we had ever before observed. While on this topic we may add that the stage pictures were adequate, if not remarkable. More beautiful scenery and more elaborate dresses have been seen elsewhere, but there was no serious lack in either respect nor any cause to complain. The two excellent impersonations already spoken of were Herr Winkelmann's Lohengrin and Frau Sucher's Elsa. Than the first-named we had never seen a better. Tall and comely, of dignified bearing, and gifted with a fine voice, Herr Winkelmann was a model Knight of the Swan, as doubtless he will be a model Parsifal in the forthcoming representations of Wagner's new Opera at Bayreuth. On her part, Frau Sucher added another to the list of admirable Elsas whom we have known in this country. She looks the character well and is graceful to an uncommon degree. Her conception of the part, too, is dramatically adequate and, in working out, highly poetic, while she sings the music, if not with the ease and finish of some artists trained in the Italian school, with a power and significance rarely found off the stage of Germany. With such a knight and such a lady the cast could hardly be other than adequate, for their excellence would have made good no little demerit. There remains, however, to speak of a very dramatic Ortrud in Frau Garso-Dely, for whose voice the music was sometimes too high; and a good Telramund in Herr Dr. Kraus. The accompaniments were generally well played by Herr Richter's excellent orchestra, an exception being noticeable in the Prelude, which we have heard given with greater delicacy. Among the audience enthusiasm reigned throughout the evening.

"Der Fliegende Holländer" was played on Saturday, the 20th ult., but not with the success which attended "Lohengrin." To this result various causes contributed. The mise-en-scène, always difficult, not to say risky, scarcely came up to the desired mark, and the representative of the Dutchman, Herr Eugen Gura, carried out a little too conscientiously the idea of a curse-laden man, forlorn, lugubrious, and despairing. We do not think it absolutely necessary to surround the Dutchman with such unbroken gloom, though the fault, if so it be, is one on the right side. Allowance should be made for the feelings of the audience in all cases where that can be done without absolutely doing violence to an author's conception. The Senta of Frau Sucher did not equal in interest her Elsa, but was attractive nevertheless, and peculiarly meritorious on account of the equal merit shown in acting and singing. After it, in point of general attraction, should be placed Herr Wolff's Erik. Herr Wolff sang the pretty music of the lover with much taste and effect. Concerning the Daland of Herr Ehrke and the Steersman of Herr Landau little need be said, but much might be written regarding Herr Richter and his fine orchestra, who revelled apparently in the stormy and picturesque music they had to play. On the whole, the performance of "Die Fliegende Holländer" did not equal that of "Lohengrin," but the opportunity to make good what was thereby lost soon came.

On Tuesday, the 23rd ult., "Tannhäuser" supplied the opportunity just mentioned, its representation being quite as good as that of the companion work on the opening night. In some respects it was even better, both Frau Sucher (Elisabeth) and Herr Winkelmann (Tannhäuser), making grand use of occasions that demanded all their powers. A better Elisabeth we have not seen. The lady acted throughout with immense dignity and feeling, and sang with a purity of style and truth of intonation that left little to wish for. Her success with the audience was proportionately great. Frau Sucher, indeed, is fast becoming a public favourite, and that on grounds which cannot be impugned. The same might be said of Herr Winkelmann, whose Tannhäuser was, besides vocally excellent, worked out as a dramatic character with singular force and skill. We have seen the part played more demonstratively—by Herr Schott for instance—but not with greater point and incisiveness. Herr Winkelmann became more and more impressive as the drama went on, till in the final scene he presented an ideal of the broken-down, despairing victim of passion. The secondary parts were, on the whole, well sustained; Wolfram, by Herr Gura; Walther, by Herr Landau; Heinrich, by Herr Wolff; Biterolf, by Herr Ehrke; the Landgraf, by Herr Koegel; and Venus, by Fräulein Weidemann. Concerning the chorus and stage management we have again to speak with commendation, while the perfect manner in which the orchestra did its work can hardly be praised enough. Herr Richter has not yet presented us with anything better.

"Fidelio" was given on Wednesday, the 24th ult., with a result to which we shall take another opportunity of referring.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

SINCE our last notice of this establishment, Madame Fursch-Madi has materially increased her reputation by her fine performance of the heroine in Verdi's "Aida," in which Opera also Mdle. Stahl made her début as Amneris. The new-comer has a very fair mezzo-soprano voice which, although hard in some portions of the register, she seems to have well under her control. In passages of declamation she was highly successful, and her appearance and bearing upon the stage are much in her favour. As Federico, in "Mignon," she has since shown considerable histrionic as well as vocal power; and there can be little doubt that she will prove a valuable acquisition to the company. The first appearance of M. Lestellier as Guglielmo, in the last-named Opera, has also to be recorded. With a light tenor voice and a decided French method of vocalism he created but slight effect; in other parts more sympathetic with his style, however, he may yet win his way to a good position. It is needless to record the cordial reception of Madame Patti and Madame Albani, who have appeared in some of their best characters during the month; but much interest attaches to the announcement of Madame Pauline Lucca's rentrée as Carmen, and also to that of the engagement of Madame Christine Nilsson, who will sustain the two parts of Marguerite and Helen, in Boito's Opera "Mefistofele."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THIS Society ended its fiftieth year, and its existence, on April 28, when Handel's "Solomon" was given, with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Adela Vernon, Madame Patey, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Burgon as principal singers. The performance need not keep us from touching at once upon more important matter. Enough that it was above the average in point of merit, the splendid choruses being, as a rule, well rendered, and the solos, more especially those allotted to Madame Patey and Mr. Guy, giving marked satisfaction. Unquestionably the event of the evening next in importance after the Society's valediction was Sir Michael Costa's reappearance in the conductor's seat. It is always the unexpected that happens. When, some time before, news went round that Sir Michael had been suddenly stricken down, it was thought that the bâton had fallen permanently from his hand. But the public reckoned without the patient's strength of constitution and force of will. Quickly rallying, and bracing himself up for a supreme effort, Sir Michael saw the last of his old Society, and presided with dignity over what we may call its funeral service. How hearty a welcome he received we need hardly stop to tell. Round after round of applause filled St. James's Hall with noise as the Conductor moved to his accustomed place. It was at once an expression of rejoicing over a recovery, and recognition of useful work carried on through long years. These demonstrations were renewed and intensified at the close of the oratorio, but they had no longer an exclusively personal application. Thoughts of the Society then arose, and audience and performers cheered each other, making use of inarticulate sounds to express feelings which perhaps could not well have been put into words. Regret no doubt prevailed, mingled with a shade of resentment, for in many minds the idea still lurks that, with proper management, the Society need not have been broken up, and fifty years of active and fruitful existence permitted to end in a confession of failure.

Is the place of the Sacred Harmonic Society to be filled or left shamefully vacant? An answer, as yet indefinite but hopeful, reaches us in the form of a prospectus for reconstituting the association as a limited company, "no for profit," with a capital of £10,000 in as many £1 shares; half the amount subscribed for to be paid on allotment. We understand that some twenty gentlemen connected with the old Society have formed themselves into a committee for the purpose of floating this enterprise, themselves guaranteeing the preliminary expenses. Now, therefore, the public will have an opportunity of showing that their regret at the death of the late institution is a genuine and practical feeling. The scheme of the new company, as far as it appears in the prospectus, seems to us well devised. Its objects are public performances, with a preference for the acknowledged masterpieces of oratorio; the undertaking of musical arrangements for festivals and other reunions; and the assisting of local musical associations by the loan of copies, &c., on moderate terms. To these ends it is proposed to govern the Society through a council of amateurs, elected by the shareholders, and it will be the duty of this body to apply the whole income and property of the Society to the furtherance of its various purposes. Of course much depends on the wisdom with which the new Society's rules are carried out, but we see no reason why it should not succeed under sensible guidance, and we see plenty why the music-lovers in our great metropolis should find the £10,000 forthwith. Should they button up their pockets and refuse, they will bring upon us all what the Daily News rightly calls a "national disgrace."

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE most interesting of the three Saturday Concerts which fall under our present notice was given on April 29. It was at this Concert that Madame Sophie Menter was, for the first time, heard at the Crystal Palace. The work she had selected for the occasion was characteristic of the style of music she represents in an eminent degree, being Liszt's Concerto in E flat, perhaps the most popular of that master's compositions, although scarcely equal in poetic beauty to the Concerto in A. Liszt has, in a certain sense, invented a new style of pianoforte music, and he also has trained the artists to execute it. Most modern pianists of eminence are indeed more or less influenced by him, and a great many others try to imitate his manner without always comprehending his meaning. The title of "élève de Liszt" has become typical; every rising genius to whose playing the good-natured master has listened for half an hour immediately counts himself amongst his "favourite pupils." As to Madame Menter's claim to that distinction there cannot be the slightest doubt; intrinsic reasons would be sufficient to establish the point, even if external evidence were wanting. Madame Menter's technical perfection is as phenomenal as the power and fulness of her tone. She belongs essentially to the impressionistes, if that term of pictorial art may be applied to music. She dazzles her audience by the brilliancy of her playing; her bravura is unequalled, and with it she combines a neatness and accuracy not always found in conjunction with it. What one occasionally misses is the tenderness and intensity of feeling which in Liszt and in Rubinstein go together with the more showy qualities of the virtuoso. In consequence the first and final movements of the Concerto were more successful than the quasi Adagio which intervenes, and which with its tender Chopin-like arpeggios requires the utmost delicacy of touch. Madame Menter, in short, is the pianist for large concert-halls and enormous orchestras; in a drawing-room she would be overpowering. At the same concert the orchestral arrangement of Gounod's "Royal Wedding March," composed for the marriage of the Duke of Albany, was played for the first time. Of the general character of the work the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES are aware. Suffice it to add that the orchestral arrangement is skilfully made, the melody of the "National Anthem" (without which, to the foreign mind, any piece of music destined for England would be incomplete) being effectively emphasised by three trombones.

In May only three Concerts were given, the last too late for our present notice. At the first Mr. D'Albert played the first movement of his Pianoforte Concerto. After the entire work had been heard at the Richter Concerts, there seemed little reason for producing a fragment of it at the Crystal Palace; and the only interesting feature of the performance was the admirable playing of the young composer, who has returned from his Vienna triumph a stronger man and a better pianist, his tone having gained the fulness which previously it lacked. Mr. D'Albert was received with every mark of favour. Herr Betz, the famous Berlin singer, who appeared at the same concert, would have been better employed at Her Majesty's Theatre, his Wotan (well-remembered from Bayreuth) being infinitely superior to that of either of the two gentlemen who have enacted the supreme god of Teutonic mythology under Herr Neumann's auspices.

At the Concert on the 13th ult. Mlle. Vera Timanoff gave an excellent rendering of Liszt's "Ruins of Athens" Fantasia, and the orchestra played a seventh movement which Rubinstein has added to his "Ocean" Symphony, as if six were not enough.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE fifth concert of the season was given on the 11th ult., before an exceptionally numerous audience. A great attraction in the programme was the performance of Weber's incidental music to "Preciosa," the adaptation of which for concert-room purposes is one of the many signs of the day that good works will not be suffered to fade away, even when not presented in their original form. On this occasion the verses descriptive of the action of the play were well recited by Mr. S. Brandram, and the charmingly melodious and dramatic music received an adequate rendering, Miss Santley giving the Gipsy's song with a simple grace which elicited the warmest applause, and the choruses being most ably sung throughout. Signor Sgambati, who made his first appearance in this country, gave so excellent an interpretation of his own Pianoforte Concerto in G minor as to ensure a highly favourable verdict both upon himself and his work. He comes with a good reputation from Rome where, as a boy, he played Beethoven's Sonatas in spite of the apathy of the Italians for this class of music. With a violin-player named Pinelli he also instituted Chamber Concerts, the audiences of which were almost exclusively confined to German and American visitors. The fact that Signor Sgambati's father was an Italian and his mother a German may perhaps account for a slight mixture of styles in his Concerto; but on the whole the work leaves an impression that the composer has not slavishly followed any model. The first movement, although somewhat diffuse, contains much clever writing; but the "Romance" and last movement are decidedly the best. In the "Romance" we have a charming melody, and where the theme is given to the orchestra the pianoforte surrounds it with some exceedingly delicate and graceful embellishments. The Rondo Finale is extremely brilliant, the passages for the pianoforte taxing the powers of the executant to the utmost. The composer, however, who is a pupil of Liszt, proved himself thoroughly equal to the occasion, and he was rewarded by loud and well-won applause. The singing of Madame Christine Nilsson in Mozart's "Mi tradi" and Schubert's Serenade was of the highest order; and the programme also included Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," and some short pianoforte solos by Signor Sgambati. The concert was ably conducted by Mr. Cusins.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

FOUR of these Concerts have been given since our last number appeared, and the works performed at them invite more extended observations than the exigencies of space will allow. We must be satisfied to touch upon those points around which gathered the leading interest of the various occasions. At the first Concert (on the 3rd ult.) familiar things like Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," the Overtures to "Tannhäuser" and "Der Freischütz," and the "Eroica" Symphony were accompanied by Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (Op. 70), Mr. Eugene D'Albert taking the solo instrument, and making his first appearance since visiting Vienna under Herr Richter's auspices. The Concerto will always call forth various opinions. Like most of the Russian master's larger works, it is unequal in point of merit, having its moments of undoubted inspiration, and its other moments when the flight of Herr Rubinstein's genius is low and laboured. The slow movement made, as usual, the greatest effect, and was heard with genuine interest. Mr. D'Albert played with immense spirit and facility. He has yet much to learn, for it cannot be said of an executive artist as of a poet, "nascitur, non fit." There is, however, plenty of time before him, and if he uses it well he may, in the days to come, shine no less as a pianist than as a composer. The audience at this Concert was fairly large, and quite appreciative of every good thing.

The second Concert (8th ult.) introduced Tschaiakowsky's Violin Concerto in D. With a Russian work it was fitting that there should be a Russian artist, and one of that nationality appeared in the person of Gospodin Adolf Brodsky. We cannot refer to the Concerto in terms of unqualified admiration. It is long, pretentious, and entitled to boast of certain original features, but of genius to correspond we do not see precisely an adequate measure. The deficiency is not unusual in our day, when composers have an idea that it is possible by excessive elaboration, and by use of what may be called the mechanism of art, to make up for a deficiency of the subtle spirit which cannot be manufactured, and evades analysis. Gospodin Brodsky is an artist who has mastered the technicalities of his profession. He plays well, and nothing, as far as execution goes, comes amiss to him. In cantabile and bravura he is equally at home, the only thing desirable yet wanting being a fuller and better quality of tone. This may come with a finer instrument; meanwhile the Russian artist is distinctly worthy of applause such as he received from the Richter audience. In the programme of this Concert, and calling for no more than mention, were Beethoven's Symphony in A, Handel's Suite in D, Wagner's "Faust" Overture, and a solo from the "Meistersinger," finely delivered by Herr Betz, of the Berlin Opera.

At the third Concert (18th ult.) Dvorák's Symphony in D, not long before produced at the Crystal Palace, occupied the post of honour. To the criticism which appeared in our last number nothing need be added; and there only remains to say that Herr Richter gave his somewhat scanty audience a very fine reading of a work that cannot fail to interest every musician. The scena "Softly sighs," from "Der Freischütz," and a prelude and fugue of Bach, for violin alone, followed Dvorák; the one sung by Madame Marie Roze, the other played by Herr Rappoldi. This gentleman is not an impassioned artist. He executes his music with the stolidity, but also with the correctness, of a machine. In the fugue the stolidity did not matter, whereas the correctness did, and very astonishing correctness we found it. It would be hard to find another violinist able to render the work in so technically faultless a manner. The Concert ended with Brahms's "German Requiem," about the performance of which we cannot use congratulatory terms. To say sooth, the chorus was bad, and the orchestra by no means free from blemish. The result was great disappointment, for many had looked forward to hearing the work as never before.

In the programme of the fourth Concert (22nd ult.) were the new "Venusberg" music to "Tannhäuser," the "Siegfried" Idyl, Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, and his Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, together with some vocal music intrusted to Frau Sucher, of the German company, Drury Lane. Upon these familiar things there is no need to dwell. Herr Oscar Beringer played the great Concerto brilliantly, if not with any special interpretive merit, and the purely orchestral pieces were given with an admirable ensemble under Herr Richter's seldom-failing bâton.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A SERIES of Concerts under this name, and affecting to be a continuation of the Richter Concerts, commenced in St. James's Hall on the 1st ult. Why their actual first season appears as nominally the fourth arises from the circumstance that the joint managers of the Richter Concerts, as given last year and previously, having agreed to part company, both claimed credit as legitimate successors to the old business. In this matter Herr Franke appears to have had the best of it. Herr Richter went with him, taking over, of course, his name; and Messrs. Schultz-Curtius were reduced to the somewhat barren expedient above indicated. The matter is, perhaps, of no public interest, but deserves mention as explaining an active opposition which cannot fail to injure both parties. We see the result already in thin attendances, not only at the Symphony Concerts, but at those of the rival enterprise.

With Mr. Hallé's Manchester Orchestra, and Mr. Hallé himself as Conductor, Messrs. Schultz-Curtius had no difficulty in arranging a series of very interesting performances, intended, as the programmes already show, to display the solid merits of the classical school against those of a newer cult exhibited elsewhere. The managers, however, do not set their faces entirely in opposition to contemporary composers of an "advanced" type. At the first Concert, for instance, they produced Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in G major (No. 3), with Madame Sophie Menter—a very highly developed pianist indeed—to play it. The work is not new to English audiences, and there seems a likelihood that it will sooner or later be accepted as good. On this point our amateurs are rather slow to arrive at a decision, which can only be hastened by frequently placing the music before them. Rubinstein's Concerto assuredly gains by repeated hearing, that which was at first obscure becoming clear, and that which seemed fragmentary assuming a definite organisation and shape. Madame Menter helped this process by her very able performance, such a one as even the composer himself would have applauded. Unhappily there were but few people to hear and admire. With the Concerto were given Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and last—but how far from least!—the Choral Symphony, with Madame Anna Williams, Miss Orridge, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley as soloists. The great work tried the mettle of orchestra and chorus severely, but the ordeal was passed with success, the performance deserving to rank among the best ever heard in London. This fact alone served to inaugurate the new Concerts with all needful distinction.

The second performance (the 12th ult.) was made interesting by Schubert's great Symphony in C (No. 9), and by Beethoven's Music to Goethe's "Egmont," given in connection with a recitation of the "argument" and some portions of the dialogue. A better rendering of the Symphony we cannot call to mind. It was marked by extreme refinement, and, when needful, great power; while obviously nothing had been left to hazard or the whim of individual performers. One single mind and taste dominated the execution of the work, and the credit of the result both leader and followers were entitled to share. The "Egmont" Overture made its usual impression, but the interludes and entr'actes soon became wearisome, not through any fault of their own, but because the recitation of the dialogue by Mr. Clifford Harrison reflected on them some of its own dullness. The task of a reciter on such occasions is always difficult, since in a majority of cases he has to move the dead weight of an audience's indifference. Care should therefore be taken to employ a man equal to the task. Other selections in the programme were the Overture to "Euryanthe," the great scena from "Oberon"—finely sung by Frau Sachse-Hofmeister, of the "Nibelungen" company—and Svendsen's fifth Norwegian Rhapsody, with which original work the Concert ended.

The programme of the third Concert, the 18th ult., included among its selections Cherubini's "Medea" Overture, Dvorák's "Slavische Rhapsodie" in D, the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, and Berlioz' Overture "Carnaval Romain." This was undoubtedly a feast of orchestral good things, and worthy of any guest. The items are, however, too well known to require comment here, and may pass with a word of praise for a very careful and efficient rendering. On this occasion Herr Vogl sang songs by Brahms and Handel, so as to show—what could only be surmised in the "Nibelung's Ring"—that he is a vocal artist of high culture. In adding that the present series of Concerts is given for the benefit of the Royal College of Music, we may point out that the fourth programme, to be performed on the 8th inst., will contain the whole of Schumann's "Faust." Amateurs ought not to lose the opportunity, now first promised in England, of hearing this work in its entirety.

MR. GANZ'S CONCERTS.

THE second Concert of the present series took place in St. James's Hall on the 6th ult., and was attended by a large audience, who had set before them a programme mainly composed of classical works. Some of these it will suffice to name: Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas," Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor (No. 4), Schubert's Symphony in C (No. 9), and Weber's Overture to "Eury-anthe." Mr. Ganz is fond of introducing novelty, but in this instance he gave himself up to old favourites, and, as usual, they repaid the selection by making the Concert enjoyable to every taste. The pianist was Herr Ernst Loewenberg, a meritorious artist, who established his right to be heard as an exponent of Beethoven by playing with equal intelligence and technical skill. Better performances of the purely orchestral works must have occurred to the audience, as sundry slipshod passages attracted notice; but, all things considered, there was not much room for serious fault, especially as we may assume the energies of conductor and orchestra to have been centred upon Liszt's Symphony to Dante's "Divina Commedia," which, played at the previous Concert, was announced for repetition at the next. The proceedings were relieved by some short pianoforte solos, and by the singing of Miss Agnes B. Huntingdon.

Our idea that the "Divina Commedia" should be played again was carried out more speedily than we ventured to anticipate, but it does not appear that further acquaintance materially affected the general verdict upon its merits. The "Purgatory" and "Paradise" gain upon acquaintance, but to the majority the "Inferno" is made more revolting. Surely here, if anywhere, music is carried out of its province, and reduced to the rank of burlesque. At this Concert a Russian pianist, M. Vladimar de Pachmann, made his début with Chopin's Concerto in F minor, playing also pieces by Haydn, Field and Liszt. M. de Pachmann made a decidedly favourable impression, and justified the honours he has recently enjoyed in Paris. He plays with great fluency and command over the resources of the instrument, but we must, of course, hear him in a leading pianoforte classic before venturing to give a precise estimate of his powers. M. de Pachmann will probably be satisfied to have excited genuine interest, and obtained very warm applause at the outset of his career in England.

SOUTH LONDON CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

A CONCERT was given by this Society in St. James's Hall on the 2nd ult., the programme being almost exclusively composed of English music, sacred and secular. The selections showed a decidedly eclectic taste, comprising as they did several numbers of Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," parts of Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," Macfarren's "John the Baptist," and Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," as well as anthems by Gibbons and Goss. In the second part was a lengthy array of songs, part-songs, &c., all well known, and therefore calling, no more than did the sacred pieces, for present remark. The important point to notice was the singing of the choir, so well trained and conducted by Mr. Venables. This gave almost unqualified satisfaction, and exemplified some of the finest features of good choral work. The voices were well balanced, of fair quality, and thoroughly under the control of the bâton. In fact, better chorus-singing need not be looked for than that of the transpontine amateurs. The audience, at any rate, were well content, and applauded with exceeding warmth. With soloists such as Miss Mary Davies, Madame Fasset, and Mr. Edward Lloyd, it may be supposed that the Concert did not want for interest of a personal as well as artistic nature.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

At the last Concert of the season, on the 1st ult., a new Cantata entitled "Alfred," by the Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, was produced, and achieved a decisive and well-merited success. It would be unjust to the author of the libretto, Mr. William Grist, to ignore his share in this result, for we have rarely met with a story better laid out for musical setting. He has very wisely confined himself to the relation of the incident of the visit of the King to the Danish camp in the disguise of a harper, and the well-known events which followed—the introduction of his betrothed, Alswitha, forming an agreeable relief from the necessarily warlike tone which colours the greater part of the work. In the music of this Cantata Mr. Prout has made a decided advance upon "Hereward," into the choruses of which he evidently threw his great strength. "Alfred," on the contrary, although containing some effective and well-planned choruses, is distinguished by solo music of remarkable merit, amongst which must be mentioned the songs of the rivals in the Danish camp (which are not only extremely melodious, but excellently contrasted), the air of Alswitha, "There is a dream," and the scena for Alfred, "Forest of Selwood," which is full of unexaggerated dramatic power. The choruses are by no means elaborate, but in every one the composer has evidently resolved rather to give sympathetic expression to the words than to show his skill in defiance of them. The chorus of Saxons, "Weary and war-wasted," deserves especial mention for its truthful musical setting throughout; and, did our space permit, we might cite many others which received a warm and thoroughly deserved recognition from the audience. It is impossible to speak too highly of the charming instrumentation of this work—observable not only in the delicate light and shade of the solo parts, but in the rich glow of colour which adds such intensity to the choral portions, many of which seem to call for the aid of stage accessories for the full realisation of their effect. A Triumphal March, too (the only purely orchestral movement in the work), claims notice, both from its intrinsic excellence and the skilful manner in which the instruments are treated. The composer has a right to congratulate himself upon having secured the services of Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. F. King, all of whom exerted themselves to the utmost to ensure the success of the Cantata. The chorus-singing was in every respect as perfect as could be desired, even by Mr. Prout, who must indeed have laboured hard to gain such accuracy. At the conclusion of the performance the composer was called forward and received quite an ovation. The remainder of the programme comprised Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Beethoven's Scena, "Ah perfido," and the Benediction of the Daggers, from "Les Huguenots."

THE GREGORIAN ASSOCIATION FESTIVAL.

THE members of the London Gregorian Choral Association held their tenth Annual Festival on Thursday the 11th ult. Following the example of last year, a choral celebration of the Holy Communion (given on the present occasion at the Church of St. Thomas, Regent Street) formed the first portion of the Festival; the greater interest, however, naturally centred in the Choral Evensong held at St. Paul's Cathedral at 7.30 p.m., when a choir numbering 400 boys and 600 men assembled to take part in Divine Service. The procession, which lasted twenty minutes, was more successful than in former years, the wind instruments greatly assisting in keeping the voices together at the west end of the building. The Association deserves great praise for the care with which the service-books are prepared; and we especially approve of the memoranda in the preface as to the chanting of the introductory portions of the Service on a low note—a point too often disregarded, but which is worthy the attention of choirmasters. There is, however, a limit in all things, beyond which it is not well to pass; and we are sorry that the choice of such a very low note as Tenor C for the Absolution naturally resulted in not one single syllable, nor even sound, being audible in the western portion of the Cathedral. The Anthem, the Rev. S. S. Greatheed's "Hail, gladdening light," not presenting any considerable difficulty, was fairly well rendered. The preacher, Bishop Jenner, confined the greater part of his discourse to the advantages of plain-song for church use. The wind instruments, which we have already mentioned, numbered in all twelve, namely, two clarinets, four cornets, four trombones, a double-bassoon, and an ophicleide, and were most satisfactory. Mr. Warwick Jordan, as in past years, was the director of the musical arrangements, and presided at the organ.

THE FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

THE 228th Festival of this Society took place on Wednesday the 10th ult., the full choral and orchestral service, held at St. Paul's Cathedral, being as well attended as ever. No actual novelty was included in this year's programme, but an exceedingly good rendering of Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," which formed the Anthem, went a great way towards atoning for any disappointment which might have been felt on this account; and the Overture to "Athalie," with which the service commenced, was excellently rendered by the orchestra, the harp obligato telling exceedingly well in the Cathedral. Eaton Fanning's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, composed for the Festival of 1878, were repeated, with the addition of a harp part specially added for the occasion by the composer; and the sermon (preached by the Bishop of Truro) was preceded and followed, according to custom, by the Old Hundredth Psalm and the Hallelujah Chorus respectively. Much praise is due to the orchestra of fifty-one performers; the choir (enlarged to 300 voices) was also highly efficient. Mr. George C. Martin presided at the organ, and Dr. Stainer conducted.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

LYRIC music has been in the ascendant here during the past month—comic opera, represented by the members of Mr. D'Oyly Carte's provincial "Patience" company, in the early part, and regular opera by the Carl Rosa company towards the close. But few changes either in the cast or the manner of performance were to be noted in either case, and these were not entirely in the direction of improvement. The Patience of Miss Pierson was generally accepted as an advance in freshness and naïveté upon that of her predecessor, and the Bunthorne of Mr. George Thorne had undergone obvious development and refinement since the previous visit of the company. The only novelties presented by the Carl Rosa company were Balfe's "Rose of Castille," played on this occasion for the first time by this company in Birmingham, and the same composer's "Moro; or, the Painter of Antwerp," produced for the first time in London in the early part of the year. The former work suffered from insufficient rehearsal, but met nevertheless with a very favourable reception, thanks chiefly to the melodic freshness of a great deal of the music, and the admirable manner in which that of the masquerading queen was sung by Miss Georgina Burns. The production of "Moro" excited a good deal of interest, which can scarcely be said to have been justified by the result, owing not so much to the triteness of a good deal of the music as to the defects of the libretto. On the whole, the commercial results of Mr. Carl Rosa's campaign in Birmingham this time cannot have been very satisfactory, and the only performance that can be fairly described as up to the old standard of merit was that of "Mignon," in which Miss Gaylord and Miss Burns, as Mignon and Filina respectively, and Mr. M'Guckin, as Wilhelm, carried off the chief honours.

The spring series of Messrs. Harrison's Popular Concerts was brought to a successful conclusion on the occasion of Madame Nilsson's first and only appearance here since her bereavement. The renowned Swedish songstress was accompanied by Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli, vocalists; and Mr. Rickard and M. Lasserre, pianoforte and violoncello respectively, in the instrumental department. Madame Nilsson's selection comprised Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair," which she substituted for the "Ernani" Scena originally announced; Braga's serenade, to which the violoncello obligato was contributed by M. Lasserre; and a new song, "Lost," by Engel, in which the impassioned expression and brilliant execution of the fair vocalist produced an effect out of all proportion to the merits of the composition. Mr. Vernon Rigby sang "The Message," "The Thorn," and the inevitable "La donna è mobile"; Madame Patey created a deep impression in Gluck's "Che farò"; and Signor Foli's grand voice found congenial occupation in Wallace's "Bellringer" and the trio from Gounod's "Irene." The "Rapsodie Hongroise," No. 2 of Liszt, was Mr. Rickard's most effective pianoforte solo, and he joined M. Lasserre in a spirited rendering of Rubinstein's D major sonata.

For those who listen to music chiefly with their eyes the annual harp festival of Mr. D. F. Davis on the 11th ult. furnished a great treat, the chief attraction being a band of thirty young lady amateur harpists all in a row, or rather two rows, strumming like one. Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Emilie Lloyd, and Mr. Maas were the solo vocalists, and the interests of instrumental art were upheld by a company of local executants, who played Ferdinand Ries's sextet in G minor for pianoforte, harp, violin, horn, bassoon, and double-bass.

Sebastian Bach's "Passion according to St. Matthew" was performed on the 9th ult., for the first time in Birmingham, by the members of the local Philharmonic Union, under Dr. Swinnerton Heap, with Miss Clara Samuelli, Madame Poole, Mr. Welch, and Mr. Harrison as the principal vocalists, and a local band of some forty performers. The production excited great interest in musical circles, but its reception by the general public was not so cordial as could have been desired. The performance, though not faultless, was generally effective and praiseworthy, and the dramatic spirit of many of the choruses was admirably realised.

Madame Sophie Menter played for the first time in Birmingham at her own recital on the 18th ult., and created quite a furore by her extraordinary performance, more especially of Liszt's difficult "Don Juan" Fantasia and a couple of pieces by Rubinstein: his Romance in E flat, No. 1 (Op. 44), and "Valse Caprice" in the same key. Among the more noteworthy of the other performances by the accomplished German pianiste may be named Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata in F minor, Op. 57; Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor (No. 9 of Novello's English edition), and a couple of preludes (No. 3 in G major and 23 in F major) of Op. 28, and a Mazurka by Chopin—in all of which power, subtlety, and refinement were combined with the most sympathetic appreciation of the composer.

The choral rehearsals for the Festival of August are progressing very favourably, and, notwithstanding the immense quantity of new music to be rehearsed, the work of preparation was never in so forward a state at this period as on this occasion. Brahms's "Triumphlied" proved rather a tough morsel for some of the choir, but its difficulties are now completely surmounted; and the melodic charms of Gounod's work, so far as the choir has made acquaintance with it, have won all hearts.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ON Monday the 1st ult. Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy's fourth Classical Chamber Concert (fifth season) took place at the Victoria Rooms, the executants being Messrs. Henry Holmes (first violin), M. Rice (second violin), G. Burnett (viola), T. Pomeroy (violoncello), and Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy (pianoforte). The programme comprised Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor for piano, violin, and violoncello, Spohr's Quartet in E flat, Schumann's Noveletten (Op. 21, No. 1) and Phantasiesstücke (Op. 12, No. 7), and Beethoven's Quartet in D (Op. 18, No. 3).

At the People's Concert on Saturday the 6th ult. Macfarren's Cantata "May-Day" was the chief attraction.

The programme of the Monday Popular Concert on the 8th ult. underwent a slight alteration, in consequence of the melancholy news received from Ireland on the previous day. Gounod's Royal Wedding March, which was to have been the first item, was changed at the last moment for the Dead March in "Saul." During its performance the hall remained in semi-darkness, the audience standing, and at its conclusion the gas was turned on and the orchestra broke into "God save the Queen," the sudden change proving very impressive. This was followed by Beethoven's Overture to "Leonora" (No. 3, in C); Mendelssohn's Symphony to the "Hymn of Praise" and Overture to "Ruy Blas," the Overture to "Tannhäuser," A. Dvorák's Suite in D, and a Marche Héroïque by C. Saint-Saëns constituting the remainder of the programme. Madame F. Winn and Miss Mabel Waite were the vocalists. The performance of the Mendelssohn Symphony and Wagner's Overture was particularly good. Dvorák's Suite appeared to excite considerable interest among the audience, and at the close of the Romance there was much applause. But for the rule against encores which prevails at these Concerts, the Suite would undoubtedly have been redemanded. Mr. Riseley conducted.

The image displays a page from a musical score for the hymn "The Light of the World." It features five vocal staves (Soprano, Alto, Tenor 1, Tenor 2, and Bass) and a piano accompaniment staff at the bottom. The music is in the key of D major (indicated by two sharps) and 4/4 time. The lyrics are: "shadows nev-er fall, Where Thou, E-ter-nal Light of Light, Art." The score includes dynamic markings such as f (forte) and ff (fortissimo), and a section labeled "Voices only." The piano part includes a prominent chordal texture in the left hand and a more melodic line in the right hand.

At the Monday Popular Concert on the 22nd ult. (tenth Concert of the fifth season) Mr. Riseley's band performed the following selection: Overture to "Jessonda" (Spohr), Overture to "Die Felsenmühle" (Reissiger), Scotch Symphony, Op. 56 (Mendelssohn), and the Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" (Nicolai). The chief feature of the evening was Miss Helen Hopekirk's performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, for pianoforte and orchestra. In this Miss Hopekirk displayed marked talent and ability, the left-hand passages especially being rendered with almost masculine vigour and power. She also gave Chopin's Berceuse in D flat and Polonaise in A flat, for pianoforte solo, playing these, as well as the Concerto, from memory. The first movement of the Mendelssohn Symphony was somewhat too loud in the piu mosso passages, an unusual fault with Mr. Riseley's band, but the remaining movements went well. Mr. W. Thomas and Miss C. Wollaston were the vocalists.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE last Gentlemen's Concert of the series was given at the Concert Hall on April 24. The chief orchestral work, Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade, produced at Mr. Hallé's Concerts about a year ago, though replete with melody, like all Mozart wrote, is not to be ranked with his great productions; and the frequent repetition of the principal themes, and the somewhat thin scoring for a small orchestra, combine to render the work slightly monotonous, despite its melodic beauty. The other orchestral numbers were Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde," and Brahms's "Hungarian Dance" No. 6. Mr. Charles Hallé gave a characteristic rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, and played with infinite grace and delicacy four pieces from Schumann's "Phantasiestücke." Mrs. Hutchinson sang several songs in her usually refined and artistic style, and Miss Spencer Jones displayed a good contralto voice, commendable method, and excellent taste in a pleasing but not ambitious selection.

Madame Sophie Menter gave her first Pianoforte Recital here on the 8th ult. Her programme comprised only seven original pianoforte compositions, viz., Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," two Preludes by Chopin, two pieces by Scarlatti, and an equal number by Rubinstein; and the rest consisted entirely of transcriptions and fantasias, including Liszt's "Don Juan" Fantasia, Tausig's transcription of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor from the organ works, arrangements of songs by Schubert and Mendelssohn, and a perversion of Chopin's Mazurka No. 23. Madame Menter's exceptional powers of execution enabled her to give a very effective reading of these pieces, especially of those which belong to the bravura style.

At Madame Menter's second Recital, which was given on the 22nd ult., the programme included Schumann's "Carnival," Liszt's Tarantella de "La Muette de Portici," and pieces by Handel, Scarlatti, Chopin, Mendelssohn, &c.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MR. MAAS'S Concert at Huddersfield, on April 25, attracted a large audience, the programme being well suited to the occasion. The harp solos of Mr. D. Ffrench Davis and the fine singing of Mr. Maas were enthusiastically applauded. The other artists were Misses De Fonblanque and Helen D'Alton, Messrs. Thurley Beale and H. T. Bywater, and Herr Volkmer.

The Halifax Choral Society gave a Miscellaneous Concert, on April 28, under the direction of Mr. R. S. Burton (of Leeds) as Conductor. Mr. W. F. Illingworth distinguished himself by an excellent rendering of Schumann's Arabesque (Op. 18). The singing of the choir was highly commendable, and the soloists, Miss Tomlinson, Miss Riley, and Mr. Fred. Foster, achieved a considerable amount of success.

The Leeds Amateur Orchestral Society attempted great things at the Church Institute, on the 8th ult. The pieces performed by the band were Suppé's Overture, "Poet and Peasant," Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and Auber's Overture to "Fra Diavolo." M. J. P. Bowling was the Conductor, Mr. W. S. Hall solo flautist, and Miss Annie Woods the vocalist.

Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" formed the first part of the programme of a Concert given by the Ilkley Vocal Society on the 9th ult.; the second part consisting of part-songs and solos. Mr. Jas. Broughton, the Chorus-master of the Leeds Musical Festival Choir, is the Conductor of the Society.

The only other Concert of any importance in this neighbourhood during the past month was that of the Manningham Vocal Union, which took place on the 12th ult. at the Bradford Church Institute, under the care of Mr. Jas. H. Rooks, the Conductor of the Society. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" formed the first part of the programme, the second part being of the usual miscellaneous nature.

IN our article upon the Jubilee of the Sacred Harmonic Society, which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES for November last, we wrote hopefully of its future, knowing that the amount of support accorded to it during this season would materially influence the Committee in deciding whether to carry on the Society or at once to bring it to an end. The unfortunate illness of Sir Michael Costa may probably have had some share in producing the result, but at the close of the season the dissolution of this time-honoured institution was resolved upon, and the cause of sacred music has thus lost a zealous and trustworthy friend. A pamphlet recently published, called "A History of the Sacred Harmonic Society, its Origin, Rise, and Progress," by Daniel Hill, J.P., President of the Society, which has been forwarded to us, most ably proves the truth of the statement in its first page, that everything accomplished by this Society is entirely due to "the intelligent perseverance of a few young men, possessed of no peculiar qualifications beyond industry, plain common sense, and business habits." We have already, in the article mentioned, traced the career of the Association from the time when "five musical associates met by appointment at the house of Mr. Joseph Hart, a musicseller in Hatton Garden," with the view of establishing a Society for the performance of sacred music; and now refer our readers to Mr. Hill's "History" for many minute details which we are certain will be read with the utmost interest. "Whether more important functions or higher honours await future exertions of London amateurs remains to be seen," says Mr. Hill in this pamphlet; but, with every faith in the exertions of the many lovers of sacred music in this country, we can scarcely believe that "more important functions" can be undertaken by, or "higher honours" crown the efforts of, any body of artists more actuated by earnest devotion to the cause than was the Sacred Harmonic Society.

AN amateur performance of the "Merchant of Venice," which took place at St. George's Hall on April 29, although excellent in a dramatic sense, would claim no notice in our columns, were it not for the incidental music given on the occasion. This was of the utmost interest, for it included Mr. Arthur Sullivan's music to the "Masque" in the second act (which had never before been heard in London in connection with the play), the "Serenade" being so well sung by Mr. Edwin Bryant as to elicit an encore, and the dance being also redemanded with an enthusiasm which could not be resisted. In the Casket Scene the song "Tell me, where is fancy bred?"

set to music for male voices by Signor Pinsuti, in this popular composer's happiest style, was repeated by desire; and in Act V. "A Hymn to the Moon" (words by Ben Jonson), also set as a part-song for male voices, by Mr. Berthold Tours, pleased so much by its melodious beauty and sympathy with the verse as to receive the warmest applause. Both these part-songs were composed expressly for this performance, and we are gratified to learn that each composer has very generously presented his composition to the fund for which the performance was organised. We may also say that an efficient little orchestra, amongst other pieces, performed Gounod's "Wedding March" (composed for the marriage of H.R.H. the Duke of Albany), and a Gavotte by Rameau, arranged for strings by Mr. Berthold Tours, who most ably conducted the music of the evening.

WE understand that a new department of Trinity College has been created for the purpose of preserving the best traditions of oratorio, and of further developing this branch of the musical art, under the able direction of Mr. Willing. The work of the school will be conducted in two divisions. In the solo division singers will be specially trained in recitative, air, and other solo work. The choral division will comprise the study of the choruses in oratorios by the great masters, including those for eight voices or double choirs, occurring in such works as the "Passion according to St. Matthew," "Israel in Egypt," &c. Combined rehearsals of the solo and choral divisions, together with orchestral accompaniment, will be commenced as soon as the respective divisions have been brought to the needful state of efficiency, and it is also intended that occasional performances of a more formal and public character shall be given in due course. The school will be open morning and evening, to students of either sex, whether professional or amateur. In the prospectus of this undertaking Sir Michael Costa is named as "Visitor."

THE Victoria Glee Club gave a Concert at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington Park, on Wednesday, the 3rd ult., when male-voice glees by Callcott, Beale, Spofforth, &c., were given. The soloists were Madame D'Arj, Miss Rose Barnby, Mr. Henry Parkin, and Mr. Henry Prenton; violin, Miss Margaret Gyde. The accompanists were Miss Annie Daymond, R.A.M., and Mr. Alfred Cox. Dr. Bridge, President of the Club, occupied the chair, and Mr. William Sexton conducted. On the 22nd ult. the Club, numbering forty voices, gave a Concert at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall, when glees, part-songs, choruses, &c., were successfully rendered. Solos were given by Madame Worrell, Mr. Edwin Bryant, Mr. Arthur Weston, Mr. R. W. Heney, and Mr. Egbert Roberts; Miss Margaret Gyde (violin), Mr. H. Tuddenham and Mr. T. F. Williams (flute), Miss N. Cowell, Miss Annie Daymond, and Mr. Alfred Cox (pianoforte). Mr. Sexton conducted the Concert.

A VERY successful Concert was given in Wycliffe Chapel, Philpot Street, on Wednesday, the 17th ult., when Dawre's Cantata "The Lion of Judah," was given with full band and chorus of 200 performers. The soloists were Miss Kate Howard, Miss Annie Hood, Mrs. J. Chappell, Miss L. La Rivière, Miss Sara A. Hughes, R.A.M., Mr. F. Peach, Mr. W. G. Williams and Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe. In addition to her part in the Cantata Miss Hughes sang "He was despised," and "O thou that tellest," from "The Messiah," and Mr. Rowcliffe sang Gounod's "Nazareth." Mr. G. J. Rayner presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. E. Hedges at the organ, the last-named artist gaining an encore for his fine performance of Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata No. 1. The band, under the leadership of Mr. H. Baynton, played Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March, and War March from "Athaliae." Mr. George Merritt, the Choirmaster of Wycliffe, conducted throughout.

ON Wednesday evening, the 3rd ult., a successful Concert was given by the Tottenham Musical Society (Wesleyan), under the conductorship of Mr. R. J. Pitt. The programme included a new (MS.) Sacred Cantata, composed by Mr. George F. Grover, entitled "The Raising of Lazarus." The principal soloists were Miss Alice Sugden, Mr. J. Blofield, and Mr. C. Murton, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. The band was under the able leadership of Mr. G. Harold Elphick; Mr. John Jefferys presided at the organ, and the composer at the pianoforte. The Cantata was excellently rendered, and the audience most enthusiastic. At the conclusion of the Concert the young composer was called forward and warmly applauded. The libretto was arranged and written by Mr. J. Montgomery.

THE St. George's Glee Union gave a very successful representation of "The May Queen" (Bennett) at their Concert on the 5th ult., at the Pimlico Rooms. The characters were taken by Miss Kate Hardy, Mr. Henry Parkin, Miss Coyte Turner, and Mr. R. E. Miles. The choruses were well sung by a choir of nearly eighty voices. Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinkee played the pianoforte and harmonium accompaniments. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, and included solos by the artists before mentioned, and several part-songs by the choir, among which were, "Now is the month of maying" (Morley), "This pleasant month of May" (Beale), and "Allegiance we swear" (Bishop); the soprano solo in the latter being ably rendered by Miss E. Watts. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE annual Festival of the Church of England Temperance Society took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday, April 27, the musical arrangements being in the hands of the Lay-Helpers' Association, whose choir numbered about 250 voices. Two horns and two trombones from the Band of the Grenadier Guards rendered very great assistance to the voices, the processional hymns, always a trying feature of these services, being particularly steady and effective. The service consisted of full choral evensong, with Schubert's "Song of Miriam" for the anthem. The Bishop of Carlisle was the preacher, Mr. George C. Martin, Sub-organist of the Cathedral, presided at the organ, and Mr. C. E. Miller, Organist of Lambeth Parish Church, conducted.

An excellent Concert was given by the Hampstead Choral Society at the New Vestry Hall, Haverstock Hill, on the 22nd ult. Spohr's "Last Judgment," Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride," and Gounod's "Gallia," were the works selected for performance. The principal vocalists were Miss Gertrude Hine, Mrs. George Gill, Miss Amy Gill, Miss A. E. Grahame, Messrs. Frazer, George Gill and Alfred Smith, all of whom were thoroughly efficient, the singing of Mrs. Gill in Gounod's "Gallia" being much admired. The choruses were well rendered, the Conductor, Mr. Willem Coenen, having evidently bestowed much care upon the preparation of the works. The accompaniments were played by an amateur orchestra of forty performers.

THE Kentish Town Institute Choral Society, which was formed last autumn, gave its second and last Concert of the season at the Schools, Islip Street, on the 8th ult. The programme consisted of the one-act Cantata "Nourmahal," by Urich, several part-songs well sung by the Portland Glee Union, and solos by Mrs. Georgina Weldon, Miss Medus, Messrs. W. F. Shea, Vernon Brett, and H. Knight. Mr. H. S. Webster presided at the piano, Mr. H. Knight at the harmonium, and Mr. H. W. Carte gave a flute solo. Mr. Wallace Wells and Mrs. Georgina Weldon conducted. The Society recommences on September 25, when Van Bree's Cantata, "St. Cecilia," will be practised.

THE Board of Musical Studies at Cambridge have had under consideration the desirability of offering to women the advantage of having their knowledge of the higher branches of music tested by University examination; and they recommend that musical degrees shall be open to women who can produce the required certificate of literary and scientific attainment, at the same fees as those demanded from men, and that the names of all those who satisfy the examiners shall be published at the ordinary time in a separate list.

At a Congregation held in the Senate House, Cambridge, on Thursday, the 11th ult., the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon Edwin J. Crow, of St. John's College, and Organist of Ripon Cathedral, and Charles Joseph Frost, of Sidney Sussex College, and Organist of Christ Church, Newgate Street, E.C.

THE season of the Brixton Choral Society was brought to a termination at Angell Town Institution on Monday evening, the 15th ult., when Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was performed. The choral work was upon the whole praiseworthy, but not without minor faults. The leading parts were sustained by Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Minnie Gwynne, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Dudley Thomas, and Mr. H. Horscroft, the first and last named being worthy of especial praise. A small band of strings played commendably the orchestral accompaniments, assisted at the organ by Mr. John Harrison. Mr. William Lemare conducted with his usual care.

THE second Concert of the season of Mr. Michael Watson's Choir was given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Monday evening, the 8th ult., the first part of the programme consisting of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The choruses were given with very commendable precision throughout. The solos were rendered by Madame Worrell, Miss May Hallam (pupil of the Conductor) and Mr. Henry Guy. The Symphony and accompaniments were performed with efficiency by Miss Adelaide Palmer, and Miss Emily Gilloch. Mr. Watson conducted. "Elijah" will be performed at the remaining Concert.

MISS ANNIE MATTHEWS gave her annual Concert at Brixton Hall on Thursday evening, the 11th ult. The pieces chosen by the bénéficiaire were the Scena from Weber's "Der Freischütz," "Softly sighs," Sullivan's "My dearest heart," and, as an encore, "Within a mile of Edinboro' Town," all of which were well sung. Miss Clara Samuel and Miss Marian Burton were also highly successful. The remaining artists were Mdlle. Vagnolini, Misses Lizzie Evans, Maud Longhurst, and E. Daniel; Messrs. W. A PERFORMANCE of Mr. Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was given on Saturday evening, April 29, in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. The choruses were sung by Mr. Stedman's choir and the united choirs of St. Margaret's and Westminster Abbey, supported by a most efficient orchestra. Dr. Bridge presided at the organ, and Mr. Farmer conducted. The Oratorio has been enriched since its last performance at St. Margaret's by the addition of two tenor solos, "When I survey the wondrous Cross," and "The Son of God goes forth to war." Canon Farrar opened the service and pronounced the benediction. There was an offertory for the repairs of the organ.

AN evening Concert was given on the 4th ult. at Steinway Hall, in aid of the Chancel Fund of St. Philip's Church, Regent Street. The vocalists were Miss Hipwell, Mr. Frederick Bevan, Mr. Arthur Vitton, and Mr. W. E. Gregory, and the instrumental soloists Major Briggs (flute) and Herr F. Rosenthal (pianoforte). Mr. Percy Reeve contributed a clever original musical sketch entitled "A Condensed Opera," and the Euterpean Glee Union gave several glees and part-songs. Mr. G. F. Bruce acted as accompanist, and Mr. A. H. Crowest as director. The Concert, musically and financially, was a great success.

REVIEWS.

The Study of Music, and its Place in General Education. By James C. Culwick. [Dublin: E. Ponsonby.]

THIS pamphlet is the second of two Papers read before the Literary Society, Alexandra College, Dublin; and if the first of the two is equal in merit to the one before us, we may congratulate the College upon having secured the services of an artist who not only thoroughly understands the subject upon which he undertakes to discourse, but who has the additional merit of conveying his thoughts in most felicitous language. There are many lecturers who can talk eloquently to an audience on the power of music, and show by their own enthusiasm and the quotation of various authorities how much good it has effected in the past and ought to effect in the future; but there are few, especially amongst professional musicians, who have sufficiently thought out the matter to assign to the art its real place in general education, and to say boldly who ought and who ought not to enter seriously upon its study. "In spite of the strong wave of thought," says Mr. Culwick, "that through the length of the land has turned men's minds to search for beauty, there is still reason to fear that in these days of high-handed School Boards, intermediately educated classes, journals of education, education societies, and the new race of hot-pressure educationalists, all pressing hard in one direction—there is, I say, reason to fear that the scholars' faculties may be overstrained and pressed in some directions, and left without healthy exercise in others. The solemn ceremony of pulling up the roots to see the growth, technically called examination, is performed with such useless, confusing frequency that the aim of the professional educator, whose character is made to depend upon the results, may not always be the best; and there is almost a certainty that he will not be able to judge or have the leisure to examine, in any exceptional case, what are the most worthy faculties of the scholar." We should be glad, did our space allow it, to quote many of the author's observations upon the manner in which the art should be taught where it is definitely proved that there is a sympathetic mind to receive it, and, on the other hand, to place before our readers his well-digested reasons for not forcing a student to work at music simply because it is the custom to do so. "Early discouragement," he says, "and a loss of hope are bad; but the waste of time in wearily, drearily grinding at an unloved study is perhaps worse." All teachers who have the courage will agree with this truth; and we should be glad if it were openly avowed, even at the expense of diminishing the number of players and singers who inflict as much misery upon their hearers as their teachers have inflicted upon them. Let all possessed of voices and ears have them both cultivated when young, and we should then speedily find those who have special faculties for the study. "In colleges and schools," Mr. Culwick argues, "neither lads nor lasses should have their art-feeling neglected. Those found to prefer it should be allowed to learn drawing—such as would go towards opening their eyes to the beauty Nature in rich prodigality scatters in form or colour, in cloud or sunshine, everywhere and always. Those with no taste for either music or drawing would still have literature as a delightful and most beneficial resource, and would learn the blessedness of books. Those with a heart or head for nothing at all should be assisted to find and follow a course of life where the want of taste would not be missed." It would be well if this common-sense theory were not too common to be more generally acted upon.

Roaming.

Glorious May.

Our Maxim.

In Dulci Jubilo.

The Words translated from the German by Clara Ascroft. Composed for men's voices by H. Hofmann.

[Novello, Ewer & Co.]

WE have here a group of part-songs eminently characteristic of the refined and melodious style of a composer whose works have made their way in England solely by their own merits, and in a remarkably brief period. "Roaming" is simple and tuneful in the extreme, and will assuredly please wherever it is heard; but "Sir Cuckoo," although equally unpretentious—a quality which especially distinguishes the whole of the series—is delightfully fresh and vigorous; the baritone solo, accompanied by the choir, being a point of much interest, and the words throughout being expressed most sympathetically, without the conventional "bird-cries" with which the realistic school of writers so plentifully embellish their cuckoo and nightingale songs. "Glorious May" is a joyous composition; and although in feeling resembling the next one on our list—"In Springtime"—the character of the music is quite different, the former being merely a charming May song harmonised in four parts, and the latter having some highly effective phrases of imitation. "Our Maxim" is an excellent setting of some quaint verses, the solo quartet answered by the chorus, giving much force to the jovial words of the "maxim." "In Dulci Jubilo," commencing with a well-marked subject unharmonised, and containing some quiet and well-considered writing, forms a fitting termination to a collection of compositions which we doubt not will be speedily recognised by the many Choral Societies desirous of extending their repertoire of modern works. The whole of these part-songs are included in the new series of the "Orpheus," which has, we find, already reached 174 numbers.

Reine d'Amour. Song for Soprano or Tenor. Words by Francis Turner Palgrave.

The Cottage by the Sea. Song for Baritone or Contralto. Words by Hastings Crossley.

The Lament of the Rose. Song for Mezzo-Soprano or Tenor. Words after the German of Mirza-Schaffy.

In the Night. Song for Baritone or Mezzo-Soprano. Words by Hastings Crossley. English version by H. C. Irwin, Esq.

Strew on her Roses. Song for Soprano or Tenor. Words by Matthew Arnold.

Composed by Hastings Crossley.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ALTHOUGH the name of this composer is unfamiliar in the world of music, there can be no question that it will not long remain so. The freshness of style in the melodies and the appropriateness and excessive gracefulness of the accompaniments throughout these songs evidence the mind of a musician and a poet; and if Mr. Crossley can only meet success with that fortitude which is usually supposed only necessary to meet failure, we confidently predict for him a most prosperous career. Of course all the compositions are not of equal merit; but we most unhesitatingly say that all are good. "Reine d'Amour" is a highly attractive song, the purity and refinement of the voice part being materially aided in effect by the charming manner in which it is accompanied—one point worth noticing being where at the double bar the dominant is obstinately held on to form the third of the new key. Better than this song, however, and indeed the gem of the collection, is "The Cottage by the Sea." Commencing with a characteristic phrase in A minor for the pianoforte, the voice breaks in with a pathetic, wailing melody which eventually, closing upon the dominant, passes into the tonic major, with an arpeggio accompaniment, and afterwards into the relative major, in which key it concludes. The unexaggerated expression of the words throughout this composition strengthens us in the hope that the composer is not likely to be turned aside from his convictions by the dangerous "word-painting" theories of the day. "The Lament of the Rose" is a well-written and simple ballad in D flat major, which appears perhaps more suitable for a tenor than a mezzo-soprano, although the compass would make it available for either. "In the Night" and "Strew on her Roses" are worthy companions to the songs already noticed, the former—written, we presume, to German words by the composer—having many points of interest, the alternation between the minor and major keys being throughout in good sympathy with the poetry. Judging from these specimens of Mr. Crossley's power, we have every reason to believe that he may shortly give us some meritorious work of greater importance.

Reeves' Music Primers, No. 3. Exercises on General Elementary Music. By Kate Paige. In two parts. Part I.
[W. Reeves.]

THE authoress of this little manual says in her preface, "We attach special importance to the questions which refer pupils for answers or examples to standard musical compositions, serving, as they must, to deepen their knowledge of the great classical compositions, and to encourage a more extensive study of these works." Acting upon this theory, the book contains merely the questions upon what may be termed the elements of music, and the pupils are left to answer them according to their own method, from works which they have previously studied. We quite agree with this system, provided all persons taught alike; but, in proof that this is not the case, we may mention that in the very first page of the work before us there are two questions which would cause a division of opinion with teachers—"What is a stave?" and "What is the clef sign for the mezzo-soprano?"—for many would say that "stave" should be "staff"; and whilst some would assert that the C clef on the first line is the sign for the "soprano," others would call it the "mezzo-soprano," and numerous books tell us that the "mezzo-soprano" clef can only be placed on the second line. Apart from this objection, however, we have much praise, not only for the general arrangement of the book, but for the lucid manner in which the questions are put. The chapters on Time and Accent are exceedingly good; and there are some very useful exercises to accustom the student to transposition. We are especially pleased, too, with the method of writing incomplete bars, and asking the pupil to supply the missing parts with rests; and also of requiring notes to be changed into rests, dots into rests, and rests into notes. We are convinced that a great portion of the slovenly practice of young students is to be traced to the manner in which the elementary part of the study is often passed over, in order to arrive at "pieces." Before concluding our notice—as in a work intended for pupils it is of the highest importance that there should be nothing to confuse them—we should like to point out some inaccuracies. At page 27, in the 19th exercise, a bar of 9-16 is marked 12-16. At page 31, in the 1st exercise, there are five crotchets in the bar. Then, at page 33, what can be the meaning of the question, "What is a common chord or key chord?" Surely as, at page 32, the student has been asked to write "common chords on each note of the scale of C" (which, by the by, cannot, according to the theory of most teachers, be done at all), he would be somewhat puzzled to understand that a common chord may also be termed a "key chord." It is important, too, to correct some of the orthography in the works named at page 34: "Sonnambula" is spelt with one "n"; "Rigoletto" with two "g's"; and "Babylon" we presume should be "The Fall of Babylon," as we can only imagine that Spohr's oratorio is meant. A revision of these errors would make the book as perfect as it deserves to be.

Action Songs for Children. Words and Music by J. Clift Wade. [John Heywood.]

CERTAINLY children cannot complain that vocal music adapted to their capacities—both physically and mentally—is not easily procurable in the present day; for not only are their old favourite nursery rhymes set to appropriately simple notes, and illustrated by eminent artists, but verses written by poets who can think with the child's mind, and composed by equally sympathetic musicians, abound on all sides; so that nursery concerts may eventually become a recognised domestic institution. Young people, we all know, are fond of action; but whether they would agree to mix their action with their music becomes a question. For our part, we are inclined to believe that they like to sing when they sing, and play when they play; and that one will assuredly neutralise the other should they attempt to do both at the same time. The author of the Songs before us, however, thinks differently, and gives them a set of vocal pieces, the action to which, in some, is definitely pointed out. When the words are written in italics, we are told, "the part is to be illustrated by appropriate action"; but in the song called "Stone Breaking," it is expressly said that "the accented notes are to be marked by the children with sharp raps—by striking the palm of the left hand with the knuckles of the right fist—all through the song, except when other action is indicated by the words." Apart from any opinion of our own as to the welcome with which these compositions will be received by juvenile vocalists, we are bound to say that both words and music are admirably adapted for their intended purpose; and that the book is in every respect an excellent specimen of honest and earnest work.

Hesperus. Canzonet. Words from the Greek of Sappho, by Edwin Arnold, M.A., F.R.G.S.

The Avon to the Severn runs. Part-song for mixed voices. Composed by C. A. Macirone.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

MISS MACIRONE has most happily caught the feeling of the simple Greek verse selected for musical setting, and has given us a song which should commend itself to any vocalist who can sympathise with both poet and composer. The pertinacious adherence to the key—with the exception of only a few bars—is in excellent keeping with the character of the words; and the accompaniment maintains a figure throughout which materially increases the interest of the voice part. A leading feature in the composition is the use of the harmony of the minor sixth of the scale, which, with other chromatic chords, prevents any undue feeling of monotony. The words of the Part-song, "The Avon to the Severn runs," have reference to the carrying of the remains of Wickliffe—which were exhumed, burnt to ashes, and cast into a neighbouring brook—from the Avon to the Severn, and thence into the sea: “and thus,” says Fuller in his “Church History,” “the ashes of Wickliffe are the emblem of his doctrine, which now is dispersed all the world over.” The music of this song is melodious, and well expresses the words. The voice parts are written with the ease which might be expected from so practised a hand as that of Miss Macirone, and the harmony is most appropriate throughout. The composition will certainly prove effective if intrusted to a well-trained choir.

Birds and Flowers for Little Folks. The words by the Editor of “Birds and Flowers.” Set to music by Albert Hirschfeld. [F. Pitman.]

As some very prominent advertisements, displayed in framework, precede the words and music of this book, we conclude that we have rightly guessed the name of its publisher; but the rather important announcement of this fact is entirely omitted from the title-page. The work is most elegantly got up, both the external and internal appearance, indeed, being extremely attractive to the eye. We cannot, however, say that we warmly sympathise either with the verses or the music. The “shiny black-beetle,” who escapes being made a meal of by the birds, “to be eaten at some future date,” is scarcely a delicate subject for juvenile vocalists to linger over; and when the “poor, poor birdies” in the snow, with a pleading voice, to the children say “give us a worm, if you have such a thing,” we cannot help thinking (perhaps with some respect for Darwin’s recent work) that it may become a question which of the two should be sacrificed. The music wedded to the poetry is simple enough, and generally tuneful; but we do not like some few things in the accompaniments; as, for example, where melody and bass rise in octaves from dominant to key-note (between bars 15 and 16 in “The Beetle and the Birds”), the awkward chord, with the doubled leading-note (bar 11, in “The Sparrow”), and the octaves C, B, in the accompaniment (bar 7 in “The Skylark”), with some other minor defects which could be easily remedied.

Twenty Songs for a Contralto Voice. With Pianoforte Accompaniment. Composed by Franz Schubert. Selected, edited, and translated by Natalia Macfarren. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE lately drew attention to the publication in this edition of “Twenty Songs for a Mezzo-Soprano Voice by Schubert”; and we have now the same number for a Contralto, amongst which those acquainted with the vocal works of this composer will know that there are some of the most beautiful he ever wrote. The volume commences with the popular “Wanderer,” which needs no commendation from us; but we may say that there is a peculiar charm in some of the lesser-known songs in this selection which, as we have hinted in our notice of the first volume, can only be fully revealed to the listener through the union of two equally sympathetic artists, the pianoforte and voice being in truth indissolubly woven together in every composition. If we cite “The Old Man’s Song,” “The Flight of Time,” “The Weary Heart,” “Sadness,” “To the Lyre,” “The Lay of the Imprisoned Huntsman,” “Death and the Maiden,” and “Prometheus,” as amongst the most attractive in the book, it is only that in passing through them these few have especially struck us. There may be individual opinions, of course, upon the relative merits of the songs; but all will agree that the volume is a priceless treasure to contralto vocalists.

The Pianoforte Teacher’s Guide. By L. Plaidy. Translated by Fanny Raymond Ritter. [W. Reeves.]

THE name of the author of this book is too well known to need a word of introduction. His “Technical Studies” are now happily almost as familiar to pianists in this country as in Germany; and we therefore cordially welcome the work just published, which cannot but prove highly valuable both to pupils and teachers. In proof of Plaidy’s estimate of the real mission of his art, we may cite the following preliminary passage in the “Guide” before us: “It is especially requisite that the teacher should consider his vocation a sacred one, an elevated life task, lest his pupil should regard it as a something of little consequence—mere amusement.” Certainly this great master of the technics of his instrument has provided ample material for the solid method of study which he recommends; and we feel convinced that if his practical exercises are taught according to the suggestions laid down in this book, the sound progress of the pupil is ensured.

Toccata. For the Pianoforte. By Cotsford Dick. [Enoch and Sons.]

MR. COTSFORD DICK is rather fond of reflecting the style of the old masters in his pianoforte music; and having written a carefully considered sketch where both hands are well employed, he has selected the somewhat antiquated word “Toccata”—which certainly does not express anything in particular—as a title, instead of the modern and more definite prefixes to which we are becoming accustomed. We are in the habit of associating the term “Toccata” with something of greater importance than the composer has here given us—most writers having used this name for works which illustrate some particular touch—but the themes, in A major and minor, are melodious, and the character of the piece is well and effectively preserved throughout.

Danse Antique. For the Piano. Composed by F. Williams. [C. Jefferys.]

MODERN antiques are now so prevalent in our architecture, our dress, and even in the furniture of our rooms, that the custom of “looking back” in our music is scarcely to be wondered at. It is true that by those thoroughly acquainted with the works of a past time compositions moulded upon these forms cannot but be regarded as imitations, however clever they may be; and before recommending such new productions to pianists, therefore, it would be well to ascertain whether they are well acquainted with the old ones. Mr. Williams’s piece is a fair reminiscence of the days of our grandfathers, and will certainly please an audience not too exacting. It is stated that it has been “performed with the greatest success at the Brighton Aquarium.”

O Maiden fairest. Serenade. Words and Music by Frederick H. Bell. [B. Williams.]

COMPOSERS, like authors, suffer from so many good works having been produced before their time; and it has often been remarked by despairing writers that Shakespeare and Beethoven have really left nothing for anybody to say after them. Mr. Bell is evidently one of these victims, for he would have written a very good Serenade had not M. Gounod written a “Sérénade Berceuse” before him. We do not say that he has reproduced the notes of the popular French composer, but the figure in the pianoforte part which colours the composition throughout made us actually believe that we were commencing Gounod’s Sérénade. It may be said, however, that the effect of this resemblance—which is very probably accidental—is lessened by the change of time and key in the middle of the song.

Song of the Norns. English Version, by Lewis Novra. Composed for Female Voices, Solo and Chorus, and Orchestra, by H. Hofmann. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS characteristic composition has hitherto only appeared in folio size, and we need scarcely say that its publication in Novello’s Octavo Edition will largely spread a knowledge of its many claims to attention. Being written for female voices, it appeals not only to choral societies but to drawing-room vocalists, who will doubtless be glad to become acquainted with a work so full of beauty and yet so thoroughly within their executive powers. The pianoforte accompaniment is exceedingly well arranged, and the numerous indications of the instrumental score will be found useful as guides to the performer.

Minuet Sentimentale. For Pianoforte. By Frederick F. Rogers. [W. Morley, Jun., and Co.]

ALTHOUGH we can hardly discover any justification of its title, this Minuet is in every respect an excellent piece of music, melodious, artistic, and containing all the elements of popularity. Its leading subject commences in B minor and ends in D major, with a well-contrasted theme (which we may presume represents the "Trio," although not so termed) in G major. Compositions of this character are good both for the practice and study of amateurs; and Mr. Rogers, if he should feel so inclined, may multiply them to any extent to the benefit both of himself and the art.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE following artists have been announced to take part (alternately) in the forthcoming "Parsifal" performances at Bayreuth, viz.: Herren Vogl, Jäger, Winkelman, and Gudehus (Parsifal), Mesdames Brandt, Materna, Malten (Kundry), Herren Scaria, Siehr, Reichmann, and Fuchs (Gurnemanz). The part of King Amfortas will be rendered by Herr Hill, and that of Klingsor, the magician, by Herr Kindermann. Hof-Capellmeister Levi will be the musical director, and the chorus-singers will be those of the Munich opera. King Ludwig of Bavaria is to be the sole spectator at the general rehearsal preceding the performances.

Hans von Wolzogen, the able exponent of Richard Wagner's later music-dramas, has just published a "Thematic Guide through the Music of 'Parsifal,'" intended for the use of non-musicians, similar to the same author's introduction to the "Nibelungen" trilogy. The work is prefaced by some interesting remarks concerning the legendary sources whence Wagner has derived the materials for his new opera-drama.

A second edition of the pianoforte score of "Parsifal" has already become necessary, and is about to be published.

A highly interesting collection of autographs by Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Weber, Chopin, Mendelssohn (the complete original score of "St. Paul" amongst the number!), and other masters will be placed under the hammer during the present month by Messrs. List and Francke, of Leipzig.

We are glad to learn that Dr. W. Langhans, of Berlin, has been intrusted by the publishers of A. W. Ambros's "Geschichte der Musik" (F. E. C. Leuckart, of Leipzig), with the continuation to modern times of that standard work, the second edition of which we recently noticed in this journal. Dr. Langhans' ability as a music historian has been sufficiently demonstrated in his "Die Musikgeschichte in zwölf Vorlesungen," and no better choice could have been made for the accomplishment of so important a task, which will embrace the development of the art in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries.

Dr. Hans von Bülow, who has just completed his Scandinavian concert-tour, has been nominated an honorary member of the Royal Swedish Musik-Akademie.

Friedrich von Flotow, the composer of "Martha" and "Alessandro Stradella," celebrated his seventieth birthday on April 27. The Vienna Hoftheater, where "Martha" was first brought out in the year 1847, commemorated the event by a festive performance of that opera in the presence of the veteran composer. Flotow has written a number of operatic works (besides overtures, chamber-music, and numerous songs), but it is with those above mentioned that his popularity will always be associated. He resides at present at Darmstadt.

Under the heading of "Letters from Spain," a correspondent of the Augsburger Allgemeine Zeitung states the following: "The subject of Mozart's opera 'Don Giovanni' is founded upon an actual occurrence, the scene of which was the town of Seville. The hero's name was Don Juan Tenorio, and the Commendatore, whom he killed in combat, was buried in the chapel of a Franciscan cloister at Seville, where a monument was erected to him. There also was interred Donna Inés, Don Juan's wife, the Elvira of the opera. The cloister was subsequently destroyed by fire, but the statues still exist, and are to be seen in the garden of the Duc de Montpensier. They are, unfortunately, in a somewhat mutilated condition. The monument of the Commendatore does not, however, represent that personage on horseback, but reclining full length on a sarcophagus."

The Vienna Hoftheater will, it is stated, dispense with Italian Opera during next season, in consequence of the unfavourable financial results of the preceding stagione.

No less than 1,320 settings to a "Hymn for the Germans of Austria," have, according to the Wiener Zeitung, been submitted to the Prize Jury, who, however, have rejected them all, and the award still remains to be competed for.

M. Ambroise Thomas' opera "Françoise de Rimini," in its somewhat revised and modified condition, has been frequently performed at the Paris Grand-Opéra during last month. With reference to this work, Signor Capponi, writing to the Perseveranza of Milan, cites no less than eleven operatic works founded upon the same episode in Dante's "Inferno," all of which have been composed during the present century: viz., by Borgatti (1827, at Genoa); Mercadante (1829, at Madrid); Generali (1829, at Venice); Quillicci (1831, at Florence); Staffa (1831, at Naples); Demasini (1841, at Milan); Canetti (1843, at Vicence); Froncheni (1857, at Lisbon); Marcarini (1871, at Milan); Cagnoni (1871, at Turin); Goetz (1877, at Mannheim)—the latter, however, having being left incomplete by the composer.

M. A. Guilmant's organ concerts of high-class music at the Paris Trocadéro are meeting with conspicuous success, the enormous hall being filled to overflowing whenever he plays.

The opera season of the Théâtre de la Monnaie at Brussels closed on the 3rd ult. with a performance of Massenet's "Hérodiade," under the personal direction of the young composer. The work has been produced here fifty-five times during the last six months.

Franz Liszt's oratorio "St. Elizabeth" was recently performed at Brussels for the first time in the French language with great success, the pianist-composer himself being present on the occasion.

At the last concert of the Antwerp Musical Society two works by native composers were performed with great success, viz., a "symphonic prologue" entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," by E. de Hartog, and a cantata by Nicolai.

M. Colonne, the director of the Paris Châtelet Concerts, has gone to Lisbon, where he will conduct the concerts annually given by the Musical Association of that town.

The death is announced, at Strasburg, of Georges Kastner, son of the well-known musical savant and composer, at the age of thirty. Georges Kastner was the inventor of the "pyrophone," a curious instrument demonstrating the utilisation for musical purposes of gas-flames burning in tubes.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Organ Concert, with orchestra, of M. A. Guilmant (May 11): Prelude and Fugue (Buxtehude); Air from "Résurrection de Lazare" (Raoul Pugno); Concerto, C major, for two pianofortes (Bach); Duet, "Oratorio de Noël" (Saint-Saëns); Andante with variations (Lemmens); Gavotte (Lulli); Funeral March, "Saul," Allegro, March, "Judas Maccabæus" (Handel); Symphony for organ and orchestra (Guilmant); Air, "Creation" (Haydn); Air for violoncello (Bach); Andantino (Salomé); Duet, "Israel in Egypt" (Handel); Fugue in D minor (D. Scarlatti). Organ Concert of M. A. Guilmant (May 25): Fantasia and Fugue (E. Bernard); Largo and Presto from Concerto in F minor (Bach); Air, "Armide" (Gluck); Andante and Romance sans paroles (Sivori); Air, "Tancred" (A. Campra); Prière and Caprice (Guilmant); Concerto in D (Handel); Air, "Hérodiade" (Massenet); "Le Trille du Diable" (Tartini); Air, "Judas Maccabæus" (Handel); Rigodon from "Dardanus" (Rameau); Toccata in F (Bach).

Baltimore.—Peabody Concert (April 15): L'Arlesienne, orchestral suite (Bizet); Pianoforte Concerto, E minor (Chopin); Songs (Gounod); Overture, "King Lear," Fragments from "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz); Students' Concert of the Peabody Institute (April 22): String Quartet, C major, Op. 76, and Pianoforte Trio, D minor, No. 13 (Haydn); Air, "Alicina" (Handel); Variations, Op. 12 (Chopin); Spinning Song and Hungarian Storm March (Liszt). Students' Concert of the Peabody Institute (April 29): String Quartet, C major (Svendsen); Rakoczy March (Liszt); Songs (Schumann); Pianoforte Trio, C minor (Raff).

New York.—Poughkeepsie Vocal Union, under the direction of Dr. F. L. Ritter (April 29): Symphony, C major (Beethoven); Fourth Psalm, for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra (F. L. Ritter); Chorus from "Joseph" (Méhul); Scherzo from "Fourth Symphony (Ritter); "Ave verum" (Mozart); Air and Chorus, "The heavens are telling, from "Creation" (Haydn); March, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner).

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TONIC SOL-FA AND STAFF NOTATION SYSTEMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—A letter from Mr. Fred. W. Wareham appeared in your last number, condemning the use of Sol-fa as an introduction to the Staff Notation, and containing the following statement: "Messrs. McNaught and Thomson, teaching students in Training Colleges, . . . are unable to get beyond their easy introductory notation in two years." It may be interesting to your readers, and instructive to Mr. Wareham, to know that at the end of every year the whole of our senior students are examined in "practical" music by Dr. Hullah, and at this examination each student sings at sight from the Staff Notation only. The results for 1881 have not yet been published, but I append a table of the marks gained for this sight-singing test in the four largest London Training Colleges at Christmas, 1880:—

COLLEGE.	NUMBER OF CANDIDATES EXAMINED.	AVERAGE NUMBER OF MARKS OBTAINED.
Battersea ... ..	55	26
Borough Road ... ..	64	31
Chelsea ... ..	59	25
Westminster (Mr. Thomson) ... ..	57	26
Average marks for all Colleges		24.5

Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Dr. Hullah's assistant, says in his Report: "The amount of musical ability exhibited by the students at Westminster was very considerable. . . . The class-singing was much above the average. . . . The teaching seemed to be thorough, and the students earnest in their work."

The following are the tabulated results of the examination in "theoretical" music, Christmas, 1881:—

COLLEGE.	NUMBER OF CANDIDATES EXAMINED.	PERCENTAGE OF MARKS OBTAINED.
Battersea ... ..	51	69
Borough Road ... ..	65	70
Chelsea ... ..	55	70
Westminster ... ..	55	71
Average marks for all Colleges		68

Mr. Wareham's statement does not harmonise well with these statistics, and it would have been better if that gentleman had ascertained the true facts of the case before making an assertion which, to say the least, is misleading and entirely unfounded.—I am, sir, yours sincerely,

R. DUNSTAN, Mus. Bac., Cantab.

Westminster Training College, May 15, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you kindly afford me space to deny the accuracy of the assertion in Mr. F. Wareham's letter of last month, that I was unable in my training-college work "to get beyond easy introductory notation in two years."

During the five years of my connection with Westminster College, whilst making Tonic Sol-fa the basis of my teaching, both notations have been used; and at his annual examinations, conducted (by desire) in the staff notation, Dr. Hullah has been able to award more than the average number of marks.

Among the students of these years may now be found one Mus. Bac., with others preparing for that degree, many good choirmasters, organists, solo vocalists, and past or present members of the orchestral band formed three years ago; but—above all—the majority of them are now teaching "singing by note" in their schools, upon the system learnt at college; it being well known that teachers from colleges in which Tonic Sol-fa is not taught rarely, if ever, do so.

Seeing that music is but one of many studies, and the college course is two years only, it is for Mr. Wareham to show better results before endeavouring to disparage the work of those who are trying to do the duty which falls to their lot with the best tools obtainable. After more than twenty years' experience of other methods, I would express my earnest conviction that the Tonic Sol-fa offers the easiest and best, because most natural, system of learning to sing at sight, and that a practical knowledge of it removes many difficulties and smooths the path of the student to the higher branches of musical art.

I am, sir, faithfully yours,

JAMES THOMSON, M.R.A.M.

9, Rectory Road, Stoke Newington.

ORGAN PEDALS ATTACHED TO PIANOFORTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—My best thanks are due to Mr. Alfred Spring for the very able and exceedingly favourable manner in which he has spoken in your last issue respecting my scheme of organ-pedal attachment to pianofortes, after his personal inspection of those I have in use. Everything he says of them is strictly correct, and I, like him and many other correspondents, including Miss Baily, of Glastonbury, much regret that, for reasons already stated in your valuable paper by me, they still remain in abeyance.

I had, indeed, hoped that since my letter in your number for last August they would have been patented and brought out before this; but I am sorry to say that, so far, I have received no encouragement from any firm to justify me in going to such an expense. I am, moreover, strongly impressed with the certainty that unless some house of influence in London can be prevailed upon to adopt them and bring them before the public, not much can be done, even if they are patented; and the only answer that I can get from such houses so far is that, however good a scheme of pedal attachment may be, they are not generally required, and thus alone I could not well succeed.

But this might almost have been said fifty or sixty years ago of organs even of moderate size, most of them being certainly without pedal pipes, or even pedals, their requirement not being then considered needful.

It is very evident there is a growing desire for pedals to pianofortes, provided they possess the advantages claimed by me, and fully attested by all who have seen them; and I certainly believe that if a really good and influential firm could be induced to come forward, they might be perfectly successful. Trusting that this will soon be the case,

I am, sir, yours respectfully,

JOSEPH SHAW,

Professor of Music, Organist of St. Luke's,
3, Coburg Street, Leeds, May 20, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have read with some surprise the remarks of several of your correspondents, to the effect that they cannot obtain a satisfactory action of organ pedals when attached to pianofortes.

I am in possession of a piano made by George Russell, and fitted with organ pedals by him; the action is very neat and reliable, and is never out of order; in which respect my experience is directly the reverse of that of your correspondent, who has had nothing but trouble and expense with his, for though I have had the piano in daily use for nearly two years (and it was not new when I had it) the pedal part has never required attention.

Indeed, looking at the action I do not see how it could be out of order except by the actual breakage of some part, which could only result from violence.

I shall be happy to show the instrument to any one who may care to see it.

I am sir, your obedient servant,

ORGAN PEDALS ATTACHED TO PIANOFORTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—For the information of your correspondents who wrote last month, stating that they found great difficulty in getting a satisfactory pedal attachment for pianofortes, I beg to say that I think they will find all that they require in the pedal action invented and patented by Mr. Rummens, of 102, Railton Road, Brixton.

I have examined the action and found it very satisfactory. I may also add that, from all appearance, the action would bear any amount of use without getting out of order. I have no other interest in writing but to give information which your correspondents appear to require.

I remain, sir, yours obediently,

GEO. SHINN, Organist of Brixton Church.

In addition to playing the accompaniments, Mr. Maxfield contributed a pianoforte solo, a piece of his own composition, "Chant des Sirènes," theme with variations.

Marriott, Mr. Sunman, and Mr. Bingley Shaw, vocalists. Solo organ and accompanist, Mr. A. Marriott. The principal feature of the evening was the excellent glee-singing of the Southwell Minster Choir.

WEM.—On April 27, in the National Schoolroom, the second and last Concert of the present session, in connection with the Choral Society, was given under the conductorship of Mr. Prendergast, Organist of the Parish Church. The solos were rendered principally by members of the Society, and amongst the part-songs and choruses, the following deserved special notice: "When the rosy morn" (E. A. Sydenham), "Now tramp" (Bishop), "Soul of living music" (W. W. Pearson), "Gloria" (Mozart), and "Like as the hart" (V. Novello).—On the 7th ult. Mr. Prendergast gave his usual monthly Organ Recital in the Parish Church, when selections from Handel, Mendelssohn, Donizetti, Rossini, &c., were performed.

WORCESTER.—The members of the Musical Union gave their fifth Concert at the Guildhall on Wednesday, April 26, before a large audience. The programme included selections from Judas Maccabaeus, Schubert's The Lord is my Shepherd, Hummel's "Rondeau du Société," and other works. The choir, which is composed almost entirely of amateurs living in the county of Worcester, was highly efficient, and the band gave two movements from one of Haydn's symphonies very creditably, and played the accompaniments to Hummel's rondo with admirable delicacy and taste. The rondo was well rendered by Mrs. Fitton, and Miss Elliott was most effective in the soprano solos in Judas. The Rev. E. V. Hall, Precursor of the Cathedral, conducted.

WORKSOP.—The second Concert of the Choral Society for the present season was given on April 26 at the Corn Exchange. The programme comprised Macfarren's Cantata May Day and a miscellaneous selection. Miss Rissman sang the soprano solo part in the Cantata with much success, and the choruses were well rendered throughout. In the miscellaneous portion the principal vocalists were Miss Rissman, Miss Ada Batley, Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac., Oxon., and Mr. Mackie; Mr. Hamilton White and Mr. Denman being solo pianists. Several part-songs were also given, all of which were sung with good effect. Mr. Hamilton White was an able Conductor.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. R. Frederic Tyler, A.M., Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mark's Church, Tunbridge Wells.—Mr. W. H. Waldron, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity Church, Worcester.—Mr. W. H. Bamford to St. Andrew-by-the-Wardrobe and St. Ann's, Blackfriars, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.—Mr. Edward R. Terry to St. James's, Camberwell.—Mr. Rowland Briant, Organist and Choirmaster to Eccleston Square Church.

BOOK I.—EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES.
PRICE 2s. 6d.

In this edition much help is offered toward a correct and effective rendering of Bach's Organ Music. The distribution of the parts between the two hands is clearly shown. The notes most conveniently played by the right hand are printed on the upper, and those best taken by the left hand on the lower, of the two manual staves. The pedalling is indicated where necessary. Marks of expression and phrasing are added occasionally, and suggestions for the effective use of the organ are given throughout. The preface contains many useful hints.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of
LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A.; Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,
English Juror at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON's Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

J. & J. HOPKINSON

Invite attention to the following Testimonials:—

I have had occasion to test HOPKINSON'S Pianos in London and in Paris, and I am bound to declare that with regard to power, evenness of tone, and equality of touch, I have found them of rare excellence.

They are Instruments that all Pianists ought to appreciate, for they allow them to give expression to their feelings, and to play with the most delicate nuances.

PARIS, July 23, 1878. (Signed) CH. GOUNOD.

I have played at the Paris Exhibition on Messrs. HOPKINSON'S Pianos, and I say with pleasure that the quality of sound has completely satisfied me, as well as the elasticity of touch, which leaves nothing to be desired.

(Signed) ANTOINE DE KONTSKI.

July 30, 1878.

I have had the opportunity of trying the excellent Pianos of Messrs. HOPKINSON, whose instruments have the qualities I esteem in a Piano; "they have a soul," which permits the performer to communicate the poetic feeling in his heart, and in the spirit necessary to forget himself in his performances.

(Signed) D. MAGNUS.

PARIS, July 30, 1878.

The Grand Pianos of HOPKINSON, London, are very remarkable. They are equal to those of the best Houses already known. All the qualities which can be demanded by an experienced virtuoso—vigour of attack, openness of sound, possibility to give the necessary shade to the music, and to produce effects of extreme delicacy—are found in HOPKINSON'S Pianofortes. They possess also a sonority of a crystalline nature, which gives them a certain charm, and characterises their own personality.

(Signed) NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,

Director of the Conservatoire of Moscow.

PARIS, August 3, 1878.

I state with pleasure that the Grand Pianos of Messrs. J. and J. HOPKINSON of London, which I have had the opportunity of hearing and of trying myself, are remarkable for their fabrication, and that they rival those of the best Houses of Paris and London for their wonderful power and elasticity of touch.

I should wish no other for my personal use, and to accompany me in my concerts.

(Signed) CH. NILSSON.

JULY 1, 1882.

SCHUMANN'S INSTRUMENTATION, AND HIS POSITION AS A SYMPHONIST:

BEING A SUPPLEMENT TO "CRITICAL EXCURSIONS."

BY FR. NIECKS.

My object in making the following remarks is to inquire how far the censures pronounced on the instrumentation and form of Schumann's symphonic works are justifiable.

In connection with the composer's instrumentation I shall first advert to an English critic whose ability and honesty did not prevent him from giving vent to the astounding opinion that it was time to rescure Schumann's symphonies. The remark, although made with apparent seriousness, was probably not seriously meant, and certainly cannot have been seriously considered. It is with Schumann's orchestral as with his pianoforte style—both are at times awkward and ineffective, but his instrumentation is so inseparably bound up with the character of his thoughts that the one cannot be altered without denaturalising—nay, perhaps even in part destroying—the other. If there are musicians who think that the composer's pianoforte style could be with advantage translated into that of Beethoven, or that of Chopin, Liszt, or Henselt, I am not one of them, and this I say with all respect for and full appreciation of the eminent excellences of these styles, whose superiority as styles I shall be the last person to call in question. For the same reason which prompts me to take up this attitude with regard to any tampering with Schumann's pianoforte works, I should tremble were the greatest instrumentators of our time, Wagner and Liszt, to reproduce his symphonies according to their own notions; I should fret were the more conservative Raff to subject them to a thorough revision; and I should grieve even were Brahms or some other disciple of the master's to retouch them with a reverent hand. As a rule, pictures are not repainted unless they are damaged; repainting, in fact, is resorted to for the purpose of restoration, not amelioration. And what has hitherto been the result of this comparatively modest process of restoration? Owing to it, if we may believe the best judges, the majority of the grandest art-works of the past have come down to us spoiled and ruined. I do not think that any man of sense ever proposed that the painting of an artist of individual power should be improved by the brush of another. Imagine the execration that would be heaped on the hapless cinquecento critic who should have advised and the graceless dilettante who should have commissioned Titian to repaint or retouch the canvases of Raphael! And yet there can be no doubt that the Venetian was a greater colourist than the master of Urbino. Nor would the case be materially altered by putting in the place of Raphael a less exalted artist. It is natural to wish for a harmonious union of qualities in all their perfection, but it is wise to remember that those who have des vertus are rarely without les vices de leurs vertus.

Expressions of extravagant opinions, however, can do little harm: they resemble fireworks in their evanescence as well as in their brilliance. More dangerous are those inexact or incomplete utterances of a sober complexion whose plausibleness assures for them a ready reception and unsuspecting confidence. He who, in discussing anything with apparent judicial fairness and thoroughness, censures its shortcomings severely and passes over its excellences in silence is sure to mislead many. Now this is exactly what has latterly been done as regards Schumann's instrumentation by a highly esteemed musician who is looked upon as one of our chief critical authorities, and justly so, for his professional and literary acquirements qualify him, and his practical and theoretical achievements specially entitle him to judge. Were he asked to explain his conduct he would probably answer, "Schumann's excellences are too well known to need pointing out; but it is a timely undertaking and a task worth doing to open people's eyes to his shortcomings." Although this completely exonerates the critic, it does not justify the unintentional or well-intentioned misrepresentations of his criticisms. What is the advantage of avoiding Charybdis if we are thrown on Scylla? Seeing that there never was and there certainly is not now any sign of a Schumann mania in this country, counteracting remedies seem to be uncalled for. But the fact is, we are under a wave of adverse Schumann criticism, and whilst it is passing over us we shall do well to remember a certain curious German proverb about pouring out the baby with the water.

By this time the reader will no doubt be losing all patience, and calling upon me to come to the point and state plainly what I have to say on the matter under discussion. Well, Schumann's orchestration is neither faultless nor on the whole exemplary. We meet in it with details which would surprise one everywhere except in the scores of the most inexperienced; and much in it is open to the reproach of dullness and heaviness. Of this sombreness of tone-colour we notice little or nothing in the first symphony, but his predilection for it increases with his years. In connection with this point we must not overlook the fact that the lack of brilliance and transparency is for the most part attributable to and in keeping with the character of the underlying thought—is, in fact, as far as interpretation goes, a felicitous effect, not a disastrous defect. Schumann's personality as reflected in his works may not always be absolutely pleasing; but, as in life so in art, we must respect individual singularities if we wish not to suppress individuality altogether, and level humanity to one vast expanse of tedious uniformity. Even if I were a more lukewarm lover of Robert Browning's poetry than I am, I should still think it preferable to have a Browning than a second Tennyson in his stead. Moreover, Schumann's instrumentation not only deserves something else than unmitigated blame, but even something better than benevolent sufferance and faint approval; for besides comparatively ineffective passages there are others where the composer shows himself a master in this particular branch of his art, and in not a few even an originator of novel effects of the greatest beauty. How much that is lovely, characteristic, and picturesque was given, and in part for the first time revealed, to the world in "Manfred" and in "Paradise and the Peri"! In more than one direction Schumann extends by means of his much-abused instrumentation the sphere of music; he makes us breathe new atmospheres, and initiates us into unapproached mysteries. One of his grandest deeds is the moving picture, unfolded in the overture to "Manfred," of the personality and inward struggle of the central figure of Byron's weird and fascinating creation—a picture which owes so much of its power to the impressive tone-colour. It would make too long a list to enumerate all the orchestral beauties of the symphonies; I shall confine myself to pointing out two passages which, like the overture to "Manfred," are distinguished by a peculiarly Schumanesque complexion—namely, the variation with violin solo of the Romanze, and the trio of the Scherzo in the D minor Symphony. "As regards orchestration," says Ambros, "Schumann followed entirely the same path as Mendelssohn, however one might say that he did not so frequently make use of transparent tints; of charming effects and blooming euphony he was not less capable." The latter part of the learned and spiritual historian's remark is doubtless true; and we may add that whilst Schumann's tone-colour is generally inferior to Mendelssohn's in transparency, he surpasses his rival often in depth, which, however, degenerates sometimes into turbidness. If it holds good at all that Schumann followed, in the matter of instrumentation, the path of Mendelssohn, it holds good only with regard to the B flat major Symphony. In this first orchestral work the composer's individuality manifests itself, but not so distinctly as in the subsequent ones, where, indeed, his style of instrumentation undergoes a considerable change. Reissmann—who holds that Schumann, because of his conception of the various instruments as melodious parts, even those that are not so by their nature, never acquired the proper orchestral polyphony—says that in the B flat major Symphony, "the first completely successful attempt to introduce the new romantic contents into the older forms," the instrumental element, out of which the motive seems to grow, accommodates itself to the dominating idea of the symphony; but that afterwards, when the composer endeavoured to transfer the whole new pianoforte style with its wealth of harmonies and chords to the orchestra, the latter lost not unfrequently for the ear the clearness and comprehensibility which it still retained for the eye.

Abroad, nothing is to be found comparable to the absolute reprobation of Schumann's orchestration which British critics seem to have made their speciality. I have already alluded to the proposals and strictures of two of them. A third, whose sweet reasonableness as well as undoubted conscientiousness I have always regarded with particular satisfaction, startled me not long ago by instancing Chopin and Schumann as parallel cases, their orchestral works standing equally in need of rescoring. It is impossible that the critic, who admires Schumann, saw at the time the injustice and perniciousness of the remark. As he is a man possessed of knowledge and experience, the only explanation of the otherwise hopelessly unsolvable riddle I can think of is that fancy and pen ran too fast for reflection to keep up with them. The difference between Chopin and Schumann is in reality quite enormous: the former made in his younger days a few attempts at writing for the orchestra (two concertos and some less notable pianoforte pieces with orchestral accompaniments), but did not advance beyond the stage of tyroship; the latter, on the other hand, wrote a very large number of important works both for the orchestra alone and for the orchestra with solo instruments, solo voices, and chorus—works which are not kept alive like those of Chopin by something outside the orchestra. Indeed, few composers have, as regards instrumentation, made a more brilliant début than Schumann with his first orchestral work, the B flat major Symphony, which fact is a striking proof that he was specially gifted also in this respect. That Schumann did not neglect the study of instrumentation, but, on the contrary, prosecuted it even later in life most assiduously, may be seen from certain entries in his Theaterbüchlein, a note-book which contains his impressions of the operas heard by him in Dresden during the years 1847-50. After hearing Boieldieu's "Jean de Paris," he writes, "The instrumentation

(to which now my attention is chiefly directed) is everywhere masterly—the wind instruments, particularly the clarinets and horns, are treated with predilection and nowhere overpower the voices; the celli are already here and there treated with effect as independent parts." The instrumentation of Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto" he characterises likewise as masterly, but finds that of Marschner's "Templer und Jüdin" somewhat lacking in clearness, and calls that of Auber's "La Muette" ("Masiello") abominable. Weber's "Euryanthe" evokes from him enthusiastic expressions such as "How the instruments sound! They speak to us from the innermost depth."

A few words respecting the composer's relative position as a symphonist shall bring our excursions into the wide tracts of Schumann-criticism to a conclusion.

In a letter which appeared in the Signale in 1877, Hans von Bülow says, "In spite of my admiring sympathy for Schubert's symphony, and for some movements (II., 1, 3; III., 1, 4, &c.) of Schumann's symphonies, I hold that Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony takes the first rank as a finished (abgeschlossenes) work of art." Suppose we grant the incontrovertibility of the judgment, viz.—that the unity of contents, the symmetry and lucidity of form, and their mutual correspondence are more perfect in Mendelssohn's work than in any one of Schubert's or Schumann's—does it entirely and finally dispose of the question concerning the relative value of these masters' works? Not at all. The question is not so simple, and consequently not so easily decided. And even from the purely artistic, or let us rather say formal and technical, point of view much diversity of opinion would be possible. For, unfortunately, there are no laws of taste, and in the absence of a code of laws, as Schiller justly remarks, the critic must either be silent or become judge and legislator at the same time. Hence individual liking and disliking determine the balance. Indeed, we are face to face with a problem of great complexity, which, like all art-problems, cannot be worked out in figures and demonstrated with mathematical precision. In a comparison of Mendelssohn and Schumann, for instance, the question is not of form and formlessness or of emptiness and fulness, but whether the lesser fulness and preciousness of contents and superior form of the one is preferable to the greater fulness and preciousness of contents and sometimes inferior form of the other. Not the cut and make alone, but also the cloth, has to be taken into account. Brendel, treating of these composers in his "History of Music," remarks, "Mendelssohn pays outward regard to what is effective; with him this fine discernment of what is becoming predominates. Schumann follows the dictates of his inner nature, and the new is something that springs forth unconsciously." Or, as one may say in other words, Schumann shows us more of the man, Mendelssohn more of the artist. Hence "Schumann awakens more immediate sympathy; Mendelssohn gives the impression of the finished and classical." The genesis of Schumann's and Mendelssohn's symphonies illustrates the character of the composers and their works. Whilst Schumann began the composition of a symphony with enthusiasm and finished it with impatience—his Symphony in E flat, No. 3, for instance, was sketched and scored between November 2 and December 9, 1850—Mendelssohn conceived their parts at different times and carried them about for years: he received the first impulse to write the A minor Symphony in Scotland in 1829, mentions it frequently in his letters, but had not finished it till January 20, 1842; he began the A major Symphony in Italy in 1830, brought it to a first hearing at a Philharmonic Concert in London on May 13, 1833, and died without having published it. But are the contents of Schumann's symphonies really superior to those of Mendelssohn's? As the choice is not between good and bad, the way in which this question will be answered depends on our individual temper and habitude. If we prefer emotional intensity and the glow and stir of romanticism, we shall give it to Schumann; if we prefer gentler moods and the restraint and serenity of classicism, we shall give our vote to Mendelssohn. Speaking of romanticism and classicism I cannot pass on without noting that Schumann is a romanticist with classical tendencies—Mendelssohn a classicist with romantic inspirations. Much has been written on those two great contemporary composers, and often the one has been abused for the glory of the other; whereas it would have been better to find out their peculiar virtues, and to "rejoice in the possession of two such fellows," as Goethe thought those people ought to have done who disputed whether he or Schiller were the greater poet.

But whilst it is impossible to determine to which of the three symphonists—to Schubert, Mendelssohn, or Schumann—precedence is due, we can declare unhesitatingly, and without ignoring their peculiar merits, that Beethoven is superior in rank to one and all of them. Schumann has been called the "heir of Beethoven." This, however, is a mere rhetorical flourish. There is no other kinship between them than that existing between all honestly and nobly striving musicians; and no other connection of predecessor and successor than the temporal one. Their respective individualities may be thus characterised. In Beethoven intellect and imagination are evenly balanced, or, if not quite evenly, with a slight inclination towards the side of the intellect; in Schumann, on the other hand, the imagination predominates decidedly over the intellect. Again, Beethoven is always master of himself and his art; Schumann allows himself to be carried away by the one or the other. Or, rather, in Beethoven man and artist check each other; in Schumann sometimes the man gets the better of the artist, sometimes the artist of the man. Schumann had neither Beethoven's subtlety of thought and powerful mental grasp, nor his masterly craftsmanship; still, unless stricken with utter blindness, we cannot fail to recognise the charm of his genius. For, although not a hero and prophet like Beethoven, he was a personality of great nobleness and richness; and if as a symphonist he did not advance beyond the point to which his predecessors had cut out a new road, he opened at least many lovely and romantic paths into the surrounding country. In short, although in the rear of Beethoven, Schumann, if not ahead of, is abreast with the best of the post-Beethoven symphonists; and this distinguished position is assured to him by the truly living contents of his works, the outcome of a beautiful and significant individuality.

"PARSIFAL"

AN ANALYSIS OF WAGNER'S FESTIVAL DRAMA

By F. CORDER.

We are now to suppose that the strange youth Parsifal has wandered away from Monsalvat, beyond the mountains to Klingsor's magic castle, in which the second act takes place. There is a short prelude of an agitated and sinister character, principally formed on two motives which have appeared casually in the first act, during Gurnemanz's explanations, but which we refrained from quoting then to avoid complication. These are—the "magic-spell" -motive, and—the several phrases of which, either together or separately, characterise the magician Klingsor himself. These two motives, together with the Kundry figure (No. 7), form the unpleasing material of the opening scene—a strange, wild conception, both in drama and music. Klingsor, sitting in his tower and surrounded by the mysterious implements of his craft, becomes conscious that the "pure fool" is approaching his domain. By his spells he accordingly summons the spirit of Kundry, whose body lies locked in magic sleep in a thicket on Monsalvat, to his side. From what ensues, we glean some more particulars of the wild woman's history. She is that Herodias who, according to tradition, demanded and obtained John the Baptist's head, and was doomed to eternally wander the earth in consequence. Wagner, however, with a view of concentrating the interest, rather boldly makes her crime that of having laughed at Christ on the cross. While half her life is spent in serving the Knights of the Grail, she becomes from time to time subject to the power of Klingsor, and, as one of his sirens, has seduced many a knight from the path of virtue—Amfortas among them. In vain she writhes, and howls, and moans: Klingsor compels her to obey him, and now to use her arts against the approaching foe, Parsifal. Her torture is all the greater, as she knows that the one who successfully resists her sets her free.

Parsifal now approaches, and Klingsor, looking over the rampart, describes how he attacks the garrison of besotted knights, putting them speedily to flight, and forcing an entrance. Kundry is dismissed to her task, and the scene changes to the lovely magic garden of the castle. Bands of houris, awakened by the alarm, rush in from all sides, wildly exclaiming. This wonderful choral scene is for sopranos only, in as many as eighteen separate groups, and frequently in twelve real parts. A peculiar restless, chromatic figure, repeated almost incessantly for forty bars, is the chief feature here:—

No. 9 is added to it when Parsifal appears upon the walls, and looks down in astonishment upon the maidens, who at first assail him with reproaches, but soon, recovering the loss of their lovers, coax him to join their gambols. They adorn themselves with flowers and throng round him, singing the most seductive of choruses:—

Come! come! love-ly strip - ling! Come!

No. 17.

Strings.

come! I'll be thy flow - er! &c.

They presently get to quarrelling for him—and Parsifal, not appreciating their attentions, gets bored and seeks to fly. This is more than the audience will do, for this scene cannot but be most charming in performance, the graceful rhythm and sweet plaintive melody forming so wonderful a contrast to the wild and somewhat chaotic style of the rest of the act. In the midst of the struggle a voice from a flowery thicket calls, "Parsifal, tarry!" to the bewilderment of the youth, who only dimly remembers this name as having been murmured by his mother once in a dream. Now the branches separate and Kundry appears—but Kundry in quite another shape. No longer the swarthy wild witch of the first act, but a beautiful siren arrayed in floating drapery—a very Venus. Reclining on a bank of flowers, she again bids Parsifal stay, and dismisses the nymphs, who sing, as they reluctantly depart—Farewell! farewell!

No. 18.

Thou fair one, thou proud one!

Thou fool!

The pause here has rather an unfortunate effect in English. You are requested not to fill it up.

Kundry now proceeds to win the youth's interest by talking to him of his mother. A long solo, "I saw the child upon its mother's breast," reminding Parsifal of his boyhood, his flight, and his mother's death, has considerable melodious beauty and pathetic expression, but is sadly crippled by the tortuous harmonies and the endeavour to construct the whole out of nothing but the "heart's affliction"-motive, No. 10. Parsifal is maddened by sorrow and remorse:—

No. 19.

My mother! my mother! Could I forget her?
Ah! must all be forgotten by me?
What have I e'er remembered yet?
But senseless folly dwells in me!

The wily temptress bids him seek refuge from folly and sorrow in love. Clinging to him, she presses her lips to his, but at the touch Parsifal springs up maddened and terrified. The scene which follows is very strangely conceived. Parsifal, perfectly ignorant and innocent, only possessed by a blind instinct of his holy mission, spurns Kundry and her temptations, without appearing to realise fully what it is that he rejects. She, in a wild and terrible speech, reveals the awful secret of her being, and is filled with the mad delusion that Parsifal can save her by loving her. One supreme phrase in her description of her sin and its punishment we must quote as the most astonishingly unvoiced specimen in even all Wagner's writings:—

No. 20.

I saw Him, Him, and mocked Him;

To Kundry's wild appeals for pity and love, Parsifal only replies—

Love and Redemption thou shalt lack not,
If the way
To Amfortas thou wilt show.

In a frenzy of despair and rage, Kundry curses him and his mission:—

All paths and courses
Which from me would part thee,
Here—I curse them to thee!
Wander—wander!
Thou whom I trust—
Thee will I give as his guide!

The last two lines are addressed to Klingsor, who appears upon the castle-wall at her summons, bearing the magic spear. The magician, finding all else fail, attempts to kill Parsifal by throwing the spear at him. Lo, a miracle! It remains floating over the intended victim's head. He grasps it, and now his turn comes. Making the sign of the cross with it, he curses Klingsor's power, and immediately the castle falls to ruins, the lovely garden withers up to a desert, and Kundry falls senseless. The departing Parsifal, turning to her from the summit of the ruins, says sternly:—

Thou know'st
Where only we shall meet again!

It is perhaps rash to express an opinion on anything of Wagner's from merely the written notes, but there is certainly nothing that can be, by the widest stretch of courtesy, called musical beauty in this act, apart from the one scene of the flower-nymphs and the first speech of Kundry. Of course the intense dramatic interest compensates for this to a certain extent, but we venture to think that the composer might have gained his end with a less lavish expenditure of extreme harmonies.

In the third and last act, the gloom deepens to an almost distressing pitch. There is a short orchestral introduction, the broken and vague rhythm and sombre harmonies of which seem intended to illustrate Parsifal's blind wanderings. A new theme opens it—and a curious variation of No. 6 follows:—

No. 21.
Adagio.

There is also an odd variation of the "fool"-motive—

the character of which nothing can hide. The curtain then rises and shows a lovely spring landscape. Some years have apparently elapsed, for Gurnemanz is now extremely aged, and is living here as a hermit (for some unexplained reason). Hearing a groaning issue from a thicket, he tears the bramble growth of years away and discovers the inanimate form of Kundry, just as he found her once before in Titurcl's time. With much trouble he restores her to life (in her original form) and she quietly goes to her work as a servant of the Grail, as if nothing had happened. While he is gazing in wonder at this miracle a knight in black armour appears through the trees. It is Parsifal, as the music (No. 9) announces to us. In his hand he bears the sacred spear; and he seems all through the Act in a dreamy half-conscious state, not even answering Gurnemanz' eager inquiries for some time. He is bidden to doff his arms, for to-day is the day of all others most sacred in Monsalvat—Good Friday:—

Parsifal relates how he has wandered and wandered vainly in search of Monsalvat, how he has ever carried the spear in his hand, though forbidden to use it, and so suffered countless defeats and distresses. Gurnemanz in return tells a long story of the misery now reigning in Monsalvat. We learn that Amfortas has refused to torture himself any more by uncovering the Grail, and that in consequence Titurcl has died, and all the knights have withered with age. A phrase founded on No. 21 taken in diminution—pervades this scene, which is followed by an incident which cannot but shock the minds of any audience. Before conducting the rescuer, Parsifal, to Amfortas, Gurnemanz and Kundry remove his armour and bathe his feet in the brook. Kundry then takes a golden flask of ointment from her bosom and pours its contents upon his feet, which she then dries with her hair! Gurnemanz anoints Parsifal's head and blesses him, and then he in his turn sprinkles Kundry with water and baptises her in the name of the Redeemer. Here No. 3 comes in very beautifully, and soon yields to a suave new melody as Parsifal gazes round on the smiling landscape:—

No. 25.

We must quote the words of this tenderly poetical scene:—

Parsifal.

How fair the woods and meadows seem to-day!
Many a magic flow'r I've seen,
Which sought to clasp me in its baneful twinnings;
But none I've seen so sweet as here—
These shoots that burst into blossom,
Whose odour recalls my childhood's days,
And speaks of loving trust to me.

Gurnemanz.

That is Good Friday's spell, my lord.

Parsifal.

Alas, that day of agony!
Now surely everything that thrives,
That breathes and lives and lives again,
Should only mourn and sorrow?

Gurnemanz.

Thou see'st, that is not so.
The sad, repentant tears of sinners
Have here with holy rain
Besprinkled field and plain,
And made them glow with beauty.
All earthly creatures in delight
At the Redeemer's trace so bright Uplift their prayers of duty.

* * * * *
And now perceive each blade and meadow-flower
That mortal foot to-day it need not tread;
For as the Lord in pity man did spare,
And in His mercy for him bled,
All men will keep with pious care
To-day a tender tread.
Then thanks the whole creation makes
With all that flow'rs, and fast goes hence,
That trespass-pardoned Nature wakes
Now to her day of Innocence.

(Kundry has slowly raised her head again, and gazes with moist eyes earnestly and calmly up at Parsifal.)

Parsifal.

I saw my scornful mockers wither:
Now look thee for forgiveness hither?
Like a sweet dew a tear from thee too floweth:
Thou weapest—see! the landscape groweth.

(He kisses her softly on the brow.—Distant bells are heard pealing.)

It is with anything but pleasure that we find this beautiful scene give place to one of almost unredeemed harshness. As Gurnemanz and Kundry conduct the hero to the castle the scene changes panorama-wise, as in the first Act, but to very different music. A bass-figure—

No. 26.

descriptive of the mourning knights, leads us through endless changes of key, accompanying the lugubrious theme, No. 19, on the wood-wind. The ground-bass of the four bells (No. 11) appears with the most fearful and wonderful harmonies built on it. Presently we find ourselves again in the hall of the Grail, and gloomy trains of knights enter, bearing Amfortas, the Grail in its shrine, and Titurcl in his coffin. They tell us what they are doing in doleful recitative, and make a last earnest appeal to the king to reassume his office:—

Sorrow! Sorrow Thou guard of the Grail!
Be once more only
Warned of thy duty to all.

Amfortas' despair and agony are really awful in their intensity. He springs to his feet (for the first time in the opera) and tearing open his dress, shrieks—

Behold me! The open wound behold!
Here is my poison—my streaming blood.
Take up your weapons! bury your sword-blades
Deep—deep in me, to the hilts!
Ye heroes, up!
Kill both the sinner and his pain:
The Grail's delights will ye then regain.

As the knights stand transfixed with awe, Parsifal enters with his friends and, advancing to the king, touches him with the spear, saying:—

Be whole, unsullied and absolved!
For I now govern in thy place.
Oh blessed be thy sorrows;
For Pity's potent might
And knowledge' purest pow'r
They taught a timid Fool.

* * * * *
Hid be no more that shape divine:
Disclose the Grail! Open the shrine!

(The boys open the shrine; Parsifal takes from it the "Grail," and kneels, absorbed in its contemplation, silently praying. The "Grail" glows with light; a halo of glory pours down over all. Titivel, for the moment reanimated, raises himself in benediction in his coffin. From the dome descends a white dove, which hovers over Parsifal's head. Kundry, looking up at Parsifal, sinks slowly to the ground, dead. Amfortas and Gurnemanz kneel in homage before Parsifal).

All.

(With voices from the middle and extreme heights, so soft as to be scarcely audible).

Wondrous work of mercy!
Salvation to the Saviour!
(The curtain closes).

This ending music is a curiously woven compound of the Grail themes, Nos. 1, 2 and 3, with the "Fool"-motive No. 8, added. This conclusion should be very solemn and fine in performance, though we confess to having expected something more imposing and more fully developed.

It must strike every one that Wagner has here given us his most noble and impressive drama from a poetic point of view. To have selected a sacred subject for operatic treatment we cannot but regard as a grave error of judgment, however reverent the spirit in which it is carried out. Of course such a drama is tabooed for ever from the English stage, which is the more to be regretted as there are scenes which would do more to advance the composer's fame than perhaps anything else which he has written. Even in Germany it would be rash to predict popularity for the work. Not only are the singers' parts peculiarly trying and thankless—even for Wagner—and the mise-en-scène of almost insuperable difficulty, but the grave blemishes above noticed must be felt everywhere. Then, too, Gurnemanz will be recognized as a near relative of Wotan's, by his dreadful habit of making dreary speeches. But turning from the disagreeable duty of finding fault with a great work, we ourselves confess to looking forward to the Bayreuth Festival of this month with feelings of the most intense eagerness and curiosity.

Eagerness to hear and see a work which merely on paper is a masterpiece—curiosity to judge of the actual effect of what seem to be exquisite beauties and—alas!—wild uglinesses. If "Parsifal" is, as we are inclined to believe on short acquaintance, a greater work than any which has preceded it, we cannot deny that not only are the beauties more transcendent, but also the points which provoke censure are more serious than ever.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XI.—CHOPIN (concluded from page 317).

"HOPE springs eternal in the human breast," and Chopin, who returned to Paris none the better, but all the worse, for experience of our insular climate, may have listened to her words in the optimist spirit often attendant upon a disease which, though, like Justice, it has hands of iron, has feet of lead. We shall presently see that to the last there were moments when he still dreamed of a future in this world—a future so certain as to demand earnest and serious preparation. Nevertheless, the master sustained a heavy blow shortly after he had again settled down in Paris. He looked upon his physician, the famous Dr. Molin, as the prop of his life, and at a critical moment that support failed him; the man who saved others being unable to save himself. The effect of this bereavement upon Chopin was serious. Karasowski tells us that thenceforth he "despaired of himself," and Liszt says "he felt his loss painfully—nay, it brought a profound discouragement with it. At a time when the mind exercises so much influence over the progress of the disease, he persuaded himself that no one could replace the trusted physician, and he had no confidence in any other. Dissatisfied with them all, without any hope from their skill, he changed them constantly. A kind of superstitious depression seized him. No tie stronger than life, no love powerful as death, came now to struggle against this bitter apathy." How would it have been had Madame Sand then gone to his side—she of whom the writer just quoted remarks: "Madame Sand never ceased to be for Chopin that being of magic spells who had snatched him from the valley of the shadow of death, whose power had changed his physical agony into the delicious languor of love." Again, we read that, under her care, the funereal oppression which secretly sapped the spirit of Chopin, destroying and corroding all contentment, gradually vanished. He permitted the amiable character, the cheerful serenity of his friend, to chase sad thoughts and mournful presentiments away, and to breathe new force into his intellectual being. Now, alas! there was no gifted and trusted physician to strengthen the weak body, and no loving spirit to minister to a mind diseased. Chopin became a derelict on the troubled sea of life, drifting steadily towards the rocks in a waning light. In this emergency the master learned that his constant friend, Titus Wozsiechowski, was about to visit Ostend for sea-bathing, and he yearned to grasp that faithful hand. Two letters expressive of this wish are given by Karasowski,* and have a melancholy interest as being the last their writer ever penned. In the first, dated August 20, 1849, Chopin said:—

"Nothing but my present severe illness should prevent me from hastening to you at Ostend; but I hope that, by the goodness of God, you may be enabled to come to me. The doctors will not allow me to travel. I am in my own room, drinking Pyrenean water, but your presence would do me more good than all the medicines."

* Karasowski, vol. ii., pp. 316, 317.

The second letter was written on September 12, and in it we read:—

"I have not had time to see about the permission for you to come here.* I cannot go for it myself as I lie in bed half my time, but have asked a friend who has a good deal of influence to see about it for me, and shall hear something definite by Sunday. I wanted to go by rail to the frontier at Valenciennes to meet you, but the doctors forbid my leaving Paris, because a few days ago I was not able to get as far as Ville d'Avray, near Versailles, where I have a godson. You see it is only illness that keeps me; had I been tolerably well I should certainly have gone to Belgium to visit you. Perhaps you may be able to come here. I am not egotistical enough to wish that you should come merely for my sake, for, ill as I am, you would be wearied and disappointed, although I think we might pass some pleasant hours recalling youthful memories, and I wish the time we do have together to be an entirely happy one."

"From that day," says Chopin's most trustworthy biographer, "the disease made rapid strides." The master heard the words, "Set thy house in order, for thou shalt die and not live," and he obeyed; looking up his manuscripts from time to time, retouching some and destroying others, in dread of post-mortem misrepresentation by hungry inheritors and eager speculators. Chopin did not fear death, but faced him with the calmness that, at the last, never deserts a great soul. The grisly monster of Gothic fancy may indeed have appeared to this suffering creature as a good angel sent to lead him to a place of rest: "the liberator of him whom freedom cannot release, the physician of him whom medicine cannot cure, and the comforter of him whom time cannot console." Nevertheless, while life remained, the instinct which clings to it suggested a possibility of continuance, and the dying man actually busied himself with taking and furnishing a new house (12, Place Vendôme), over the threshold of which he was destined never to pass. In the intervals of relief from pain, the most minute details connected with this matter were regulated by the master, nor would he give it up when all hope had gone. Indeed, Chopin's furniture was being moved into the new residence on the very day when he was called away to an eternal habitation. Liszt makes some interesting comments upon these facts:†—

"Did he fear that Death would not fulfil his plighted promise? Did he dread that, after having touched him with his icy hand, he would still suffer him to linger upon earth? . . . There is a double influence often felt by gifted temperaments when upon the eve of some event which is to decide their fate. The eager heart, urged on by a desire to unravel the mystic secrets of the unknown Future, contradicts the cooler, the more timid intellect, which fears to plunge into the uncertain abyss of the coming fate. This want of harmony between the simultaneous previsions of the mind and heart often causes the firmest spirits to make assertions which their actions seem to contradict, yet actions and assertions both flow from the differing sources of an equal conviction. Did Chopin suffer from the inevitable dissimilarity between the prophetic whispers of the heart and the thronging doubts of the questioning mind?"

Liszt's query is interesting in its bearing upon our complex nature, and there can be little doubt that the duality he describes is a fact within the conscious experience of most observant persons. If so with Chopin, the master soon found that events favoured the "eager heart," and compelled the "timid intellect" to their will. His disease progressed so rapidly that, at the beginning of October, he could no longer sit up, and his sister Louise (Madame Jędrzejewicz) hurried to his bedside. "From week to week," says Liszt, "and soon from day to day, the cold shadow of death gained upon him. His end was rapidly approaching; his crises grew more frequent, and each resembled more and more a mortal agony." But the master retained his calmness and even the reserve which distinguished him through life. Few people were admitted to his bedside, and some of these he did not ask to see. Meanwhile, he gave his final instructions with as much precision as resignation; desiring especially to be buried in Père la Chaise, by the side of Bellini, whom he admired and had, during the Italian composer's residence in Paris, learned to love. This done, nothing remained but to wait for the end, cheered by the constant presence and sympathy of a few devoted friends, among whom were M. Gutman, his sister and the Countess Delphine Potocka. The spectacle was touching and impressive—a propos, Liszt observes:—

"However violent or frivolous the passions may be which agitate our hearts; whatever strength or indifference may be displayed in meeting unforeseen or sudden accidents, which would seem necessarily overwhelming in their effects, it is impossible to escape the impression made by the imposing majesty of a lingering and beautiful death, which touches, softens, fascinates, and even elevates the souls least prepared for holy and sublime emotions. The lingering and gradual departure of one among us for those unknown shores, the mysterious solemnity of his secret dreams, his commemoration of past facts and passing ideas when still breathing upon the narrow strait which separates time from eternity, affect us more deeply than anything else in the world. Sudden catastrophes . . . remove us less sensibly from all the fleeting attachments, 'which pass, which can be broken, which cease,' than the prolonged view of a soul conscious of its own position, silently contemplating the multiform aspects of time, and the mute door of eternity. The courage, the resignation, the elevation, the emotion, which reconcile it with that inevitable dissolution so repugnant to all our instincts, certainly impress the bystanders more profoundly than the most frightful catastrophes, which, in the confusion they create, rob the scene of its still anguish, its solemn meditation."

This is well said, and Liszt is no less happy in describing one of the scenes witnessed in Chopin's death-chamber. Karasowski pictures it also, but in colours much more faint than those used by the ardent and rhapsodical Hungarian. The 15th of October had come, and the end was very near. Attack followed attack, to the great distress of the onlookers, among whom was the Countess Potocka, who stood at the foot of the bed, "tall, straight, dressed in white, resembling the beautiful angels created by the imagination of the most devout among the painters." Upon her the eyes of the sick man rested on recovering from a paroxysm:—

"Without doubt he supposed her to be a celestial apparition; and when the crisis left him a moment in repose, he requested her to sing; they deemed him at first seized with delirium, but he eagerly repeated his request. Who could have ventured to oppose his wish? The piano was rolled to the door of his chamber, while, with sobs in her voice, and tears streaming down her cheeks, his gifted countrywoman sang. . . . She sang that famous Canticle to the Virgin which, it is said, once saved the life of Stradella. 'How beautiful it is!' he exclaimed.

* At that time Russian subjects were not allowed to visit Paris without special license.

'My God, how very beautiful! Again, again!' Though overwhelmed with emotion, the Countess had the noble courage to comply with the last wish of a friend, a compatriot; she again took a seat at the piano, and sang a hymn from Marcello. Chopin again feeling worse, everybody was seized with fright; by a spontaneous impulse all who were present threw themselves upon their knees—no one ventured to speak; the sacred silence was only broken by the voice of the Countess, floating, like a melody from heaven, above the sighs and sobs which formed its mournful earth-accompaniment. It was the haunted hour of twilight; a dying light lent its mysterious shadows to this sad scene; the sister of Chopin, prostrated near his bed, wept and prayed, and never quitted this attitude of supplication while the life of the brother she had so cherished lasted."

"Let me have music dying, and I seek no more delight," said the young English poet whose body rests outside the walls of Rome. Such a joy and consolation had Chopin; but no Orpheus could redeem him from the gates of death. On the following morning the master seemed a little stronger, and received the sacrament from the hands of a priest of his own nationality, after which he summoned his friends to his bedside one by one, "calling down the grace of God fervently upon them, their affections and their hopes," and bidding them a final farewell. At two o'clock on the 17th the patient woke up from a convulsive sleep, in the agony of death. "Who is near me?" he asked. Then he bent to kiss the hand of M. Gutman, who supported him, and died in the very act. "He died as he had lived," says Liszt, "in loving." The next day the corpse, the bed, the room, were almost buried in flowers sent by kind souls who remembered what an affection the departed musician had for those lovely creations of nature: "He seemed to repose in a garden of roses. His face regained its early beauty, its purity of expression, its long unwonted serenity. Calmly, with his youthful loveliness, so long dimmed by bitter suffering, restored by death, he slept, among the flowers he loved, the last long and dreamless sleep." The "eager heart" at length knew the rest it sought, and there was an end for ever of the contest between soul and body so well described by Dryden:—

As some faint pilgrim, standing on the shore,
First views the torrent he would venture o'er,
And then his inn upon the farther ground—
Loth to wade through, and loth to go round;
Then, dipping in his staff, does trial make
How deep it is, and, sighing, pulls it back;
Sometimes resolves to fetch his leap, and then—
Runs to the bank, but there stops short again.

Chopin's death seems to have made but little impression in England. The leading musical journal of the day had not an editorial word to say about it, and was content to insert fifteen lines from a Paris correspondent, who wrote: "The death of M. Chopin cannot but be lamented by all the lovers and followers of the art. He was certainly one of the most eminent and one of the most original men in his particular sphere, and his influence on his contemporaries has been very considerable." True enough, but how little as a tribute laid on the fresh grave of one so eminent. In November, however, the same correspondent forwarded a short biography of the master, remarkable for, amongst other things, a defence of Chopin against those who charged him with certain social faults: "Owing to his retired way of living, and his habitual reserve, Chopin had few friends in the profession, and, indeed, spoiled from his original nature by the caprice of society, he was too apt to treat his brother artists with a supercilious hauteur which many of his equals, and a few who were his superiors, were wont to stigmatise as insulting. But, from want of sympathy with the man, they overlooked the fact that a pulmonary complaint, which for years had been gradually wasting him to a shadow, rendered him little fit for the enjoyments of society or the relaxations of artistic conviviality. In short, Chopin, in self-defence, was compelled to live in comparative seclusion, but we wholly disbelieve that this isolation had its source in unkindness or egotism. We are the more inclined to this opinion by the fact that the few intimate friends whom he possessed in the profession (and some of them were pianists) were as devotedly attached to him as the most romantic of his aristocratic worshippers." The opinion expressed by the Musical World was, no doubt, that of all reasonable and charitable men acquainted with the facts of the case.

The master's funeral took place on November 30, and was of a character commensurate with the esteem in which the élite of Parisian society held him. The Madeleine was hung with black; four thousand persons attended the religious ceremony, and a musical service of special importance did honour to the departed composer. As the mourning train entered the church, Chopin's own Funeral March, arranged for the Conservatoire orchestra by M. Reber, added to the solemnity of the occasion. Meyerbeer and Prince Adam Czartoryski followed immediately after the body, the pall being borne by Eugène Delacroix, the painter, M. Franchomme, M. Gutman—in whose arms the master died—and Prince Alexander Czartoryski. The Requiem Mass was Mozart's—chosen by Chopin himself; solos by Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, M. Dupont, and Signor Lablache, who had taken the same part at the funeral of Beethoven, twenty-two years before. At the offertory, M. Lefébure-Wély performed on the organ the master's Preludes in B and E minor, and, as the congregation dispersed, improvised upon a number of themes from his various works. All possible musical significance thus given to the obsequies of the composer, the procession set out for Père la Chaise, where, in accordance with Chopin's wish, a grave had been prepared next to the resting-place of his friend Bellini, and close to that of Cherubini, as well as of Habeneck and Marie Milanollo, one of the gifted sister violinists. To such company Chopin was brought. The coffin was lowered, and, without a word being said, the mourners filled the grave with flowers and went their way.

The flowers that covered the remains of Chopin were in themselves tributes of affection, but they foreshadowed the homage of admiration which his works were destined to command when better known. It was not in the nature of things that the master should hear with living ears the shouts of an applauding world. His art was too distinctive and peculiar for that. His ideas as well as his utterance were strange, and the spirit that animated his music was in itself sui generis. He had, therefore, to die only half understood; but, let us hope, with a consciousness that Time, the great revealer, would do for him what remained to be done. Be that as it may, time has accomplished the task, and now Chopin suffers from excess of favour. His music, so difficult in spirit, and by no means easy as regards the letter, is in everybody's hands, and sounds from every concert platform, but how grievously abused! More often than not its subtle essence is wanting and its delicate flavour lost. We see only the "spectral bones and ribs" of a creation instinct with feeling, grace, and loveliness, and we are tempted to ask "What is this man better than his fellows?" To the few, however, Chopin is something more than a fashion blindly followed. He is the high priest of a sweet and subtle art-mystery; the delineator of ideas which are "caviare to the general," the revealer of a world, in little no doubt, but with a complex and elaborate beauty discernible by all who with patience look at it in the true light. This is Chopin's peculiar distinction and glory. He was no Beethoven, to scale the highest height and sound the deepest depth of music. He laboured within a small field, but he showed what infinite loveliness and charm may be found in the minute things of art as well as of nature.

PEARSALL: A MEMOIR.

By JULIAN MARSHALL.

THE published lives of Pearsall are all so meagre and unsatisfactory that it seems worth while to put together briefly the principal facts and dates of his career, drawn from public and private sources, and not inopportune at a time when the lives of foreign artists are being exhaustively treated by very able hands.

Robert Lucas Pearsall, who afterwards assumed the particle de before his surname, was born on March 14, 1795, at Clifton, of an old Gloucestershire family. His father, Richard Pearsall, who died during the boyhood of his son, had held a commission in the army. His father's mother, Philippa Still, was descended from John Still, Bishop of Bath and Wells, and a composer in the reign of Elizabeth. Educated, not at a public school, but by private tutors, the boy soon manifested an enthusiastic love of music. At thirteen he had already composed a Cantata, "Saul and the Witch of Endor," which was privately printed. Much of his musical taste he inherited or acquired from his mother, Elizabeth Lucas, who used to play Corelli from a figured bass, to the boy's great delight. In deference to her wishes, he was educated for the bar, devoting, however, most of his spare time to the study of music, and some also to that of fortification, for which latter subject he had a strong bent. He showed, meanwhile, a great facility for literary composition, which enabled him to throw off a considerable number of ballads and songs which do credit to his poetical powers. In his search after everything curious relating to music he amassed a valuable collection of treatises, which were afterwards presented by one of his daughters to the Benedictine Abbey of Einsiedlen, in Switzerland. He had, besides, a talent for drawing; and, feeling always a great interest in antiquarian research, he stored up in his sketch-books a large number of illustrations of the architecture, furniture, costume, weapons, and instruments of torture, of the Middle Ages. He contributed many of the plates to Von Hefter's "Geschichte der Geräthschaften des Mittelalters."

In 1817 he married. In 1821 he was called to the bar, and for some time he went the Western Circuit; contributing in his spare moments to Blackwood and other publications, including some musical criticisms in the Bristol newspapers. In 1825, having had a slight attack of apoplexy, he left England for change of air, and visited Brussels, Bruges, Liège, and finally Mayence, where he remained nearly four years, associating continually with a number of friends who had musical, antiquarian, and literary tastes thoroughly congenial with his own. Here he became the pupil of Joseph Panny, an eminent contrapuntist, and began to study seriously. He composed in 1828 an overture, which was performed, and other instrumental music; and he translated Schiller's "Wilhelm Tell," into English verse, which was published in London by Bull.

In 1829 Pearsall returned to England, and stayed for more than a year at Willsbridge House, his family seat; but he rejoined his family at Baden in 1830, and subsequently settled in Karlsruhe, for the sake of the educational advantages of that town. There he helped to found a society for the performance of sacred and other serious music by the great Italian masters, and wrote a characteristic overture to "Macbeth," introducing the "Witches' Chorus." This was performed in several places in Germany with good success, and was published by Schott in 1839. Travelling to other German towns, he met at Munich the celebrated Ett, then very old, who still preserved the traditional severe style of church music. Under this master, Pearsall acquired much of that skill which distinguishes the choral works that he subsequently composed. At Vienna he became acquainted with Kiesewetter, with whom he afterwards corresponded. Still interested in antiquarian research, he made a lengthened stay at Nuremberg, investigating the so-called "Kiss of the Virgin," a barbarous engine of torture which was formerly applied to real or suspected criminals; and on this subject he wrote an exhaustive paper, which was published by the Society of Antiquaries in London, as was also another monograph on "Judicial Combats."

In 1836 he revisited England, and heard with delight some performances of the Bristol and London Madrigal Societies. From this period date his first works in the madrigalian style; and he wrote, about the same time, a treatise in German on this kind of composition, which appeared in a German periodical. Soon after this, he sold (1837-8) Willsbridge House, to which he had succeeded on his mother's death, and resolved for the future to live abroad. In 1842 he bought the castle of Wartensee, on the Lake of Constance, and restored the ruined parts of it in 1851, after a short visit, which proved to be his last, to England. At Wartensee Pearsall wrote his largest and best musical works, some of which remain yet unpublished—"Psalmody: an Essay," 1842; a Motett in four parts, 68th Psalm, 1847; an Anthem in four parts, 77th Psalm, "Voce meâ," 1849; "My heart is fixed," 57th Psalm, 1849; "Analysis of a Fugue," 1849; "Letters on Church Music," 1850; "System of Chanting," 1851; "Musica Sacra Gregoriana," 1852; "Tu es Petrus," Te Deum, "Ecce quam bonum," 1853; "Salve Regina," 1855; and that which he himself considered his chef-d'œuvre, a Requiem. He co-operated in the revision of the old hymn-book of St. Gall, a labour which occupied him for several years. This work—"Katholisches Gesangbuch zum Gebrauch bei dem öffentlichen Gottesdienste," 1863,—has a wide circulation to this day, and was found by one of Pearsall's daughters in use in the church at Copenhagen in 1868. His last literary work was a translation of "Faust" into English verse. Pearsall kept almost open house at Wartensee, receiving with hospitality all those who came to visit him, to converse about music, literature, or antiquarian topics, or merely to see the castle, which was architecturally interesting. His friend the Bishop of St. Gall here received him into the Roman Church.

On August 5, 1856, an attack of apoplexy carried Pearsall off in a few minutes, while apparently in the enjoyment of perfect health. He was buried on the 12th, in accordance with his own request, in a vault of the Chapel at Wartensee, and his funeral was attended by an immense concourse of people. At his death he left a widow, a son, and two daughters, the elder of whom was married in 1839 to the present Earl of Harrington, the younger, in 1857, to Mr. John Hughes, a barrister of the Inner Temple.

It is as a writer of madrigals and other choral music that Pearsall will be best remembered. There is nothing that has ever appeared, since the great days of the Elizabethan madrigalists, which approaches nearer to their excellence than the compositions of Pearsall in this manner. The simplest and slightest of his choral songs, such as "The Hardy Norseman" and "Oh, who will o'er the downs so free?" soon caught the ear of the uneducated by their easy, unaffected style; but the most cultivated musicians are no less delighted with such elaborate works as "Great god of love" (eight voices), "Light of my soul" (six voices), "Lay a garland on her hearse" (eight voices), "I saw lovely Phillis" (four voices), "In dulci jubilo" (four voices), and "Sir Patrick Spens" (ten voices). In these and many more, the educated ear is struck not only by the beautiful and natural gift of melody, but also by the massive harmonies, skilful yet lucid counterpoint, and never-failing sympathy of the music with the words. Let those who would be convinced on this last point compare his treatment of the old melody "In dulci jubilo" with that of any former master (not even excepting Bach), and Pearsall will be found to have come nearest to the true intention of both words and air.

No composer of this great merit, originality, and cultivation, should be hastily set down in the slighted category of "amateurs" merely by reason of his happening to possess some private fortune, and never writing, because never obliged to write, for gain. We have not, since Purcell's time, been able to boast of so much native genius for music that we can afford not to be glad to reckon as one of the most eminent of English composers Robert Lucas de Pearsall, the subject of this roughly sketched memoir.

THE law of copyright, we are glad to say, is now receiving the attention so important a subject demands. Years ago, when the plays of English dramatic writers were unprotected, country managers used to reproduce the pieces popular in the metropolis without even communicating with the author; and when the law stepped in and recognised the right of a man to be paid for the work of his brain as well as for the work of his hands, it was found necessary to form a Society to enforce this claim. For a long time the power of performing musical compositions before the public was one which remained unquestioned, because it was tacitly understood that the composer was sufficiently remunerated by advertising his work. Had those who discovered—and acted upon this discovery—that such compositions were private property boldly announced the fact, instead of quietly waiting in all cases until they were performed, and then peremptorily demanding payment, not a voice would have been raised in complaint. Recent events, however, have not only so irritated those artists, both professional and amateur, who have been brought unknowingly under the action of the law, but have surrounded the subject with so many difficulties that at length attention has been called to it in Parliament. Lord Folkestone and Mr. Gorst have introduced a Bill, which has already passed the House of Commons, and is now in charge of Earl Cadogan in the House of Lords, rendering it compulsory, for the recovery of penalties for performance, that it shall be notified on the title-page of a composition so protected that the performing right is reserved. Respecting those compositions, however, published before the passing of this Act, we would especially draw attention to the following extract from clause 2: "In any proceedings for penalties under the provisions of an Act passed in the third year of His Majesty King William the Fourth, it shall be necessary to prove that the aforesaid notice had been duly printed as prescribed by this Act, or that in the case of musical compositions printed before the passing of this Act, and in which such right of public representation or performance and such copyright are not vested in the same person, a notice to the like effect has, within six months after the passing of this Act, been given by the person in whom such right of public representation or performance is vested to the person for the time being entitled to the copyright; and in default of such proof the action for penalties shall be dismissed." It will thus be seen that any one in doubt as to whether a piece can be performed without permission can easily ascertain the fact by applying to the publisher. This is as it should be. It is possible that, as in the case we have mentioned of dramatic authors, a Society may be founded to watch the interest of composers should this bill be passed; but the matter will then be placed so clearly before the public that no mistake can arise. We have never complained of the object of the present protective Musical Association, but only of the manner in which this object has been carried out.

THE idea of translating our National Anthem into fourteen Eastern languages and scattering it through the length and breadth of India—originated by the Rev. Mr. Harford, Minor Canon of Westminster—is, we are pleased to see, likely to be forthwith acted upon; but with the news of the probable successful accomplishment of this excellent suggestion comes intelligence of a fact equally important to the ultimate welfare of the project. An article in the Daily Telegraph, speaking of the performance of a version in Hindustani of the National Anthem of England, at a recent Soirée of the National Indian Association in Chandos Street, Cavendish Square, commented with much truth upon the fact of the peculiar Hindoo music reflecting the character of those who sang it: "soft wailing minors, full of intervals, ornaments, and half-notes, very different in style from the Gregorian chant which is our National Anthem." The writer might even have said that these "melodies" are often full of intervals smaller than half-notes, for assuredly the drawing succession of sounds we sometimes hear from Hindoo vocalists could scarcely be played upon our household keyed instruments. The well-known music, then, of our National Anthem would hardly perhaps excite the same loyal feelings with Indian as with English listeners; and, in accordance with the hint in the Daily Telegraph, we find that not only the words but the notes also will be written by a native. In a communication from Mr. Harford to the paper which, as we have said, first gave publicity to this interesting project, the writer tells us that "a letter will immediately be forwarded to Dr. Sourindro Mohun Tagore, of Calcutta, the principal authority upon Hindu music, requesting him to secure the services of the best native composer, and a melody which shall at once suit Oriental taste and the measure of the translated hymn." It is possible that the music of this Indian National Anthem will sound as strange to English ears as the music of our own does to those of the Hindoo; but if, by thus establishing a bond of union between the two countries, the loyal feeling can be more effectually deepened, the enterprise should receive warm and hearty encouragement.

FOR many years a movement has been in progress for the establishment of bands during the summer months in the public promenades of the metropolis, but it appears only this season to have assumed a decidedly practical shape. A committee has been formed, headed by his Royal Highness the Duke of Albany, and until the end of August it is announced that performances will take place in Hyde Park, from five to eight p.m., on Sundays, Mondays, Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, and in the Regent's Park on Tuesdays and Thursdays. We sincerely hope that every assistance will be given to an enterprise so excellently organised, for on the encouragement of the public it is obvious that its success mainly depends. We have taken some pains to ascertain the claims of these open-air concerts to extensive support, and can conscientiously affirm that in every respect they fully deserve all the patronage that may be bestowed upon them. The executants are perfectly competent to the performance of the music selected, and the programmes are sufficiently popular in character, without in any degree pandering to the taste of an uneducated class of listeners. The audience is thoroughly orderly, and evidently so bent upon enjoying the music as to resent the slightest interruption, so that the few policemen present have a perfect secure, and evidently look forward to the "band days" with an agreeable anticipation of a few hours' relaxation from duty. Apart from the pleasure these performances afford to a large number of persons in the summer evenings, it is well to remember that they will assuredly in the course of time lead to the total abolition of street musicians; for those who can play will probably find no difficulty in procuring engagements in some of these bands, and those who cannot may, we hope, turn to some occupation which will confer benefit instead of misery upon their fellow-creatures.

SINCE we last placed before our readers some choice specimens of country notices, not only have many others equally remarkable casually come before us, but correspondents have forwarded long articles upon important concerts evidently penned by persons who know nothing whatever of the matter which they undertake to criticise. It has often been said that when a man finds it impossible to write upon a subject, he should study the art of writing round it; but as a general rule we do not see that this theory is acted upon, for, in looking through our collection of such notices, we find that the critics who are the most profoundly ignorant of the art endeavour to speak the most learnedly upon it. As an instance of this we may cite the review upon a performance of Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," in which the writer, after telling us that it "may be styled a sacred Cantata," says: "Many of the passages are inexpressibly beautiful, while the various chords and inversions which abound impress one with the grandeur of the composition." In the same notice we read that Miss Marriott's singing of the air in Beethoven's "Engedi," "Praise ye Jehovah's gladness," was "an accurate representation," whatever that may mean. In other articles a vocalist is spoken of as "Miss Fräulein —"; Handel's "Zadock the Priest" is termed a "long anthem," and "essentially a solemn composition"; and the choruses and partsongs are said to have been "well rendered by the orchestra." When we also read that Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor was encored, it may reasonably be asked why writers so utterly ignorant of music should be selected to write upon it. A paper upon the "Musical Activity of the Year," in our last number, speaks of the competence of modern critics to criticise the art. The above extracts may be accepted as instances of the exceptions which prove the rule.

THE Archivio Musicale of the 18th ult. refers to the recent decree of the Italian Government nominating a permanent committee to superintend dramatic and musical instruction. The committee is to consist of ten members—four musical composers, four dramatic authors; and two professional critics, one dramatic and one musical. The Minister of Instruction will, ex officio, preside in the committee. Our contemporary, in approving the measure, invokes the serious attention of the Italian Government to the delicacy and importance of the task it has undertaken. The Archivio alludes incidentally to the bill in the English Parliament to regulate the qualifications of teachers of music in England and Wales, as well as to the proposed Royal College of Music, as proofs that all countries, even England, which "by antonomasia is the anti-musical country," are becoming conscious of the necessity of fomenting musical instruction through the instrumentality of the state. Our Italian contemporary seems to be most anxious in regard to the individual competency of the members of the committee, and the possible neglect of the traditions of Italian art, above all in that branch which has been its chief glory, il canto. It refers to Dr. Richardson's recipe for the preservation of health—"the sponge, the rough towel, and pulmonic exercise in singing."

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

IN connection with this enterprise we have now to record the production of three Operas, two of which had never before been heard in England, while the third, if somewhat familiar as to a great part of its music, had not been played on our stage for many years. We are, therefore, face to face with an embarras des richesses, aggravated by the fact that the utmost reasonable amount of space would not serve for adequate discussion. Our notes must be brief, and as much to the point as possible.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg" came first in order of the three, and was played before a crowded house on May 30. We shall assume that the story of this opera is known, since our daily and weekly contemporaries, with the generosity which never fails when Wagner is concerned, have devoted columns to its description and elucidation. The things to be pointed out here are the genuine human interest and quaint fun which pervade the piece, together with the admirable characterisation that preserves the attraction of the stage from first to last. We have nothing to say here against Wagner's preference for the myth as subject-matter for serious opera, but it certainly is refreshing to find him dealing with "our own flesh and blood," in the persons of honest and simple-minded German burghers, especially as he does it so well. No one, we imagine, will dispute that the dramatist, Wagner, has made real personages of Hans Sachs and his fellows. They touch us at all points, and we are of necessity interested in their fortunes. From the moment of representation, indeed, they are real personages, and we seem to have met with them before, so true are they to the various types of human nature. Sachs the shoemaker, Pogner the goldsmith, Beckmesser the town-clerk, David the apprentice—these, thanks to Wagner's admirable dramatic art, have all the humanity of Shakespeare's characters, and live before us just as do Bully Bottom or Dogberry. True it is that the circumstances and conditions of the story are far removed from anything within our experience, or even within the possibility of an imagination not incited to unusual activity. The quaint old Mastersingers, and their quainter ceremonies; their devotion to a form of art which was all letter without spirit, even their place of meeting—in a church—to say nothing of their song-contest for the hand of Pogner's daughter, may be historically true, but practically have upon us the effect of fancy. They belong to an age and a state of society impossible of realisation at this distance of time. Hence a peculiar effect arises from the association of characters so lifelike with a set of circumstances far removed from that which we now conceive as possible. This, however, does not diminish our interest in the story, but rather increases it. It gives the charm of the fabulous to the sayings and doings of personages quite matter of fact. Akin thereto is the powerful contrast between the hero of the play and those with whom he is brought into contact. The Mastersingers are the prose, and Waller von Stolzing is the poetry. He comes in as the representative of chivalry; they of a workaday world with all its narrow interests and solemn magnifying of small things. We have thus in "Die Meistersinger" very peculiar elements of dramatic charm, and the only fault to be found with the work is the comparative insignificance of the heroine. Eva is very much in evidence, no doubt, but dramatically she is unimportant, entering into the play to little purpose beyond the supplying of a motive for the real actors. This is unusual with Wagner, whose women are, as a rule, prime movers in his dramas. All the same, "Die Meistersinger" must be accounted one of Wagner's happiest efforts. We might almost say so on account of Beckmesser alone, the character of the town-clerk being drawn with a skill possible only to genius of the highest order. As for the music, it shows with what happy results Wagner can combine certain parts of his peculiar theory with the older forms. Wagnerism pure and simple, as exemplified in the "Ring" and "Tristan und Isolde" will always furnish matter for controversy, but adherents of both the old and new can find plenty to admire in "Die Meistersinger," and do not object to the mixture it presents. If on the one hand we have a free use of the leit-motive, with a preponderance of musical interest in the orchestra, on the other we have regular vocal melody, and even set pieces—the quintet in the last act, for example—to say nothing of such common operatic devices as plenty of chorus and a dance. Had the master adhered to the method illustrated in his "comic" work, he would now be everywhere accepted as not only a great musician, but as a reformer able to engraft new ideas upon the old stem. As it is he represents destruction rather than development. A charming feature in "Die Meistersinger," and one that serves the work well from beginning to end, lies in the contrast between the music given to Walter and that connected with the worthy burghers. The purpose of the play, we need hardly point out, is to set off the freedom of modern art against the art which is fettered by rule and tradition. Wagner has taken the obvious course of exemplifying the two styles in his music, but we are not sure that the result is exactly what he intended. At any rate, while we admire the lovely melody and rich effects of the one style we are no less pleased with the quaint beauty of the other. Wagner has exhibited the "antique" in a very frank and honest way. He might easily have made it ridiculous by a few touches without any obvious malice in them, and the temptation to do so was doubtless strong. To his credit, be it said, temptation was resisted. The Mastersingers' music is, indeed, as attractive as Wagner's skill in imitation could make it, and constitutes, to our mind, one of the most delightful features in a work which is nearly all charm. A great success naturally attended the performance. In point of fact, "Die Meistersinger" has been the "hit" of the season, and the directors may thank it for pulling their enterprise through the fire of a first year. The matter is significant, because of all Wagner's later music-dramas this is the one which most closely approximates to the recognised operatic model. That it was admirably represented will be taken for granted, and it must in common justice be said that a better performance only unreasonableness could have desired. The stage-manager on one side of the footlights and Herr Richter on the other took infinite pains with their respective tasks; they were supported in the same spirit by everybody concerned, and the result was a thoroughness most commendable. There was no weak point anywhere, those who had the smallest "business" to do doing it as though the success of the venture depended upon their individual efforts. If the German Opera existed for this completeness only it would not have been set on foot in vain; for so long have we been accustomed to the slovenly habits, perfunctoriness, and individual self-seeking of the Italian stage, that we needed an example of what can be done when all are in earnest and ready to subordinate themselves to the general good. Frau Sucher, as Eva, was not less graceful and charming in that character than in the others represented by her during the season. She had little in the way of acting to do, her chief business being to look like a maiden very much in love and very much worth loving. This she found no difficulty in accomplishing, while her singing was marked by the high intelligence that stands her so well in all she attempts. The Magdalene of Fräulein Schefsky was also a capital performance, finished in every detail; and with it may be bracketed the embodiment of Magdalene's youthful lover, the apprentice David, by Herr Landau, who looked the part well, and obtained universal favour for the very careful study he made it. Herr Gura was an excellent Hans Sachs, and Herr Koegel an appropriately grave and dignified Pogner. Dr. Kraus played the small part of Kothner as though it were a big one, while Herr Winkelmann found in Walter von Stolzing a character admirably suited to him, and had music to sing not less well fitted to display his vocal means. At the second performance the part was transferred to Herr Nachbaur, and that of Eva to Fräulein Malten, but we cannot say that either change was for the better. The chorus sang capitally, and the orchestra played the charming music set down for it with a completeness to which individual enjoyment of the task no doubt contributed. "Die Meistersinger" has, ever since its production, figured very frequently in the bills of the house.

Weber's "Euryanthe" was brought out, in fulfilment of managerial promise, on the 13th ult., but no great success attended the revival, and the opera has since been represented only a very few times. In this there is nothing to wonder at, because, admirable though the music be, it is tied to a drama simply ridiculous in its absurdity. We need not tell here the story of Wilhelmina von Chézy, and how that "old woman"—only less absurd than her work—pestered poor Weber till he bitterly regretted ever having anything to do with her. His acceptance of her manuscript was a step that will always remain incomprehensible, save on the assumption that he could not distinguish a good drama from a bad one. It was an unfortunate act, at any rate, since it placed some of the composer's best music in a position where justice to it became impossible. Were the libretto even moderately good, "Euryanthe" would now rank amongst the most popular of operas. As it is, the work can hardly be considered an acting one at all, and its music lives on as best it may, in the concert-room. In what the merit of the "Euryanthe" music consists there is no need to tell. Nearly all the principal numbers of the opera are in the stock repertory of concert-givers and artists, while occasionally whole scenes are performed on the platform. In this manner "Euryanthe" will live, because so much beauty cannot die nor remain permanently obscured. On the stage, we fear, it will never have a settled place; the days having gone for ever in which the dramatic part of an opera signified little or nothing. A proof of this, as already intimated, was given by the fate of the work at Drury Lane. People admired the music, but they ridiculed the story, and ridicule kills not only that against which it is directly aimed, but also related things. The performance was by no means up to the Drury Lane mark, and it seemed as though a foreboding of non-success led to indifference in preparation. Herr Richter was not conscious, it may be, of lacking zeal, but the looker-on saw that which did not appear to those concerned, and observed many a fault which would not have been passed over in a work of Wagner. This was the more regrettable because it fostered an idea—incorrect no doubt—that the German Opera is part and parcel of the Wagner propaganda, other masters being patronised as a matter of policy rather than of principle. Under any circumstances, it was unfortunate that Weber's opera had not justice done to it; and, we may add, since the two things are in one sense connected, that the promise to produce Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" remains unfulfilled. The characters in "Euryanthe" were represented by Frau Sucher (Euryanthe), Frau Peschka-Leutner (Eglantine), Herr Nachbaur (Adolar), and Herr Gura (Lysiart). If we refrain from details of the way in which these artists did their work it is because we do not know by what standard to test the assumption of parts so absurd.

Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," produced on the 20th ult., retrieved, as far as performance went, the credit of the house, since nothing could have been better than the general rendering of the work. We hear talk of fourteen or fifteen rehearsals, and are ready to believe that a task so heavy could not have been so well discharged without them. But, however prepared, the performance reflected immense credit upon the company, and will long be remembered as an illustration of what is possible to well-directed energy and skill even amid the stress of a London season. Assuming that the story of "Tristan" is known to every reader of this notice, and waiving criticism upon some features in it that have already been sufficiently discussed—features, moreover, that could not possibly escape individual observation and reflection—we may go on to point out the striking dramatic art shown by Wagner in his poem. Much might be said about the beauty of the text, for many passages put in the clearest light Wagner's qualifications as a poet. Unfortunately, it would be useless to dwell upon this in an English periodical having necessarily but few readers qualified to judge the original, the place of which no translation can possibly fill. On the other hand, all can estimate the drama as such, and it is in dramatic art, perhaps, that its greatest strength lies. Save at times, when Wagner indulges his taste for over-long dialogues, the stage never lacks interest, and that interest is cumulative from the ominous beginning to the inexpressibly tragic ending. In some respects the play is a succession of coups de théâtre, each, as we fancy at the moment, more effective than the rest. Say what we will of the story from the point of view of morality and good taste, the consummate skilfulness of its telling lies beyond question. So, too, does the strong human interest that pervades it. The characters may be drawn from myth, and placed at as great a distance from us as time can manage, but they are real men and women, "of like passions with ourselves"—people whose motives we can appreciate, and whose actions, though we would not imitate them, we can easily understand. It is this, joined with the art of the play, that exacts from a spectator such sustained attention. We may not resist the demand upon us, for "Tristan und Isolde," if not a pleasant drama, is one of incontestable power. In what an uncompromising manner the musical part of the work exemplifies Wagner's advanced theories, every reader knows. Built up of representative themes; almost destitute of concerted music; with continued declamation for the voices, and an entire absence of "form," save such as comes from the composer's own law, it is essentially a distinctive and individual thing. On this subject, however, we need not enter into details, since it may be assumed that our readers have made themselves acquainted with the peculiarities of the work through the medium of Mr. Corder's analysis, published in these columns a short while ago. Turning from mere description to criticism, our hand rests upon the lever that opens a very floodgate of controversy. We decline, however, to work the machinery and let the waters loose, for the simple reason that the space at command would not avail for an adequate discussion, and any other would be worse than useless. Suffice it that in "Tristan und Isolde" we have an opportunity of studying a genuine example of Wagnerian music-drama. This is no half-and-half thing; but one which shows us fully what the "new art" means, and to what opera will come, should the master's principles prevail. It deserves, therefore, very serious attention; and every amateur should give to it the study necessary for an intelligent answer to the question whether opera of the "Tristan und Isolde" type is artistically more true, and in effect more beautiful, than that represented by, say, "Fidelio" or "Faust." The characters in the work were assumed by Frau Sucher (Isolde), Fräulein Marianne Brandt (Brangäne), Herr Winkelmann (Tristan), Herr Gura (King Mark), Dr. Kraus (Kurwenal), and Herr Wolff (Melot), all of whom came up to the high standard of the performance as a whole. Praise is especially due to Frau Sucher and Herr Winkelmann for their able discharge of a terribly trying task. We are at a loss to imagine how they contrived to get their respective parts into their heads, and our wonder is that their physical resources endured the strain of reproducing them. A very little of such work must tell upon the most robust performer. Fräulein Brandt was an excellent representative of Brangäne. Her by-play throughout presented a study of the actor's less obtrusive and too often neglected art. It was worth while to bring this lady from Germany for the purpose. Further comment upon a representation equally good all round is needless. Enough that among the triumphs of the German season it will hold the highest and most honoured place.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

PERHAPS as a compensation for the hard work to which London musical critics have this year been subjected, Mr. Gye has kindly given them nothing to do at the establishment of which he is the Director. It is true that an occasional record of the operas presented, and the prime donne who sang in them, might be expected, but even those who feel most strongly this sense of duty must get weary of saying that Madame Albani and Madame Patti are singing "as well as ever," or that Madame Valleria is "gradually increasing her well-earned reputation." The appearance of Madame Pauline Lucca, however, in the part of Carmen is an important event; for this great artist, although giving us a version of the character quite unlike that of Miss Minnie Hauk, managed to interest her audience quite as much: indeed, in many parts, we may say that a higher degree of artistic power was shown; and, although we cannot affirm that her vocalism is perfect, there can be little doubt that her voice has increased in strength since we last heard her. The début of M. Dufrique as Capuletto, in Gounod's "Romeo e Giulietta," was only fairly successful; and the first appearance of M. Mussart as Elvino, in "La Sonnambula," inspired us with but little hope of the advent of tenors capable of singing on an equality with the many excellent vocalists who still hold their place as the heroines of Italian opera. In several of their solos, however, they elicited warm applause; and it is possible that, in the present dearth of male singers at this establishment, they may be at least tolerated to the end of the season. The only novelty promised in the prospectus—Lenepveu's opera "Velleda"—is announced for Tuesday, the 4th inst.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE fifth Concert of the series took place in St. James's Hall, on the 2nd ult., and introduced a new candidate for violin honours, one Herr Hänflein, of whom report had theretofore been silent. Herr Hänflein chose Spohr's "Dramatic Concerto" as his battle-horse, and played it in some respects very well. He is not a mighty fiddler, with a commanding style and overpowering intensity; his strength lying rather in refinement, tenderness, and grace. This was made obvious by his execution of the Cavatina in Spohr's work, and by contrasting what he then did with the subsequent performance of the Cabaletta. Herr Hänflein is, in fact, a master of cantabile. We may add that he phrases with judgment, preserves correct intonation, and shows very considerable facility in passage-playing. Among the purely orchestral works given at this Concert were Beethoven's Eighth Symphony (of which the well-known and favourite Allegretto was the movement best performed), the "Leonora" Overture, powerfully rendered, and the Introduction and closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde." Frau Mälden and Herr Gura, of the German Opera, were the vocalists.

Beethoven's Mass in D was the attraction of the Concert given on the 12th ult., and a very large audience assembled to hear that great work. The performance was, perhaps, as good as could in reason have been expected. As we have observed elsewhere, the difficulties which Beethoven has here piled up are insurmountable, and the best rendering can only approximate to a complete victory over them. This may especially be said with reference to the concerted music, in which Beethoven seems to regard his choralists not only as machines, but as machines that cannot possibly go wrong. Herr Richter's choir struggled in the most courageous manner with the difficulties they had to encounter, the sopranos exerting themselves above all, and attacking the high notes with rare determination. The orchestra was excellent, as usual; and we should now have to say as much concerning the soloists but for the presence amongst them of Herr Elmlad, who with the greatest ease succeeded in marring the performance. He sang persistently out of tune, while the effect, owing to the ponderosity of his voice, would not be denied. Madame Peschka-Leutner delivered the soprano solos in admirable style, while Miss Orridge and Mr. Shakespeare were excellent, as usual.

A new Symphony by an English composer, Mr. C. Hubert Parry, was to have been performed at the Concert given on the 19th ult., but owing, it is said, to the numerous rehearsals of "Tristan und Isolde," the time necessary for its preparation could not be spared. We regret this, not only because Mr. Parry is a musician of earnest purpose and laudable ambition, but also because the opportunities for the production of an English Symphony are few. Let us hope that the event is only postponed. Mr. Parry's time will come, perhaps during the autumn Concerts announced to be given by Messrs. Franke and Schultz-Curtius. The actual programme of the 19th was by no means deficient in interest. It contained Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," always a capital study in orchestration, to say the least; Schumann's Overture, "The Bride of Messina"; and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the performance of which alone was worth going to hear. In addition, Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" in F, with its characteristic effects, delighted the audience, who demanded and obtained its repetition, as on previous occasions. No one understands better than Liszt the spirit of his own national music, or is better able to use the orchestra so as to throw its peculiarities into strong relief; and whatever may be said of this master's more pretentious efforts, a work from his pen in the Hungarian style is always worth attention and deserving of respect.

With regard to the last Concert of the series, given on the 26th ult., we can only say that its programme comprised Gade's Overture "Nachklänge von Ossian," Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A (solo by Mr. Dannreuther), and the Choral Symphony, with Frau Peschka-Leutner, Fräulein Brandt, Herr Winkelmann, and Herr Gura as principal vocalists. In our next issue we hope to notice this performance à propos to some observations upon the series as a whole.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THE last three of these Concerts claim present notice, together with an acknowledgment of the spirited manner in which the whole have been carried out. We fear that the pecuniary balance of the season is on the wrong side, and that the Royal College of Music will not have to thank the managers for more than an intention of liberality. That, however, is something; while it is more to have deserved success. But, for the coming together again of Herr Franke and Messrs. Schultz-Curtius, we should say, Let not those who are responsible for the Symphony Concert be daunted by the result of their first venture, made at a time of many conflicting attractions. Perseverance is sure to win its reward, if only there be enough of it; since, in the long run, a good thing never wants for support.

The Concert of the 8th ult. was made memorable by the first performance in London of the whole of Schumann's "Scenen aus Goethe's Faust." We have had the work in bits. Now a choral society has given the third part for the sake of its pleasing choruses, and now at an orchestral Concert passages from the remainder have been heard. We can understand this timid treatment. The various scenes are almost independent of each other as they stand, and can only be connected by considerable knowledge of a drama which is not everybody's reading. Moreover, the music is very exacting, and not always adapted for instant popularity, while the whole of it supplies material for an entire evening's work. Some boldness was therefore required to face the risk incurred by a complete performance, and, recognising the fact, let us give proportionate credit to the managers of the Symphony Concerts and Mr. Charles Hallé, their painstaking Conductor. The "Faust" music is not the result of a sudden inspiration on the part of Schumann, who, indeed, was rarely subject to such attacks. Its composition extended over several years, and seems to have been a task for odd moments; the master dipping into Goethe's play, picking out a scene suited to the humour of the hour, and amusing himself with it as long as leisure allowed. He may have contemplated publication, but, as a matter of fact, never achieved it; the fragments being collected, arranged consecutively, and given to the world after his death. The character of the music we need not minutely describe, seeing that so much of the work is known. As a whole, however, it must not be judged by the familiar third part, where lyric feeling prevails. The first part is profoundly contemplative and subjective, in the characteristic manner of Schumann, while the second part, especially the supernatural episodes thereof, aim at and achieve a picturesque result. The work, therefore, takes a wide range, each section requiring to be studied for, and judged by, itself. Each, let us add, rejoices in distinctive beauty. Gretchen's prayer and the cathedral scene in the first, the spirit choruses in the second, and the bulk of the third, are examples of excellence uniform in degree, varied only in kind. At the same time there are passages not very clear, and some decidedly obscure as to their applied meaning, if not their musical structure. The fact is not to be wondered at, since we can hardly imagine that the whole of his theme was luminous to the composer. With what interest the work was heard by amateurs we need not say. Happily it was well performed, band and chorus having been carefully prepared, while justice was done to the soprano solos by Mrs. Hutchinson (Gretchen), who sang with much expression; to those for tenor by Mr. Shakespeare (Avriel), and to those for baritone by Mr. Santley (Faust). Mr. Sauvage (Pater Seraphicus) and Miss Larkcom (Care) should also be mentioned with approval. Not so Herr Elmlad (Mephistopheles), a gentleman with a big, unruly bass voice, aggravated by a too confident manner. His singing was a decidedly unpleasant feature in the performance. The works associated with the "Faust" scenes were Mendelssohn's Overture "Meeresstille," and Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G major, conducted by Mr. Edward Hecht, with Mr. Charles Hallé at the solo instrument.

The leading works in the programme of the penultimate Concert (15th ult.) were Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, solo by Madame Norman-Néruda, and Berlioz' "Harold en Italie." Neither these nor the less important companion pieces call for remark, since nothing new can be said of them, or of their rendering under familiar conditions. We pass, therefore, to the final performance (22nd ult.), when the chief theme was Beethoven's Solemn Mass in D. Here Mr. Hallé and his people were fairly matched against Herr Richter and the resources of the rival enterprise, by whom the same great work was given not long before. It is hard to say which bore off the palm, the difference of merit, if any, being slight. Perhaps the excellence shown on the 22nd was more uniform; but we need not in the slightest degree qualify a statement to the effect that by neither party were the enormous difficulties of the Mass conquered. To speak plain truth, the work is impossible. No human lungs can endure the strain imposed by it, nor can human energy and skill do more than approximate to a perfect execution. Mr. Hallé's chorus was fairly beaten by some passages, while the effect of so much laborious effort upon those who witnessed it could not have been altogether agreeable. The solos were in excellent hands: Madame Albani singing those for soprano with her accustomed fervour; Miss Orridge again showing that she has mastered those for contralto; and Messrs. Shakespeare and King being thoroughly satisfactory in the tenor and bass. At the close of the performance Mr. Hallé was loudly applauded. The Mass had a congenial companion in its author's C minor Symphony, which was played in capital style, with immense élan and precision.

As intimated above, the Symphony Concerts are now at an end for good and all, their managers and those of the Richter Concerts having made up differences and once more joined forces. This is well. We do not believe in monopoly, but the lovers of classical music are not many, and healthy competition for their patronage may easily pass the limit beyond which lies general ruin.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE production of Rubinstein's Oratorio "Paradise Lost," at the final Concert of the season, on the 9th ult., although evidencing an earnest desire to provide novelty on the part of a Society which has already suffered from its inaction, can scarcely, we think, be accepted in proof that judicious counsels now rule its proceedings. Rubinstein is undoubtedly a composer who has earned his right to a place in the world's estimation; but we are not to take all that he gives us at his own valuation, and "Paradise Lost" is so unequal a work that it becomes a question whether, in order to enjoy the many beauties it contains, it is politic to compel an audience to endure its many defects. Its title would certainly lead us to expect that—if not actually founded upon Milton's epic—it would at least prove to be a musical setting of its principal features; and although we know that the composition of such a work should only be undertaken by a genius of the highest order, we cannot but feel interest in endeavouring to estimate the amount of success when an artist of such mark as Rubinstein attempts to grapple with the subject. But our disappointment commences before we listen to the music, for in place of Milton's words, or even ideas, we get a melodramatic libretto (by an anonymous author), stated on the full score to be "free after Milton"; and, by the time this is translated into English by Mr. Henry Hersee, it need scarcely be said that the book becomes "more free than welcome." The work is divided into three parts, which, as the programme informs us, may be named "Rebellion of the Angels," "Creation of the World," and "Temptation and Fall." Here, indeed, we have a theme, the vastness of which would awe many composers who have not the utmost confidence in their powers; but Herr Rubinstein, using his dramatis personæ as vehicles for his music, rather than as characters to be rendered additionally impressive by the aid of musical art, introduces the Deity (under the name of A Voice), makes Him sing long duets with Adam, utilises the voices of Raphael, Michael, and Gabriel for a trio, treats Eve as an available solo soprano, and Satan as the conventional villain. Apart from the feeling that the composer has in no place reached the sublimity of his subject, every listener must be impressed with the merit of much of the music, the choral portions especially being often highly effective. Amongst the best of these pieces may be mentioned "Ring out, ye heavenly trumpets," which, although too heavily instrumented, contains some really good writing, and forms a fitting climax to the second part. Several choruses of Angels, descriptive of the new world, may also be cited as commendable specimens of pure and melodious composition, and there is some effective choral music allotted to the Rebel Angels, who, by the way, are not particular in their choice of language when they do begin to swear. The part of Eve, as well as the Angel, gave Madame Rose Hersee an opportunity of displaying her voice and style to much advantage; Mr. Barton McGuckin sang the music assigned to the Voice with much intelligence; Mr. Ludwig, as Adam, was everything that could be desired, and the arduous part of Satan had an efficient representative in Signor Foli; the little music allotted to Raphael, Michael, and Gabriel being well sung by Misses M. Fenna, E. Farnol, and S. Hudson, respectively. Mr. W. G. Cusins, who conducted the Oratorio, must have had a difficult task in preparing the work, for, although some of the choral music betrayed the want of sufficient rehearsal, the greater portion of it was rendered with much precision and accuracy of intonation.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

MOST lovers of music probably read with surprise the announcement that a Symphony by Berlioz would be performed, for the first time in England, at the Crystal Palace Concert of Saturday, the 3rd ult. The works of the great French master have of late years found so much appreciation amongst us that the neglect of so important a work would indeed have seemed unaccountable. The expectations roused by the announcement aforesaid were, however, doomed to disappointment. Berlioz' "Symphonie Funèbre et Triomphale" can be called a symphony by an extreme stretch of courtesy only. It is, in the first instance, a pièce d'occasion in the most emphatic sense of the word. In France official "occasions," to be celebrated by official music, are of frequent occurrence. A country which changes its form of government once every ten years has naturally many events to commemorate; and, having a national school of music supported by Government, the sources of patriotic inspiration are never allowed to run dry. Thus it came to pass that, when the remains of the July Revolutionists were transferred to the Place de la Bastille, Berlioz received a commission from the Minister of the Interior to write the music for the ceremony, and this he set about doing on the grand scale peculiar to himself, employing a military band of two hundred instruments, to which afterwards he added a stringed orchestra and a chorus. In spite of this formidable array, Berlioz complains that the noise of the procession drowned his music, and it was only at a subsequent performance in the Salle Vivienne that the "Symphonie Funèbre et Triomphale" gained an attentive and, if we may believe its author's statement, a successful hearing. The opening movement is a "Marche Funèbre" of no particular character, its most striking feature being the effective alternation and combination of brass and wood. The only strings employed are basses and cellos. The second movement, "Oraison Funèbre," is scored for wind instruments alone, the solo trombone standing for the preacher, who delivers the funeral oration in a sufficiently lugubrious manner. There is, again, little that is striking or beautiful in the movement; the tonal colour involuntarily reminds us of one of those solos for the cornet-à-pistons with which Mr. Reynolds is wont to delight the audiences of Promenade Concerts. The final movement takes the form of an "Apothéose," and is accordingly brilliant and joyous in character, the chorus singing some lines of very indifferent poetry in honour of the departed heroes. By reviving a work of this kind a very doubtful service was done to the memory of Berlioz, which, however, by this time is sufficiently established to bear the shock. Even good Homer was, as we all know, liable to occasional fits of drowsiness. A very fine performance of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, splendidly played by Madame Menter, were the redeeming features of an otherwise not very interesting Concert.

Infinitely more important was the introduction of another novelty at the Concert of the 10th ult. We are speaking of Signor Sgambati's Symphony in D, admirably played under the composer's leadership, and received with enthusiasm by the audience. Of this interesting work it would be impossible to give an adequate idea within our present limits of space. Suffice it to say that the melodic invention is fresh and spontaneous, the contrapuntal treatment masterly, and the orchestration delicate and refined. Not the least attractive feature of the work is the national element apparent in some of the movements, more especially in the short and lovely "Serenata" which serves as introduction to the final Allegro. The slow movement is characterised by breadth of melody, and the opening Allegro is an admirable piece of workmanship, adhering essentially to the classical form, but treating it with freedom and independence. Only in the Scherzo the composer's inspiration seems to flag, and he accordingly has recourse to the ideas of other masters. Signor Sgambati at the same Concert played Beethoven's E flat Concerto with consummate skill.

The final Concert of the season, given, as usual, for the benefit of Mr. Manns, the excellent Conductor of the Saturday Concerts, took place on the 17th ult., when the programme included an admirable rendering of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the solo quartet being represented by Madame Peschka-Leutner, Miss Hope Glen, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. F. King.

MR. GANZ'S CONCERTS.

THE fourth and last but one of these Concerts was given in St. James's Hall on the 3rd ult., and attended by a very large audience. Mr. Ganz is wise in his generation as to the matter of a full room. It would be idle to pretend that amid the distracting attractions of the present season any one enterprise can always command a crowded attendance, and we therefore assume that in some cases the example of the scriptural man who made a great feast is followed. Why not? A "dead-head" is better than an empty seat, and nothing helps a concert to go off well so much as the sympathy that seems to be generated by numbers. The leading feature in the programme was Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," as to which enough has been said for the present, and we pass it with a word of compliment to a performance of distinctive, if not in all respects sufficient, merit. In connection with this work was given one of a very different character, namely, Beethoven's First Pianoforte Concerto, solo by Madame Montigny-Remaury. The French pianist should be commended for a selection which showed that she has regard for a beautiful composition without reference to her own personal glory. Artists nowadays do not so often ask, What is worthy to be played? as, What will conduce most to my own personal success? This is very natural, we admit, and being so, all the more credit belongs to those who take a higher view of their responsibilities. We seldom hear Beethoven's First Concerto. Yet it is a very beautiful example of his early style, and a piece of genuine pianoforte music grateful alike to performer and audience. Madame Montigny-Remaury did it complete justice. Her neat, crisp execution, conjoined with unerring accuracy and characteristic vivaciousness, made the performance a real treat. Other features in the Concert were the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Concerto, played with greater expression than technical skill by Mdle. Eissler, a young violinist from the Austrian capital; and the singing of Madame Patey, who was heard to special advantage in Sarti's beautiful arietta, "Lungi dal caro bene."

The closing Concert of the series took place on the 17th ult., and was noteworthy for the absence of examples taken from the so-called "advanced" school of composition. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony; Beethoven's Fourth Concerto; Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture; the prelude to "Der Freischütz"; and the duet for two pianos composed by Mendelssohn and Moscheles on a theme from "Preciosa"—these things made up for the audience a feast of good old-fashioned dishes and wholesome food, which was apparently much enjoyed. On the whole the orchestral music went well, the Symphony especially, and Mr. Ganz may be congratulated upon a frank success. The pianist was M. de Pachmann, a Russian artist introduced by Mr. Ganz at a previous Concert. On this occasion M. de Pachmann essayed Beethoven, and did not altogether gratify his critical hearers. His style lacks the breadth and vigour, and his reading is deficient in the depth of sentiment required by the great master's typical works. At the same time, the finish of his playing cannot fail to make itself admired, nor does the fact that he is a refined artist escape observation. In works of a lighter character, more suited to his method, M. de Pachmann is qualified to shine brilliantly. The vocalist was Madame Rose Hersee, who introduced an air, "Once more has Heaven," from Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost."

MADAME MENTER'S RECITALS.

MADAME MENTER gave another Recital in St. James's Hall on the 2nd ult., when the chief feature in her programme was Beethoven's Sonata, "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour." That the lady's technical means secured a perfect mastery over the letter of her theme we need not say, but that she was equally happy in expressing its spirit was far from being so clear. Madame Menter is before all things an executant. Nothing comes amiss to her, nor does she know what difficulty means. At the same time, less gifted performers in this respect have made the inner light of such a work as Beethoven's shine with greater clearness; and the fact is worth insisting upon at a time when astounding mechanical dexterity seems to be regarded as the ne plus ultra of executive art. Madame Menter's performance of a Pastorale and Allegro by Scarlatti was absolutely beyond reproach, and she seemed quite at home with the six pieces by Chopin that formed a conspicuous feature in her selection. The most successful of these were the Study in G flat and the Ballade in G minor, the first being encoored amid genuine manifestations of delight. As usual, Madame Menter offered her audience a number of showy and sensational arrangements, which she would hardly play so often if she were an artist au fond. Among these were transcriptions of Mendelssohn's "On song's bright pinions" and Schubert's "Erl King" by Liszt, whose Rapsodies were also in the programme. That all served to display the artist's extraordinary talent will be taken for granted.

The last Recital for the present season took place in St. James's Hall, on the 20th ult., and wound up in what may be called, without much exaggeration, a "blaze of triumph." The programme was extraordinary in dimensions, containing, as it did, the names of no fewer than twenty pieces, including Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques"—a work which itself is made up of twelve movements. Madame Menter thus set her memory a prodigious task, but not greater than it could accomplish, the whole being reproduced with apparent ease and absolute certainty. The scope of the programme was as remarkable as its length, and ranged from Bach's Prelude in A minor to Tausig's version of the "Walkürenritt" from "Der Ring des Nibelungen," presenting between these extremes examples of Schumann, Mendelssohn, Scarlatti, Liszt, Chopin, Henselt, and Weber. No more need be said to prove the uncommon character of this Recital. Some of the selections had appeared in the lady's programmes before, and it is unnecessary to dwell upon her playing of Scarlatti's Pastorale and Sonata, Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "Hark! the lark" and "Erl King," Chopin's Etude in G flat, and Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," with Tausig's arabesques. These are familiar in her hands, and were all, save the last, repeated by desire. Much might be said, however, with regard to Madame Menter's rendering of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," the enormous difficulties of which seemed to vanish as she approached them. Their execution was remarkably vigorous, and appropriately "symphonic" in power and grandeur, deeply impressing the audience, who recalled the fair artist amid loud applause. Mendelssohn's Fugue in F minor—a work not unworthy to be named with the fugues of Bach—was played with great clearness, and Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrad" with no less delicacy. Liszt's fanciful, if not very striking, original piece, "St. François marchant sur les Flots," formed another prominent feature in the afternoon's work; but the "sensation" of the Recital attended upon the "Walkürenritt," which it seems had never before been played in England. Tausig has dealt with Wagner's singular conception in a congenial spirit, and the result, if not exactly music, is very curious. It lost nothing in Madame Menter's capable hands, but made the audience hold their breath, astonished. An enthusiastic recall followed. Further details are unnecessary. Suffice it to say that, had Madame Menter given no more than this one Recital, she would have made her mark upon the season.

HERR RUMMEL'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

AMONGST the numerous pianoforte and other recitals which, in addition to operas and orchestral concerts, have thronged this busy season to an all but unprecedented degree, that given by Herr Franz Rummel on the 9th ult. deserves at least passing mention. Herr Rummel, during his short visits to London in this and previous seasons, has gained the reputation of being one of the most accomplished and versatile pianists of the day. We say versatile, because, although Herr Rummel's sympathies and technical accomplishments are those of the school founded and represented by Liszt, he is not an exclusive member of that school in the sense, for instance, that Madame Menter is. His style, indeed, is far removed from that of the gifted lady who takes, perhaps, the first place amongst the "impressionistes" of the day. Herr Rummel aims at refinement rather than at strength, although by no means deficient in the latter. He is before all a thoughtful and careful artist, and intent upon doing justice to the intentions of the composer, the display of his own power being with him a subordinate consideration. Herr Rummel, in brief, is an artist, not a virtuoso. The programme of his Recital was well adapted to place the qualities thus indicated in an advantageous light. Its first item was Bach's "Chromatic" Fantasia, followed by Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Op. 57) Schumann's Sonata in G minor (Op. 22) Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," a Nocturne and a Polonaise by Chopin, and minor pieces by Rubinstein and other composers. All these the pianist rendered with absolute technical perfection, and with a delicacy of touch and refinement of feeling which won him the unanimous applause of a numerous audience.

THE FRENCH FESTIVAL.

THE meeting of the French Orphéonistes—or, as it is officially termed, the Grand Musical Festival—held at the Albert Hall, on the 20th and 21st ult., is an instance of “vaulting ambition that o’erleaps itself.” The similar gathering which took place at Brighton last autumn was in many respects (although not in a pecuniary one) successful. In a town like Brighton the arrival of above a thousand tuneful Frenchmen was something like an event. Their waving banners excited the admiration of the youthful natives, and the fathers of the town, with an eye to business, no doubt, did everything in their power to advance the festive gathering. The Mayor, decked in the gorgeous robes of his office, harangued the wondering strangers in a speech all the more impressive because they could not understand a word of it, and British hospitality was dispensed to them at the rate, if we remember rightly, of five shillings per diem. In addition to this, the metropolitan press drew attention to the social importance of the movement in France, comparing it with similar aspirations—or the want thereof—in this country. Dazzled by so much splendour, the promoters of the Festival determined upon following up this success by a metropolitan gathering. They overlooked the difference between the “milder shades” of the Brighton Pavilion, and the fierce light that beats upon a London concert platform. The inevitable result was failure. In spite of a Comité d’Honneur, comprising the names of several noble lords and foreign ambassadors, and of a jury of distinguished professors, such as Sir Julius Benedict, Messrs. Cowen, Leslie, Randegger, Visetti, and many others, the general public refused to take the slightest interest in the matter, and the very opening meeting at the Albert Hall took place before empty benches. The poor foreigners had not even the satisfaction of seeing “Le Lord Maire” in all his splendour. That dignity being engaged in more important business in the City, his place was taken by Sheriff Sir Reginald Hanson, whose speech, being interpreted by M. de la Grave, excited, however, a due amount of enthusiasm. Sir Julius Benedict, equally ready with lips, pen, or fingers, delivered a French address, in which he wished for the genius of Victor Hugo to celebrate the occasion in befitting terms; and other orators followed who, speaking in French and with their backs to the audience, were inaudible to the reporters. That the “Marseillaise” and “God save the Queen” were played and sung any number of times goes without saying. Not satisfied with this, the united bands, after the ceremony in the Hall, marched to the Albert Memorial and once more gave their version of our National Anthem, much to the astonishment of the passers-by. After this the serious business of the competitions began in the separate rooms set aside for that purpose. Of the mode of proceeding at these examinations we have previously given an account, and it is sufficient to add that on this, as on the last occasion, they were continued for two days, and comprised playing and singing at sight and the rendering of selected and previously rehearsed pieces of more or less difficulty. Two miscellaneous Concerts, without artistic interest, and the distribution of prizes, also formed part of the programme. Brief accounts in the daily papers, ranging from a paragraph of twenty lines to half a column of small print, form the annals of the “Grand Musical Festival,” which we will not swell by needless comment.

THE DEDICATION OF “GREAT PAUL.”

THE public interest which to a somewhat marked degree has attended the projection, casting, transit and arrival in town of the great bell recently cast for St. Paul’s Cathedral may be said to have culminated on Saturday, the 3rd ult., when, the somewhat perilous task of raising it from the ground level to its place in the Cathedral tower having been successfully accomplished, the monster bell was formally dedicated to its sacred purpose and rung for the first time. So much has from time to time appeared in the columns of the daily press concerning “Great Paul” that it would be superfluous to enter here into minute details respecting it; it may suffice to state that its note is E flat, that its dimensions are—in diameter at the lips 9 ft. 6½ in., height 8 ft. 10 in., thickness 8½ in., and that its weight is 16 tons 14 cwt. 2 qrs. 19 lbs., and with the headstock just over 20 tons. The casting, which occupied sixteen hours, took place on the 23rd of November last, and the bell was taken from the mould six days later. The very interesting service of dedication took place, as already stated, on Saturday, the 3rd ult., when, immediately after the conclusion of afternoon service, the whole of the choir and clergy, in place of retiring to the vestry, threaded their way through the crowd that filled the Cathedral to the dome-staircase, ascending which, and passing along the triforium, they formed into two lines at the western end, near the clock-chamber, and, with the presiding Canon (the Rev. Robert Gregory) in the midst, the special service commenced. The office opened with several versicles and responses (the priest’s part being taken by the Succutor, the Rev. Dr. Simpson), followed by four psalms—the 130th, the 67th, the 29th, and the 150th—and several collects, after which came the hymn “When morning gilds the skies,” the Collect for St. Paul’s Day, and then the Blessing. A deep silence of several minutes now ensues, broken only by the dull, heavy thud of the giant bell as it slowly swings on its gudgeons, gradually gaining way till at length the clapper begins to do its work, and the remarkably pure and, although soft, yet decidedly penetrating tone is heard, and “Great Paul” sounds the first note of its gospel message to the waiting crowds beneath. “Vae mihi si non evangelizavero!” May it serve to remind us, and millions yet to come, “of His presence both in life and death!”

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE one hundred and seventy-fifth Concert of this enterprising Society was given in the Town Hall, Cambridge, on the 13th ult., and proved no less successful, as regards performance and patronage, than its predecessors of the season then brought to an end. A special feature in the programme excited much interest. We refer to a Cantata, “The Shunammite,” composed by Dr. Garrett, and accepted, we believe, for the Festival of the Three Choirs to be held at Hereford in September next. Cambridge and Hereford lie far apart, or we should be tempted to say that it was hardly fair to take the bloom off a novelty destined for the venerable western solemnity. The question, however, is one for those immediately concerned, and to them it may be left. Dr. Garrett’s anonymous librettist has followed an ordinary model in the construction of his part of the work—that is to say, the book, while it has dramatic episodes, is substantially in narrative form, and as largely didactic. A Narrator tells the story in recitative, retiring now and then when the action is consecutive enough to run on of itself; and the chorus is kept in hand to “point a moral” at every available opportunity. This is the usual cantata form, and a good deal can be said for it. Nevertheless, the balance of advantage lies, we think, on the side of purely dramatic treatment, since by that means the interest of an audience is more easily sustained. We should not, however, quarrel with Dr. Garrett or any one else for adopting another method. Dramatic music requires a very special talent, and a perception of the fact has often saved composers from taking a step certain to end in failure. “The Shunammite” is divided into three parts, whereof the first deals with circumstances attending the birth of a son to Elisha’s hospitable friend, the second carries on the story to the point where the prophet, hearing of his death, sends Gehazi to lay his staff on the lad’s face, and the third ends with the miracle of restored life. It may be well to indicate the way in which these events are treated. After the usual ascription of praise, the Narrator tells how the “noble woman” showed hospitality to Elisha, and the chorus improves the occasion by remarking, “Be not forgetful to entertain strangers,” &c. The promise of a son follows; the chorus striking in with, “Children are an heritage and gift that cometh from the Lord.” Then we have a natural expression of joy from the woman, the chorus winding up the part by declaring, “The voice of joy and health is in the dwellings of the righteous.” Ex uno disci omnes. The chorus loses no chance of drawing a lesson from circumstances, and the result is that the story progresses very slowly, while the frequent interposition of more or less elaborate concerted pieces, having no direct connexion with the "argument," tends to lessen interest, or, at any rate, to destroy its continuity. This tendency Dr. Garrett has not removed by giving to the choruses a distinctive character. They would make very respectable anthems for church use, in right of their sobriety of style, and a certain restraint of expression imposed by the somewhat stiff decorum of our service music. This may be due to Dr. Garrett's training and vocation, but, however caused, it is not suited for a Cantata dealing with dramatic incidents and intense human feeling. To the objection that the choruses are distinct from the story, we reply that they should be one with it in spirit. If, for example, the Shunammite overflows with joy because of the great gift that has come to her, the chorus should echo her excited strains, and not follow on with a measured, unsympathetic utterance which at once checks the current of feeling. Let us add that nowhere in the Cantata does Dr. Garrett let himself go. He seems always to breathe the atmosphere pervading our undemonstrative modern society, in which more than a languid interest is considered bad "form." This at times is exasperating. When the Shunammite exclaims "My soul shall be joyful in the Lord," we expect a passionate utterance of gladness; and when in her despair she declares, "The Lord hath forsaken me," we require an expression of utter abandonment to grief. Dr. Garrett's music neither sounds from the heights of happiness, nor gives utterance de profundis, and in so far as its feeling is shallow it fails. While making these general and strictly called-for observations, we do not forget—nay, we gladly remember—that some of the numbers are a credit to the composer. Among them are the chorus "Children are a heritage and gift," the harvest chorus with which the second part opens; and, in the third part, Elisha's air "Ah! Lord God." Dr. Garrett's orchestration betrays a somewhat inexperienced hand. It lacks play of colour and contrast; being too uniform throughout, and it is deficient in salient points of the kind which redeem the orchestra from the charge of mere accompaniment, and give it an independent place among the resources of expression. We must, in fairness, add that the Cantata was received with great favour, loud and enthusiastic calls for the composer following its close. The performance—well conducted by Mr. Villiers Stanford, who had under him an orchestra led by Mr. Burnett—gave considerable satisfaction, to which the soloists, Miss Anna Williams (the Shunammite), Miss Hilda Wilson (Narrator), Mr. Abercrombie (Elisha), and Mr. MacDonnell, of Clare (Gehazi), largely contributed.

With the Cantata were presented the Overture to "Die Zauberflöte" and Beethoven's Violin Concerto—solo by Herr Gompertz, late a pupil of Herr Joachim, and now a professor resident in Cambridge. Herr Gompertz is a credit to his distinguished master, not a few of whose merits he has succeeded in securing to some extent as his own. He played on this occasion with admirable freedom and brilliancy. His tone is not large, but makes up in sweetness for what it lacks in volume; his execution is precise, and his rendering of cantabile passages, as in the slow movement, marked by simple and unaffected expression. Herr Gompertz was loudly applauded, as he deserved to be. The orchestral part of the work gave little occasion for criticism, and Mr. Villiers Stanford conducted, as usual, well.

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE second of these resuscitated Festivals was held on the 7th, 8th and 9th ult., under far more favourable circumstances than the first, in 1879. The Precentor of the Cathedral (the Rev. C. Hylton Stewart, M.A.) and the Organist (Mr. Joseph C. Bridge, M.A., Mus. B.), encouraged by the success of their joint efforts in 1879, when a balance of £525 was handed over to the Restoration Fund, have succeeded in establishing a Festival at Chester which bids fair to be of equal importance with any of the provincial meetings, excepting perhaps those held at Birmingham. The position of Chester affords exceptional opportunities for securing a good orchestra and chorus, Manchester and Liverpool being excellent centres of both. On this occasion the band, led by Herr Straus, was admirable, and the chorus, though comparatively small (about 200), and containing contingents from many cathedral choirs, was well balanced, and, on the whole, most satisfactory. The soprano part of the chorus at the first Festival was rendered entirely by boys, but this does not seem to have been considered advisable on the present occasion, for we noticed in the chorus a fair proportion of ladies. Space will not allow us to enter much into detail, nor indeed is it necessary to do so, for the compositions performed were more or less familiar to all musicians.

The Festival Services were given in the Cathedral on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the works being "Elijah," "The Prodigal Son," "The Last Judgment," "The Creation," and "The Woman of Samaria." The principal artists engaged were Madame Marie Roze, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Madame Mudie Bolingbroke, Mr. Maas, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Hilton. With regard to the performance of "Elijah," beyond chronicling the facts that Madame Patey made more than her usual impression in the part of the Queen, which she sung with much dramatic energy and fire; that Miss Marriott, upon whom devolved the whole of the soprano part, fulfilled her task in a manner which gave universal satisfaction; and that Messrs. Maas and King were in excellent voice, nothing remains to be said. The interest evinced by the public to hear "The Prodigal Son," as the early work of a man who has since attained great eminence in the art (although now directed in a somewhat different line) was to a certain extent a plea for its selection, but it failed to produce much effect. In this work the chorus was certainly not at its best, the pitch not being well sustained in many points. Mr. Maas sang "I will arise" with a fervour which is sometimes wanting in his rendering of sacred music, and with Mr. King, in the duet between father and son, he was specially impressive. One of the great features in the performance was the rendering of Beethoven's C minor Symphony. From the position in which we were placed, we can certainly say that the execution of the work was faultless. Of the remaining items given at the Cathedral, perhaps "The Woman of Samaria" was the most interesting, owing to its comparative freshness. "God is a Spirit" was sung with exquisite pathos by Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Guy, and Mr. King.

The Concerts in the evenings, which were held in the Music Hall, included (on Wednesday) "Acis and Galatea," with Miss Mary Davies as Galatea (who sang the music allotted to her with excellent effect), Mr. Henry Guy as Acis, Mr. Harper Kearton as Damon, and Mr. Hilton as Polyphemus. Mr. Guy was in excellent voice, and too much praise cannot be given to Mr. Hilton for his admirable rendering of "O ruddier than the cherry." On Thursday evening Dr. Bridge's "Boadicea" was given, Miss Marriott, Madame Mudie Bolingbroke, Mr. Maas, and Mr. King being the principals, and also a selection from "The Veiled Prophet," from the pen of Mr. Villiers Stanford. Dr. Bridge met with a most enthusiastic reception, and must have been highly gratified with such a capital performance of his work. The Concert, which included a MS. Overture by the late Sir John Goss, written in 1825 for the London Philharmonic Society, concluded with the March from Mr. Prout's new Cantata "Alfred." Friday night was essentially the "people's night"—a Ballad Concert, in which all the artists appeared with much success.

A word of praise must be given to the talented Organist of the Cathedral for the manner in which he conducted the band and chorus; indeed, it would be difficult to find an artist better qualified for such a responsible post in any of our cathedrals.

The Festival week was a highly enjoyable one, the hospitality of the Cathedral and civic authorities being, as usual, profuse in its liberality and geniality. The thanks of your correspondent are due to the Organist and Precentor for their kindness and attention during his most pleasant sojourn in the ancient city; and he may be allowed to express a hope that three years hence a similarly successful Festival may be held in the old Cathedral.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

JUNE has been comparatively barren in events of musical interest in Birmingham, and the outlook for next month is hardly more promising. We are now in the midst of the lull which usually precedes the Festival storm, and for the next six or seven weeks the musical activity of this centre will be almost wholly concentrated on the work of rehearsal. The rehearsal of Festival works by the choir is proceeding regularly each Monday and Friday under Mr. Stockley's direction, and by the time these lines are in print the whole of the new works will be in a forward state of preparation. After Brahms's terribly difficult "Triumphlied," most of the other novelties have proved comparatively child's-play, though there are parts of Gade's "Psyche," as well as of Gounod's great work, which will need much attention on the part of the members of the choir to enable them to master their full significance and proper expression. Mr. Gaul's "Holy City" has met with great favour from the choir, who recognise in it the work of a master in the art of part-writing. Altogether the choral music of the Festival promises to be a feature of more than ordinary interest and importance, and it is satisfactory to be able to add that the choir, which has been carefully weeded as well as largely reinforced for the occasion, was never more competent to do justice to its task. At the band rehearsals in London, which take place in the week preceding the Festival, some attempt will probably be made to obtain completeness of effect by the employment of a selected skeleton choir in conjunction with the band and principals.

The musical event of the month has been the reappearance here of the eminent Viennese pianist, Madame Sophie Menter, whose second Recital, given in the new theatre of the Midland Institute, attracted even a larger audience and created greater enthusiasm than the first. The programme, as on the former occasion, was divided into three parts, the first devoted to Schumann's "Carnaval," the second to works by Handel, Scarlatti, Liszt, Chopin, Mendelssohn, and Tausig, the lady's early instructor; and the last to Liszt's wonderful Fantasia on Auber's "Muette de Portici." Madame Menter's playing of the characteristic and fantastic Suite of movements by Schumann was, in spite of some omissions and curtailments, a most graphic and masterly effort, which never suffered the interest of the audience to flag. In the second part, whilst doing ample justice to the requirements of the classic composers, Handel and Scarlatti, she excelled most conspicuously in compositions of the romantic modern school of Schubert and Chopin; but her most marvellous feat was unquestionably her performance of the Liszt Fantasia, in the Tarantella portion of which the adapter has piled Pelion upon Ossa, in the shape of technical difficulties and novel effects. The enthusiasm evoked by this and certain other performances of Madame Menter recalled the occasion of some of Rubinstein's greatest triumphs here.

The Birmingham Amateur Harmonic Association, which contributes an important contingent to the Festival Choir, has newly revised its scheme, with a view to increase the usefulness and popularity of the undertaking. An important feature of this scheme is the formation of an amateur band to co-operate with the choir, with the aid of which it is in contemplation to give each season two high-class concerts for subscribers only.

Of the Haverly Minstrels, who took possession of the Theatre Royal on the 19th ult., it will perhaps suffice to say that they have given the Birmingham public some new ideas as to the possibilities of pictorial bill-posting.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the eleventh Monday Popular Concert, on the 5th ult., Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony were the two chief items on the programme. The strings displayed more tone than usual in the opening Sostenuuto of the Overture, and the singular passage at the close of the Allegro for clarinets, oboes, and bassoons, alone, was well rendered. The performance of the Symphony was highly successful, the Andante especially calling forth loud applause. The lightness and delicacy of the strings throughout was very noticeable, and the band showed due appreciation of the marks of expression. Mr. Riseley is to be congratulated upon so excellent an interpretation of this Symphony. Mr. Roeckel played Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor; Gounod's Overture to "Le Médecin malgré Lui" being the only other item of any consequence.

The Popular Concert on the 19th ult. began with Gounod's Royal Wedding March, the performance of which was not altogether satisfactory. The trombones were too loud, and obscured the counterpoint in the principal movement. The March was followed by the Overture to "Anacreon" (Cherubini), in which the crescendos were magnificently done, although the first violins were rather weak in the loud parts. In point of fact the first violins need strengthening, the more so because the other strings are particularly good. The Symphony was Mendelssohn's "Reformation." This went well on the whole, except for the usual want of power in the strings in the forte passages. The delicately beautiful Scherzo and Trio (in which the above fault was not apparent) went the best of the seven movements; but the giving out of the famous hymn-tune "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," in the Andante con moto, by the wind, was very creditable; and the fugal episode in the final movement was well rendered, especially by the violas. Mr. Roeckel played Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, the accompaniment of which was well and carefully performed by the band. Miss Hardy was the vocalist.

The season closes on the 3rd inst. with Mr. Riseley's morning and evening Benefit Concerts, for which occasion we understand the orchestra will be reinforced. The programme promises to be exceptionally good, embracing Mr. Villiers Stanford's Overture and Ballet-music from "The Veiled Prophet" (conducted by the composer); Mr. E. Prout's Organ Concerto (also conducted by the composer), the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor (solo violin, Herr Gompertz), and several standard works selected from among those which have found most favour during the past season. Mr. Riseley has (to quote from the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians") "for the last five years devoted his energies to the improvement of orchestral music in Bristol," with what success may be seen from the long catalogue, published with the programme on the 19th ult., of works performed by his band during that period. This list includes Symphonies, Concertos, and Overtures by Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Handel, Spohr, Cherubini, Schubert, Schumann, Hummel, Wagner, Weber, Gounod, &c., and miscellaneous works, too numerous to mention, by all the great composers from Handel down to those of the present day, living English composers being largely represented. The band is composed entirely of English, and principally of local, performers. No small praise is due to the perseverance and self-sacrifice of Mr. Riseley, who is spending the best years of his life in thus elevating the musical taste of his native city, with little or no profit, pecuniarily, to himself, instead of seeking personal advancement elsewhere.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE great features of the Summer Term just concluded have been the Festival of the University Musical Club, the establishment of some Orchestral Concerts, and, a rare event in Oxford, the production of some music written by a resident in the city. The first of these events took place on April 21 and 22, and was a celebration of the foundation, ten years ago, of the Club for the Cultivation of Chamber Music. Ten years' good work finds the Society prosperous and vigorous; and the commemoration performances were of the greatest interest, inasmuch as many old members came up to take part in them. The programmes were of such excellence that it is hard to particularise, but perhaps Mr. Stanford's Piano Quartet in F, Brahms's Sestet in B flat, and Bach's Concerto for two pianofortes, in C minor, will be the most vividly remembered by those who had the good fortune to be present.

The neglect with which orchestral music has long been treated at Oxford seems likely to become a thing of the past, as a number of public-spirited gentlemen have formed a committee with a view to securing the performance of symphonies and other high-class music of the kind. The first Concert under their auspices was given in the Sheldonian Theatre on May 16. Bach's Suite for Strings and Flute in B minor, Haydn's No. 2 (Salomon's) Symphony, and Beethoven's No. 1 Symphony were the chief features. It is impossible to refrain from praising the merit of the performance, or from hoping that this new venture will prove thoroughly successful.

The third point we have mentioned was the performance of the "Cyclops" of Euripides, at Magdalen College School, on April 28 and 29, when Mr. Franklin Harvey, the President of the Musical Club, supplied a setting of the choruses, &c. Mr. Harvey seems to have been influenced by Mendelssohn's idea of "making these old dramas live again," but there was no trace of Mendelssohnian influence in the music itself. The task of setting a Greek comic play to appropriate music could not have been easy, but no one who heard the result was able to doubt that the composer had been successful. An original and graceful "Dance of Satyrs" perhaps gave most pleasure to the audience, but, in our judgment, many of the choruses were of even higher merit. It is to be hoped Mr. Harvey will not let his pen rest; the most diffident might be encouraged by such a success as this essay obtained.

Of the numerous other performances, interesting enough in themselves, we may speak more briefly. The Philharmonic Society gave "The Ruins of Athens," Max Bruch's "Fair Ellen," and Beethoven's C minor Symphony, in the Sheldonian Theatre, on the 12th ult. Of the chorus-singing the kindest thing is to say nothing; the Symphony was, on the whole, well played. There have been the usual number of College Concerts, which this year were chiefly notable as exhibiting the great dearth of good amateur singers in Oxford at the present time. It is hardly too much to say that only one out of the dozen or so who sang on various occasions soared above mediocrity—Mr. Tuckwell, of Pembroke. Matthew Locke's (sic) Music to "Macbeth" was given at Exeter on May 19; Macfarren's "Outward Bound" and A. M. Smith's "Ode to the North-East Wind," at Queen's, on the 9th ult. It is quite impossible to find a word of praise for either performance. The Concert at Queen's, however, bad as the vocal music was, contained some excellent instrumental music. The performance of Sir Sterndale Bennett's F minor Piano-forte Concerto by Mr. Parratt was one of those things that do not easily fade from the memory, and Messrs. Patton, Williams, and Smith all played good music well. The same may be said of Messrs. Lingard, Johns, and Spinney at Exeter. Magdalen, as usual, wound up the season with a Madrigal Concert on the 14th ult. The singing was, also as usual, nearly perfect, the only exception being "The Rhine Maidens" and "There is a paradise on earth." We would suggest that if dates are assigned to composers they should be correct. Wilbye's Madrigal, "The Lady Oriana," certainly should not be dated 1590, or Cooke's "Hark! hark! the lark" 1634. These statements are, however, not improbably due to the curious humorist who adorned the programme with eleven misprints in as many pages. In conclusion we may note with satisfaction that the encore nuisance and the late-arrival nuisance show some signs of yielding. Managers are beginning to keep the doors closed during the performance of each piece, and even to refuse to allow encores. It is to be hoped that future years may show steady progress in both respects.

NORTH-EAST CATHEDRAL CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

ON Thursday, the 22nd ult., the Second Festival of the above Association was held in Durham Cathedral. The object of this Society is to gather in turn around the three Cathedral Choirs the larger choirs of the dioceses of York, Durham, and Ripon, in annual Festivals at which the music shall comprise Church Oratorios and Services by our leading living church composers. The inaugural Festival was held last year in York Minster, when Dr. Armes's Oratorio "St. John the Evangelist," which found such hearty acceptance with the choirs of the musical north, was produced. This year the Church Oratorio selected was "Mount Moriah," by the accomplished Organist of Westminster Abbey, who very kindly undertook to conduct his work. The comparative shortness of "Mount Moriah" allowed somewhat more time for the rest of the service than could be afforded at York. This was taken advantage of to introduce an Evening Service written by Dr. Armes for the occasion—a Service which cannot fail to take high rank among the great festival Services. The whole available space of Durham Cathedral was taken up by the associated choirs, the total number being 238 boys and 234 men, with 90 sopranos and 62 contraltos. The solos were sung by members of the three Cathedral Choirs, and gave complete proof that the north-east cathedrals are faithfully upholding the high traditions of our cathedrals in general. The soprano and contralto solos were all sung by boys, who must have satisfied all hearers that, when rightly trained and duly prepared, their voices are better fitted for cathedral use than those of lady vocalists. Of the general chorus it may be said that they proved themselves worthy of the occasion. No doubt the most interesting feature of the day was the magnificent playing of Dr. Armes on his fine organ. In everything except weather the day must be pronounced a success. After rehearsal there was an abundant lunch—towards which the Dean and Chapter generously gave £25—provided in the Castle Hall, very kindly lent for the purpose. The warmest praise is due to Precentor Rogers for the admirable manner in which all the details of the Festival were organised and carried out.

For next year's Festival, which will be held at Ripon, Dr. Gladstone has written a Church Oratorio, "Philippi; or, the Acts of SS. Paul and Silas in Macedonia." The Secretary to the Association is the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, Bilbrough Rectory, York, who will be most ready to correspond on the details of organisation with any who may see their way to similar choral movement in their own district.

OBITUARY.

THE death is announced, at Frankfort-on-Main, on the 25th ult., of Herr Raff, the well-known composer. Joseph Joachim Raff was born, May 22, 1822, at Lachen, in the canton of Schwyz, where his parents temporarily resided. He was Swiss, however, only as far as the accident of birth in Switzerland made him; remaining all his life a good German and worthy subject of the King of Wurtemberg. Through a family reverse his stay at the university soon ended, and in order to get a living he devoted himself to teaching. Not till that period of the young man's career did a special taste for music develop itself in a commanding way. Raff had already studied the pianoforte, violin, and organ; but these things no longer contented him, and he tried his hand at composition, sending, in 1843, some of his works to Mendelssohn for the benefit of that master's opinion upon them. Mendelssohn seems to have thought well of his talents, and, with characteristic kindness, introduced him to Breitkopf and Härtel, the Leipzig publishers. This encouragement determined Raff's future. Thenceforth he devoted his life to music, regretting, but at the same time disregarding, the opposition of his parents. For some time Raff's experience was hard and bitter; yet he struggled on, abating nothing of heart or hope, and at last secured a friend in Liszt, who engaged him as accompanist on his concert tours. While thus occupied he found himself at Cologne, and being left there by Liszt, who returned to Paris, made the personal acquaintance of Mendelssohn, under whom he proposed to prosecute his studies in composition.

The master's lamented death in 1847 of course put an end to the arrangement, and Raff remained in Cologne, earning his bread in part by contributing to the journal Cæcilia, then edited by Dehn and published by Schott. It is said that his writings were so mature as to make Dehn fancy him a man of forty, and his surprise was great to discover, on a personal introduction, that he was only a young fellow of twenty-five. From Cologne Raff started for Vienna, recommended by Liszt to the publisher Mechatti, who, however, died before an interview could be obtained. Disappointed as to Vienna the composer went to Stuttgart, where Lindpaintner was chapelmaster and musical king. Lindpaintner's classicism would have nothing to do with Raff's romanticism, but happily the young man fell in with Hans von Bülow, whose tendencies were in the opposite direction, and who at once consented to produce a work from his pen. At this time Raff began an opera, on the subject of King Alfred, for Reissiger at Dresden, and looked forward anxiously to its performance as his real début. The tempest of revolution swept over Germany, and blew away the composer's hopes, so he followed Liszt to Weimar, where that virtuoso had settled down. There he settled down also, finished his opera, and saw it produced under the direction of his powerful friend. A number of other works followed, including a pamphlet in which he defended Wagner's theory of the lyric drama. In 1855 he left Weimar for Wiesbaden, and there fixed his residence as professor of the pianoforte. In 1859 he married Mdle. Dora Genast, an actress, and thenceforth quietly devoted his life to teaching and composition, either at Wiesbaden or at Frankfurt.

Raff was a most prolific composer in nearly every branch of musical art. He wrote three operas, ten symphonies, several suites, overtures, &c.; a mass of vocal pieces, including thirty choruses for four voices; three concertos for various instruments and orchestra; about fifty concerted compositions for the chamber, and almost innumerable pieces for the pianoforte. Some of these, it can hardly be doubted, will live; but many others show more technical ability than genius. Raff, in point of fact, was too prolific. In the truest sense he would have done more had he accomplished less. His death, however, removes an able and accomplished artist whom music at the present day can ill afford to lose.

SHORTLY after the termination of the Concert at the Crystal Palace on the 17th ult., which was given for Mr. Manns's benefit, a large number of persons assembled to witness the interesting ceremony of presenting to the well known Conductor of the Sydenham musical performances a testimonial, consisting of a purse containing £700, and an album with the signatures of 494 subscribers. Professor Macfarren presided, and was supported by many of the most eminent members of the profession. The Chairman, in an excellent speech, alluded in high terms of praise to the services rendered in furtherance of a knowledge of musical art by Mr. Manns during the many years he has directed the Crystal Palace Concerts; and Mrs. Meadows White (Alice Mary Smith), in presenting the testimonial added some well-timed and appropriate words expressive of the respect earned by Mr. Manns in the discharge of the duties which he had so ably fulfilled. The presentation was supplemented by two baskets of flowers from the ladies of the Crystal Palace Choir, and the recipient, after much applause, replied, heartily thanking Professor Macfarren and all who had subscribed to the testimonial, and alluding with becoming modesty, to the fact of his being but a "worker" in the great cause he had at heart. The proceedings closed with votes of thanks to Professor Macfarren and Mrs. White.

In the recent actions before Mr. Justice Day—Wall v. Taylor, and Wall v. Martin—brought to recover damages and penalties under the Copyright Acts for an infringement of the plaintiff's copyright in a composition entitled "Will-o'-the-Wisp," verdicts were given to the plaintiff for damages, which the jury assessed at one shilling; but as the action was to recover penalties also, on this point the Judge said that the defendants had succeeded, therefore the plaintiff was ordered to pay defendant's costs in each case. The song in question was asserted by the plaintiff to be a "dramatic piece"; but this was not proved, the composition being described on the title-page as a "descriptive song."

AN Organ Recital was given in Holy Trinity Church, Crouch Hill, on the 6th ult., by Mr. Charles W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., Cantab., in aid of the Organ Completion Fund. The programme comprised Rheinberger's Sonata in F sharp, No. 5; Smart's Fantasia with Choral in G; Bach's Double Fugue in C minor, Dr. Chipp's Pastorate in A, and selections from the works of Handel, Beethoven, and Meyerbeer.

THE examinations under Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, professor of music at the University, for degrees in music, at the University of Oxford, will take place as follows: 1. Second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music.—This examination will commence on Tuesday, October 17, at 10 a.m., in the schools. In addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of the full scores of Mozart's Symphony in E flat, and Handel's "Jephtha." Candidates are required to bring the scores with them. 2. Examination for the Degree of Doctor in Music.—This examination will commence at the same time and place as the above. Each of the above examinations will occupy at least two days. Candidates whose exercises have been approved, and who propose to offer themselves for either of these examinations, are required to give in their names to Mr. George Parker, the clerk of the schools, on or before October 6, to pay the statutable fee of £2, and to exhibit their "testamatur" of having passed the previous examination.

THE Organ in the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Waterloo Road, after being "enlarged and modernised" by Messrs. Hele and Co., Plymouth, was reopened on Sunday, the 11th ult., preparatory to a series of Recitals on the four following days. Some historical importance attaches to the instrument in question. There is good authority for stating that Bach's "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues" were first played upon it in this country by Mr. Jacob. Mendelssohn tested its capacity on more than one occasion, and the late Dr. S. S. Wesley was Organist at St. John's for some time. Under these circumstances it is satisfactory to know that the fine old organ has been judiciously treated by the Plymouth firm; and, though not of very large dimensions—there are forty-one registers—bids fair to retain its place as one of the best south of the Thames. The cost of rebuilding is £400, and contributions towards the fund will be thankfully received by the vicar, the Rev. A. W. Jephson.

MISS SAIDIE SINGLETON gave an Evening Concert on the 9th ult., at the residence of Dr. and Mrs. Julius Pollock, Harley Street. The programme was well selected, and Miss Singleton's rendering of "Voi che sapete" (Mozart) and "My Heart" (Monciffe) elicited much and well-deserved applause. She also took part in duets with Gounod and A. G. Thomas with equal success. The other vocalists were Madame Clara Samuël, Madame Enriquez, Messrs. Hutchinson, Ben Davies, Maybrick, Robertson, and Thorndike. Miss Randegger also contributed some pianoforte solos, creating a marked effect in Chopin's Scherzo in B minor; and Herr Louis Ries gave an admirable rendering of some violin solos by Hofmann and Rameau. The Conductors were Mr. Sidney Naylor, Mr. Cliffe, and Signor Randegger.

THE 144th Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians was held in St. James's Hall on the 21st ult., the Right Hon. the Rev. Lord O'Neil in the chair. The musical arrangements of the evening presented the usual attraction at these meetings, the vocalists being Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Spenser Jones, and the London Vocal Union, which, under the able direction of Mr. Fred. Walker, gave some well selected part-songs with excellent effect. Miss Randegger also contributed some pianoforte solos, and Mr. Radcliff a fantasia on the flute, the accompanists being Mr. Harvey Löhr and Mr. Fountain Meen. In addition to the usual appeal from the Chairman, speeches in aid of the objects of the Society were made by Sir Thomas Gladstone, Mr. Meadows White, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and the Rev. Dr. Cox, the Hon. Chaplain.

MR. EDMUND ROGERS gave a Concert at Steinway Hall on the 3rd ult., when his new Humorous Cantata "Blue-Beard" was produced for the first time in London. The tenor aria "Young Fatima, of beauty," sung by Mr. Henry Taylor, was encored, a like compliment being awarded to Mr. Frederic Penna for his interpretation of the bass solo "Darling, I'm going away." Miss Adela Vernon and Miss Winthrop lent most valuable aid in their respective parts. The work was throughout warmly received by a large audience, and the composer, who conducted, was recalled at the conclusion of the performance. Mr. C. T. Corke and Mr. Kiver ably accompanied.

THE Members of the St. Stephen's Musical Society closed their season with a performance of Haydn's "Creation," at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush, on Wednesday, May 31. The solos were efficiently rendered by Miss Kate Hardy, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. S. H. Beckley; the airs "In native worth" and "With verdure clad" being particularly worthy of praise. The choir gave evidence of careful training, the attack being very good, and the parts well sustained. There was a small but efficient band, which contributed much to the success of the Concert. Signor Dinelli conducted. The proceeds of the Concert are to be devoted to the St. Stephen's Church Choir Fund.

THE Festival of the Military Guild of the Holy Standard took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday, the 1st ult., the Order of Service used being that given in the book compiled specially for the Association by Mr. F. B. Baker. As in past years, the musical arrangements were in the hands of the Gregorian Association, which numbered about 300 voices, assisted by several wind instruments and two drums. Farrant's "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake" was the anthem, and in place of the state prayers, the "Domine salvam fac," from Gounod's "Messe des Orphéonistes," was sung. Surgeon-Major F. B. Baker conducted, and Mr. C. Warwick Jordan presided at the organ.

By the prospectus of the Pietermaritzburg Philharmonic Society, recently forwarded to us, we find that the Association is in a flourishing state, and promises to become an established institution in the town. The announcement of its second season is extremely hopeful, a large number of members' tickets having been taken; and as Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," Romberg's "Lay of the Bell," the "Macbeth" Music, and Handel's "Messiah" are in the list of works to be performed during the season, the energy displayed in the management of the Society should ensure for it all the encouragement and support it evidently deserves.

THE lovers of high-class music will, we are certain, be glad to learn that Messrs. Franke and Schultz-Curtius have re-entered into partnership for the management of Orchestral Concerts and German Opera. During the winter six Orchestral Concerts will be given; the second season of German Opera, under the direction of Messrs. H. Franke and B. Pollini, and conducted by Herr Hans Richter, will take place during May and June, 1883; and a series of nine Orchestral Concerts is announced for the months of April, May, and June, 1883. Particulars respecting the above arrangements will shortly be published.

THE St. George's Glee Union held its usual Monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 2nd ult., when an attractive miscellaneous programme was presented. The soloists were Miss Annie Matthews, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom were highly successful. The part-singing, which included "Now tramp" (Bishop) and "You stole my love" (W. Macfarren), was excellent. Mr. F. R. Kinke and Miss Edith Mahon played the accompaniments, the former also contributing a pianoforte solo with his usual ability. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

AT the last weekly meeting (previous to the recess) of the "North-West London Musical and Dramatic Society," held on the 10th ult., the members presented their Conductor (Mr. F. A. Bridge), with an elegant electro-silver tray and tea-service, accompanied by a most complimentary letter. The tray bears the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. F. A. Bridge, by the members of the Operatic and Dramatic Class of the North-West London School of Music, as a slight acknowledgment of their esteem for him in conducting the class with so much kindness and ability. June 10, 1882."

ON Friday, June 16, the Grosvenor Choral Society gave a selection of part-songs, under the conductorship of Mr. G. R. Egerton. Pinsuti's graceful "There is music" and Mendelssohn's "Vintage Song" for male voices (encored) were very successful. Amongst the soloists Miss Millie Turner and Miss Grace Gye (vocalists), and Mr. H. Warner Hollis (flute) were especially worthy of praise.

A PERFORMANCE of "The Messiah," with band and chorus of one hundred performers, was given at the Holborn Town Hall on May 25, for the benefit of the Organ Fund of St. John's, Red Lion Square. The solo vocalists were Miss Margaret Cockburn, R.A.M., Miss Hughes, Mr. J. Cross, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, all of whom were highly efficient. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ, Mr. Solomon played the trumpet obbligato, and Mr. C. J. Viner, Organist of St. John's, conducted. The choruses were sung with precision and firmness.

ON the 12th ult. a Meeting was held at Manchester, Dr. Hiles in the chair, for the purpose of forming an Association called the "Society of Professional Musicians," the object of which, like the "Musical Association" in London, is to read papers on matters relating to music and musicians, and to invite discussion thereon. Another meeting is announced to take place on the 1st inst., at which the rules proposed at the first meeting will be reconsidered, and a Council elected.

THE choirs of the Kyrle Society, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave performances of the "Creation" on the 7th and 14th ult. At the first, in St. Mark's Church, Whitechapel, the soloists were Misses Constance and Eva Layton, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme; and at the second, in St. Paul's Church, Old Ford, the soloists were Mrs. Stanerby, Miss Agnes Allen, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris, and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ at both performances.

THE Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee of the Corporation have prepared a Report upon the reference "to consider in what manner the Corporation can most appropriately and effectually aid in the movement set on foot by the Prince of Wales for establishing a Royal College of Music, for providing systematic musical instruction for all classes of her Majesty's subjects," and are prepared to recommend a grant of £5,000 in aid of the College, in annual sums of £1,000.

ON Friday, the 9th ult., the fine organ at St. John's, Horselydown, Southwark, was reopened by Mr. Richard Lemaire, the recently appointed Organist and director of the choir. The instrument has been restored by Messrs. Lewis and Co. Mr. Lemaire performed selections from the works of Spohr, Mendelssohn, Guilmant, Steggall, &c. There was full choral evensong previous to the Recital, this being the first service rendered by the newly formed choir.

THE Annual Festival of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel took place in Westminster Abbey on Wednesday evening, the 21st ult. The music was rendered by the choir of the Lay Helpers' Association, conducted by Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac.; Mr. Winter presiding at the organ. A selection from Schubert's "Song of Miriam" formed the anthem, and four brass instruments greatly added to the effect of the service. Canon Knox-Little was the preacher.

ON Wednesday evening, the 7th ult., Mr. Sinclair Dunn, R.A.M., gave his new entertainment, entitled "Auld Scotch Songs," to the members of the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution. The entertainment consisted of a slight sketch of the lives of the principal song-writers of Scotland, illustrated by graphic anecdotes, and the singing of some of their more characteristic songs. Mr. Dunn was assisted in his illustrations by Miss Eleanor Rees.

THE first series of meetings organised for the licentiates, associates, and other diplômés of Trinity College, London, was brought to a close on the 13th ult., when an excellent paper on "The Mechanism and Management of the Human Voice" was read by Herr Emil Behnke to a large and appreciative audience. Mr. E. J. Hopkins was in the chair. It is stated that these meetings will be resumed in the Michaelmas Term.

MESSRS. JAMES CONACHER AND SONS, organ-builders, of Huddersfield, have built the organ for the Industrial and Art Exhibition in connection with the Bradford Technical School, which was opened by the Prince and Princess of Wales on the 23rd ult. The instrument is good in quality, sufficient power and beauty of tone being very successfully combined.

A VERY successful performance of Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was given on the 8th ult. by the Choral Society in connection with the Stratford Congregational Church. The vocalists were Miss Gower, Miss Miles, Mr. A. Gower, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Jas. Blackney. The band and chorus consisted of nearly a hundred performers. Mr. J. W. Hale conducted. There was a large and appreciative audience.

At the Church of St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, Fenchurch Street, after Evensong on Sunday evening, the 11th ult., being the Sunday after Corpus Christi, Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was sung to the original words. The soli parts were taken by Master Frank Tebbutt, Mr. Arthur Hooper, and Mr. Franklin Clive. Mr. Theodore Drew was at the organ, and Mr. Stedman conducted. The church, as usual, was crowded to excess.

WE are informed that Miss Emily Shinner had recently the honour of playing a violin solo before the Princess of Wales and a distinguished private circle at Kensington Palace. Miss Shinner attended at the desire of the Princess Louise, and her performance elicited warm encomiums, especially from the Princess of Wales. Miss Shinner has for a long time been studying at the Hoch-Schule, Berlin, as a pupil of the distinguished violinist, Dr. Joachim.

ON Prize Day, the 20th ult., at Ardingly College, Sussex, "The Ancient Mariner," by T. Mee Pattison, was performed in the hall. The Cantata was greatly admired by a numerous audience, and much applauded. The rendering by the highly cultured choir of this School, consisting of masters and boys, was excellent, the choruses being sung with a precision and steadiness to which the habit of daily singing together so greatly contributes.

SIR J. BENEDICT'S "St. Peter" will be given at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, on Thursday, the 6th inst., at 5 p.m., with full orchestral accompaniment and choir of one hundred voices. The baritone and tenor parts will be sung by Mr. John Bridson and Mr. Bryant, and the soprano solo parts by Master Carrington: Organ, Dr. Bridge; Conductor, Mr. W. de M. Sergison, Organist of the church.

FROM Canada comes news of the decease of Mr. Henry Whish, Mus. Bac., one of the most eminent organists in the country, an excellent theorist, and a contributor on musical subjects to several papers. At his funeral, which was largely attended, a musical service was performed, and several floral offerings of affection were sent by his pupils and friends.

THE marriage of Sir George Elvey and Miss Mary Savory, youngest daughter of the late Mr. Joseph Savory, of Buckhurst Park, took place on the 20th ult. at Sunninghill Church, Berkshire. Sir George Elvey, who was appointed by King William IV. Organist to the Chapel Royal of St. George, Windsor, has resigned his appointment.

IN aid of the funds of the New Baptist Chapel, Brixton, an evening Concert was given on the 8th ult., at Brixton Hall. The most notable items upon the programme were the pianoforte soli of Mr. Alfred Izard and Mrs. Rushton Odell, each of whom obtained an encore. The singers were amateurs.

THE Association of Lay Helpers for the London Diocese will hold their Annual Festival in Westminster Abbey on Tuesday evening next, the 4th inst., at half-past seven. Dr. Stainer's Anthem "I saw the Lord" is to be sung, and four brass instruments will strengthen the accompaniments.

THE Festival of the Girls' Friendly Society took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Saturday evening, the 24th ult. The choir of the Lay Helpers' Association sustained the musical portion of the service, and Dr. Stainer's "I saw the Lord" was the Anthem. Mr. G. C. Martin conducted, and Mr. W. Hodge was the Organist.

MR. JAMES R. BOOSÉ gave his first Concert at Loughboro' Hall, Brixton, on Wednesday Evening, the 21st ult., assisted by Madame Worrell, Miss F. Davis, Mrs. E. Mitchell, Miss Marie Dulcken (pianoforte), Miss Chidley (concertina), and Messrs. R. F. Roberts, H. Newton, and J. Ion Cattle. The bénéficiaire accompanied.

THE first Orchestral Concert by the Band of the South London Institute of Music took place on the 20th ult., when Haydn's Symphony No. 7, Cherubini's Overture "Lodoiska," Boieldieu's Overture "Jean de Paris," and other selections were performed in a highly creditable manner. Two violin solos by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, and two songs by Mr. E. Bryant, were very successful. Mr. L. C. Venables conducted.

A FLOWER SERVICE was held on Tuesday, the 20th ult., at St. Mildred's, Bread Street, when the church was tastefully decorated. The Anthem was Sir John Goss's "The Wilderness," and after the Sermon a selection from "The Hymn of Praise" was given. Dr. Verrinder presided at the organ. The church was crowded.

A COMPLIMENTARY Concert was given to Mr. William Lemare, Conductor of the Brixton Choral Society, by his pupils, on Saturday evening, the 24th ult., at Angell Town Institution. The contributions were decidedly praiseworthy.

THE Philharmonic Society announces six Concerts to take place at St. James's Hall during their seventy-first season. The dates are February 15, March 1 and 15, April 25, May 9 and 23, 1883.

MR. C. HARFORD LLOYD, Organist of Gloucester Cathedral, has accepted the post of Organist at Christ Church, Oxford, vacant by the resignation, through ill-health, of Dr. Corfe.

THE next performance of the Musical Artists' Society will take place at the Royal Academy on the 8th inst. The particulars will be found in our advertising columns.

REVIEWS.

Life and Letters of Berlioz. Translated from the French by H. Mainwaring Dunstan. [Remingtons.]

IN spite of the admirable efforts that have been made by Mr. Bache, Mr. Charles Hallé and others, towards popularising the works of Berlioz, it is to be feared that, with the exception of his symphonic compositions, the music of this great composer is but half-understood, and still less appreciated. Although the cloud of witnesses eager in his lifetime to testify to the bad faith of his criticism and his pedantic egotism has been dispersed since his death, and scattered by the four winds to the limbo where all unworthy jealousies find their own most fitting place, and his bonâ fides as critic is no more disputed than the genuineness of his inspiration, there still exists a disposition to regard him as an innovating heretic who disturbed alike the dogmas of the orthodox and the gods of their worship: interesting as a man by the inherent force of his genius, but decidedly mad. The neglect of his dramatic works at the present time is deplorable. If the thorough representation of "Benvenuto Cellini" or "Les Troyens" demands multiplied rehearsals and necessitates the mastery of great and complicated difficulties, the time required for the repetitions should not be grudged, least of all when the difficulties to be overcome are far from insuperable. The absence of the chef-d'œuvres of Beethoven and Gluck from the prospectus of the Italian Opera may be explained on quite other grounds; the chief obstacle in this instance being the impossibility of discovering a worthy successor to Mdlle. Tietjens. The enthusiasm with which the excellent performances of "Fidelio" have recently been received at Drury Lane is a proof that the public will avail themselves of any opportunity for hearing the great masters efficiently rendered. But so long as a portion of the public is willing to endure the representation of mediocre works, repeated ad nauseam, for the sake of hearing a favourite soprano whose position and merits are rendered more conspicuous by reason of the incompetency of her supporters, the hope of hearing "Les Troyens," or even "Béatrice et Bénédict," must be very faint. It is inconceivable what satisfaction the frequenters of the Covent Garden Opera can derive from the performance of works in which the very presence of a splendid orchestra is a bitter irony, and where the prima donna shines forth a star of planetary magnitude, whose brilliancy is enhanced by contrast with the incapacity of a most unheroic tenor and a mise-en-scène that is seldom wanting in ludicrous incident. The continuance of this state of things shows that the Italian Opera management is still what it has been for so many years past, and that it is above learning anything of the German Opera; and if its neglect of the great masters and its irreverent treatment of those whose works it condescends to represent meet with few protests it is, perhaps, because its patrons are willing that art and the claims of art should give way before the superior and more righteous claims of a prima donna assoluta. The fiery and eloquent letters from Germany in which Berlioz denounces the general admiration and worship of mediocrity might appropriately receive Mr. Gye's consideration.

The appearance at this time of these two volumes of the translation of the correspondence of Berlioz by Mr. Mainwaring Dunstan is opportune. Whether or not Mr. Dunstan has been seduced by the charm of aliteration, the title of his translation is misleading, for M. Bernard's notice of the life of Berlioz, which is prefixed to the collection of letters here translated, is in no sense of the word a life of the composer, but merely what M. Bernard himself accurately describes it—a notice of that life, and a notice, moreover, inadequate, inchoate, and devoid of critical authority. It is an abuse of language to call this biographical introduction a "Life"; and Mr. Dunstan is guilty of what cannot be regarded as a mistranslation when he substitutes this lofty title for the plainer and more truthful description of the original. M. Bernard's notice of the life of Berlioz is of no biographical value; its facts are founded upon the well-known autobiographical "Mémoires"; and, beyond an occasional amplification of a well-known anecdote, it contains no fresh matter, nor does it throw any fresh light upon its subject, nor reveal either critical sagacity or profundity of any kind whatever. In this respect it compares unfavourably with M. Ernest Legouvé's interesting and powerfully written recollections. One page of the "Mémoires," one single reminiscence culled from that vast storehouse of pathetic and dramatic memories, is of infinitely greater value as helpful towards obtaining a true insight into Berlioz' remarkable mental constitution than this so-called "Life." Mr. Dunstan has not even translated M. Bernard's memoir in its integrity. The omission of the portion of the prose translation of Romani's Ode to Paganini is justifiable on the ground of its irrelevancy, but there are other omissions that appear more singular. The translation of the memoir is inefficiently done when compared with that of the correspondence. On page 13 we find "féroce" rendered "firm," which gives but a faint idea of its signification, and the invariable attitude of Berlioz towards Gluck's compositions; and on page 42 there is a curious disagreement between the translation and the original. M. Bernard says in the copy we have before us: "... Meyerbeer, de sa voix flûtée et avec sa léger accent gascon." This is translated: "... Meyerbeer, in his harsh voice and with a slight German accent." Granting that M. Bernard was in error with respect to Meyerbeer's nationality, it would have been better if Mr. Dunstan had noted the existence of this discrepancy in a footnote.

It is strange that Mr. Dunstan's translation of the correspondence should be generally more satisfactory than his version of the biographical notice of M. Bernard, seeing that the former abounds in passages incomparably more defiant of adequate translation. The literary style of Berlioz possesses many of the qualities of his symphonies. There is not one of these letters wherein he has not left the impress of his vivid and singular personality; they offer abundant evidence of his excessive sensibility of imagination, and his truly passionate and sensuous sense of beauty; and in their rapid and facile change of emotional demonstration, their delicate nuances of humour and pathos, and stormy outbursts of enthusiastic adoration and denunciation, they not seldom powerfully suggest the poetical symphonies of the writer. An intense individuality of character is as obvious in these letters as it is in the critical writings and memoirs of Berlioz. As specimens of the art of letter-writing they are notable even in a literature so richly endowed in this particular as the French; some of them indeed realise the perfection of this art, and in so rare a degree that the sense of the presence of a fiery personality is so powerful on reading them, the stress of eloquent passion is felt with such compelling force, that the reader becomes a sharer in the ardour of the inspiration and intimately cognisant of its source. When literary fidelity is aimed at in translation, it is inevitable that a certain amount of the volatile spirit of the original should be lost or suffer transmutation. It is creditable to Mr. Dunstan's skill that so many of these letters retain much of their original force, and that they fairly reflect the astonishing mélange of wit, humour, and epigram of the correspondence. The literary charm of the original disappears in a great measure in the act of translation; the brilliant wit, the Voltairian banter and irony, the keener thrusts of controversy, and the satirical sketches of contemporaries, all necessarily suffer from taking a new form of expression. These letters cover the whole period of the career of Berlioz, and the turbulence and unceasing conflicts of his life are revealed to their depths. While it is impossible to withhold our sympathy from the spectacle of genius baited by a miserable and selfish crowd of mediocrities, it cannot be denied that it was in this very atmosphere of controversy and intrigue that the composer again and again renewed his existence. Detraction and opposition with him were stimulative to new and more vigorous production. His indomitable spirit imbibed fresh ardour from every new conflict; and whether in Germany, in Russia, or in England, his heart turned to Paris, to the city that had rejected him, with ever the old warmth and the joyous anticipation of battle. It will be seen in these letters how unfounded are many of the accusations directed against him, and how calumnious. The ebullitions of wrath, the Landorian violence of invective, and all the bitterness of irony and scorn, are in nearly every case the fruit of an indignation righteous in itself and honourable to the artist. If the fine wit and caustic speech were sometimes exercised with a refinement of cruelty and with something of the pleasure of self-conscious power, the attack was generally provoked and the castigation amply merited. His unvarying justice towards men who had injured him, or who had no spiritual sympathies with him, and his quickness to atone for injuries effected by rash and inadvertent speech, are well shown in many anecdotes and betray a warm heart beneath all contrary appearances, while his lasting loyalty to the great masters who were the source of his lifelong enthusiasm prove the depth and sincerity of his convictions. His artistic sincerity was indeed a rare honesty, and a noble characteristic of the man who was not to be cajoled into doing anything that might be interpreted as a compromise with a vicious public taste, and who guarded so jealously the honour of the great men he revered.

Musik-Lexikon, von Dr. Hugo Riemann.

[Leipzig: Verlag des Bibliographischen Instituts, 1882.]

IN our recent review of Dr. Reissmann's "Handlexikon der Tonkunst," it was our duty to point out certain shortcomings—the result, as we thought, chiefly of a hasty compilation and imperfect revision—which seriously interfered with the usefulness of the volume in question. It is the more gratifying, therefore, to meet so soon after with a work of very similar scope and dimensions, in which a most careful selection of well-balanced articles, combined with copious and generally accurate information, are the prominent features. Dr. Reissmann's "Handlexikon" being an abridgment from a much larger work, the fact may in a measure account for some of its incongruities and lesser general usefulness as compared with the present volume; it being notoriously more difficult to condense an existing elaborate work than to compile a fresh one upon a fixed and preconceived plan. Be that as it may, there can be no doubt that the volume at present under our notice fulfils the conditions which we may reasonably impose upon a book of general reference in musical matters far more satisfactorily than the similar work recently issued by Dr. Reissmann; the almost simultaneous publication of the two lexica of such identical pretensions naturally inviting a comparison which otherwise might have appeared irrelevant. Dr. Riemann's "Musik-Lexikon" forms one in an extensive scheme of handbooks treating separately of the different arts and sciences, and published by the enterprising firm at the head of this notice under the general title of "Meyer's Fach-Lexica." We have already indicated our sense of the able manner in which Dr. Riemann—well-known in Germany as a musical savant, and at present a professor at the Hamburg Conservatorium—has discharged his difficult task. In a style both lucid and concise the author contrives to convey, in some 1,000 pages, a truly surprising amount of reliable information concerning the science and history of our art, including biographical notices of musicians of all periods, to which, in most instances, are added careful references to the sources whence further and more detailed information may be derived. The latter is, indeed, not the least valuable feature of the book, and one which in so many of its predecessors has been almost entirely neglected. Neither does Dr. Riemann permit his personal predilection to influence unduly his estimate of the relative merit of the more modern composers, a fact which is the more creditable in a writer whose artistic bias inclines evidently towards the most advanced school of the art of the present day.

If we have to point out a few inaccuracies and omissions in the English section (with which we are here more especially concerned) of the present work, we do so less in a spirit of criticism than with a view to their being considered in a future edition, which cannot fail ere long to become necessary, judging from the general excellence of Dr. Riemann's compilation. Thus, among the names of English musicians which are altogether omitted, we may mention Dr. Stainer, Mr. Villiers Stanford, and Mr. W. Shakespeare. Mr. Harper, the trumpet-player, might likewise have found a place here as a virtuoso of rare attainments on a most difficult instrument. Dr. Sullivan is erroneously described as "the Director of the Royal Academy of Music," although, in another place, the name of Professor Macfarren is correctly given as the "Director, i.e., Principal," of that institution. Of Charles Dibdin a biographical account is rendered, making no mention, however, of his numerous "sea-songs," which will chiefly perpetuate his memory among English-speaking nations. Again, although the long-forgotten name of Gottfried (or Godfrey) Keller is given, his "Compleat Method of Attaining to Playing a Thorough-bass, &c.," is here said to have been published in 1807—an obvious misprint, as Keller was a teacher of the harpsichord in London in the beginning of the eighteenth century, although no mention is made of the fact in the notice in question. Keller, we may add, died about the year 1721, and his treatise, just referred to, was, according to Sir John Hawkins, the second of the kind ever published in England, Lock's "Melothesia" having been the first. A somewhat ludicrous lapsus calami has occurred to the author in ascribing the admirable English translation of Kreissle von Hellborn's "Life of Schubert," by Mr. A. Duke Coleridge, to an imaginary "Herzog von Coleridge" (Duke of Coleridge), a mistake which, however, in a foreign publication, is easily accounted for. We may also add that the author of the "Gesangschule," alluded to in the paragraph headed "Bernacchi di Bologna," is Mannstein, and not Mannstädt, as here stated. The above are some of the comparatively few inaccuracies or deficiencies which occur in the work before us, and none of which are of sufficient importance to call into question the unqualified praise which we have bestowed upon it. Dr. Riemann's "Musik-Lexikon" is, in fact, both for the variety and accuracy of its information, the most admirable work of its kind and compass which we have yet seen. It is, moreover, got up in very good style, and published at a price which brings it within the reach of all who are interested in the art of which it treats.

Euryanthe. A Romantic Opera, in Three Acts. By C. M. von Weber. Edited, and the Pianoforte Accompaniment revised, by Berthold Tours. The English Translation by William Thornthwaite.

ALTHOUGH it can scarcely be questioned that Weber was one of the greatest dramatic composers the world has seen, his operas are not presented to a London public as often as they deserve to be. Even "Der Freischütz" is rarely given; and when it is heard with Italian words, and an orchestral arrangement of the "Invitation to the Waltz" to accompany a ballet, we can hardly judge of its true value as a work of art. The presence of a German operatic company in the metropolis, however, inspires us with hope that the great lyrical compositions of Weber may be performed in their original shape at frequent intervals during the London season; and the publication of "Euryanthe" in Novello's Octavo Edition is indeed well-timed, for at the recent revival of the work at Drury Lane Theatre not only was the public enabled to study the Opera before going, but during the performance every earnest student could follow the music with a portable and thoroughly reliable handbook. We have already spoken of the excellence of Mr. Thornthwaite's translation on the occasion of the recital of the Opera at the concert of the Highbury Philharmonic Society, conducted by Dr. Bridge; and on a more attentive perusal can now affirm our assertion that it is not only well adapted from the original, but admirably sympathetic with the music throughout. Under the careful editorship of Mr. Berthold Tours this edition appears, as far as we can see, without an error; and "Euryanthe" may now, we trust, assert its real place in England as one of the finest works in the répertoire of the lyric stage.

Six Songs. Composed by Ann S. Mounsey Bartholomew.

1. Crabbed age and youth. Poetry by W. Shakespeare.
2. Fair and True. Poetry by Charles Mackay, LL.D.
3. Wedded Love. Poetry by Bishop Heber.
4. The Bells. Poetry by Edgar Allan Poe.
5. Parting. Poetry by Thomas Hood.
6. Queen Mab's Song. From the "Percy Relics."

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THESE Six Songs are a worthy contribution to the somewhat limited store of high-class vocal music by modern composers, for not only has Mrs. Bartholomew given an exquisite colouring to the words she has chosen, but the words are those which can only be fitly treated by a kindred artist. In No. 1 Shakespeare's verses are set with a truly sympathetic feeling to a quaint subject in A minor, the modulations in the course of the song growing up naturally with the text, and the accompaniment forming so integral a portion of the composition as to demand something more than the average "accompanist at the piano-forte." No. 2 has a charmingly fresh theme, with a flowing semiquaver accompaniment throughout; and No. 3 is an unpretentious song, the simplicity of which is thoroughly in consonance with the character of the poetry. There is much point in the accompaniment to No. 4, the subject of which unaffectedly expresses the well-known verses of Edgar Poe. It would be good if some of our recent song-writers could reach pathos by the simple means adopted by Mrs. Bartholomew in the beautiful song No. 5, one of the very best of Hood's minor poems. Apart from the excessive tenderness of both melody and accompaniment in this composition, the enharmonic change at page 27 has an intensity of feeling which can scarcely be described. No. 6, from the "Percy Relics," effectively terminates a series of songs standing so completely apart from our fashionable works of the day as to make us believe that they must command the attention of all real artists.

Lullaby. Song. Words by Hamilton Aidé.

Serenade. Song. Poetry by Shelley.

Music by A. Goring Thomas.

[Boosey and Co.]

THE composer of these songs always writes gracefully for the voice, and has already earned a sufficiently good name before the public to ensure attention. "Lullaby" has an appropriately placid melody, and is well accompanied throughout; but we much prefer the "Serenade," the refinement of the music charmingly sympathising with Shelley's words, which, like all that poet's love-songs, seem to breathe music in every line. A very good effect is gained by the triplets in the voice part against the chords in the accompaniment; but it would be well if the figure 3 were placed over every triplet, for assuredly as bar four, page four, stands, many vocalists would sing it incorrectly

Gorllfriad Cantre'r Gwaelod (The Inundation of Cantre'r Gwaelod). A Dramatic Cantata. The Welsh words by D. C. Harries; English words by L. W. Lewis, and edited by Henry Hersee. Music composed (for the Merthyr Tydvil National Eisteddfod of 1881) by W. Jarrett Roberts. [Carnarvon: W. Jarrett Roberts.]

THE composer of this Cantata (who was a student of the Royal Academy of Music) says, in his dedication to Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, that the work was written for the Eisteddfod at Merthyr Tydvil; and although two of the adjudicators pronounced it "well worthy of the prize," owing to some demur by the third judge, who was absent at the Eisteddfod, he has not yet received the award. We, however, who believe but little in the healthy effect of prizes for compositions to be produced at a public festival, counsel Mr. Roberts, when next he writes a Cantata for performance before an audience, to think only of his music and the art he aspires to serve. It is well for umpires to sit in judgment upon a school exercise, but they cramp the efforts of one who has emerged from the state of pupilage into the art-world, and whose "prentice hand" may now safely be released from the severe training to which it has necessarily been subjected. Mr. Roberts has chosen a theme well fitted for musical treatment. The scene of the Cantata, he says, "was a fertile plain extending from the present town of Cardigan, in South Wales, to Sarn Badrig (St. Patrick's Causeway) in the extreme north terminus of Merioneth." The inundation is attributed to the drunkenness of the keeper of the tide-gates; and we are told that several months before the catastrophe "a voice was heard over the Cantref warning the inhabitants to fly." The music bears throughout the stamp of earnest intention on the part of the composer, who is evidently more desirous of appropriately expressing the words than of displaying the profundity of his theoretical knowledge. In all the choruses—especially those descriptive of the inundation and its accompanying horrors—much dramatic feeling is shown, and the voice parts are written with an obvious appreciation of effect. Amongst the best of these may be mentioned "List! hark the ocean's wild roar," in C minor—with a tremolo accompaniment throughout—the chorus representing the precipitate retreat of the inhabitants, "Hie to the mountains"; the semi-chorus, "Death reigneth supreme in the depths of the sea"—a pathetic expression of grief simply harmonised—and the final "Alleluia!" The soprano solo, "Hail, thou queen of minstrelsy" with a harp accompaniment; the duet for soprano and baritone, "With God our help"; the tenor solos for Taliesin, the chief bard; the baritone solo, in A minor, "Oh my Father!" and the song, "How fair the beauteous night!" for contralto, although by no means exhausting the effective numbers for the principal vocalists, will we think prove the most popular in performance. Something more, perhaps, might have been made of the "keeper of the tide-gates," Seithenin, who has but one short and spirited drinking song, followed by a chorus; but as he is called "The Drunkard," it may have been thought that the less heard of him the better. We confess our inability to express an opinion on the merit of the Welsh words, but the English adaptation is on the whole extremely good. Assuming that the subject of this work does not appeal too exclusively to the inhabitants of the Principality, we may perhaps hear it at no distant date in London, when we shall be able more to appreciate its merits than is possible by the perusal of the vocal score.

Youth and Age. Six Tone-Pictures for the Pianoforte. By J. Baptiste Calkin. [Ashdown and Parry.]

THE six numbers of these Tone-Pictures are entitled "Coaxing," "Remonstrance," "Pleading" ("A Maiden's Love"), "Upbraiding," "Despondency," and "Reconciliation." That these half-dozen illustrative sketches tell a little story, although the story is an old one, there can be little doubt; but it must be remembered that, to sustain the interest during its recital, the performer and the listeners must be in accord with each other, and that this result cannot be obtained where the mind of the pianist does not accompany the fingers throughout. "Programme music" can but suggest the idea indicated by the title of the composition, and for the due enjoyment of these works, therefore, the titles should be in the hands of the audience during their performance. Apart from the excellent manner in which Mr. Calkin has musically realised the several domestic scenes in his "Youth and Age," there is very much artistic value in his pieces as abstract compositions. We particularly admire "Pleading," "Despondency," and "Reconciliation"; but, although all the numbers are published separately, we should recommend pianists to do the composer justice by procuring the whole book, as the performance of only two or three of the pieces would be like reading detached chapters from a novel, in proof of the merit of an entire work.

Gabriel Grub. Adapted from Charles Dickens's story in "Pickwick," by Frederic Wood. Music by George Fox. [B. Williams.]

MR. WOOD has turned Charles Dickens's tale into verse well adapted for musical setting. The composer is already known for his Cantatas "The Jackdaw of Rheims" and "John Gilpin"; and as the semi-humorous style of these works seems especially suited for the display of his talent, it may be presumed that Mr. Fox has been equally successful in the composition before us. Comic music, however, is exceedingly difficult to write; and although in many portions of the Cantata the spirit of the words has been fairly caught—especially in the choral parts—we meet with occasional feebleness, even where many composers would have displayed their greatest strength. Amongst the best pieces are the choruses "Then the sexton was in a most terrible fright," the chorus and recitatives "And they vaulted on tombstones," the tenor ballad, "The young wife's tears," and the short canzone for soprano, "A limpid brooklet." The instrumental introduction is weak; and as a rule the vocal effects are scarcely sufficiently relied upon, the pianoforte dancing off with a quadrille air (as in the bass recitative "Then our hero cried out") whilst the voice is merely speaking the words. A great merit in the Cantata, however, is that it is never dull; and although we have candidly stated our own convictions, it may happen that the very portions we have pointed out as wanting in true artistic power will, with a popular audience, be received with the highest demonstrations of approval. At all events "Gabriel Grub" would be an excellent work for amateurs desiring something light for drawing-room performance.

Les Sauterelles. Polka, par Delbrück.
Rêve à Madeleine. Paroles et Musique de Alfred Delbrück.

[Brighton: Lyon and Hall.]

THE publishers of these pieces seem to have caught the rage for fantastically illustrated title-pages, and fairly succeeded in making the names of the compositions almost illegible. Whether it is thought that a composer thus mysteriously introduced to the public is more likely to attract attention we cannot say; but, as his music is fairly good, it is possible that he may advance to plain title-pages as he becomes better known. The Polka is lively, and well suited for dancing; and the Song—published to French words—is melodious and unpretending, but with some harmonies which sound somewhat harsh. The E—last note in the bass, bar six, page two—we presume to be intended for D; but we cannot say that we like the succession of chords in the bar before this; and the doubled dominant seventh in the third bar of the same page (the lower one disappearing altogether) shows a want of the habit of clear writing, an additional proof of which is that the sharp is omitted before C, the leading-note, in this chord.

The Land o' Burns. Song. Poetry by Colin Raebrown. Music by W. G. Wood.

Love shall never die. Duet for Soprano and Baritone. Written and composed by Frank L. Moir.
[Marriott and Williams.]

THE first of these vocal pieces is dedicated "to all admirers of Robert Burns throughout the world." If the composer of the music could secure as wide a circle of admirers for his tribute to the genius of the poet, he certainly would rest contented. In truth, however, it must be said that the words are somewhat commonplace; and their setting will not materially enhance their value. Musically, however, we have no fault whatever to find with Mr. Wood's share in the song. The melody is at least well fitted to the verses, and the harmonies are unexceptionable throughout; but patriotic songs require to be extremely good, as may be proved by the fact of very few becoming popular. Mr. Moir's duet is well written, and melodious enough for performance before an ordinary drawing-room audience. There are one or two good points of imitation; and the bit of "quasi recitative" for soprano is effective.

Study for the Pianoforte. By W. H. Holmes.
[Lamborn Cock.]

MR. HOLMES has so much practical knowledge of his instrument that a well-considered Study, such as the one before us, should be warmly welcomed by earnest students of the pianoforte. To acquire a light touch, with sufficient strength of finger to make every note tell upon the ear of the listener, is by no means an easy matter; and, as this exercise is especially written with the object of cultivating these indispensable accomplishments, we commend it to the notice of those who devote their thoughts less to playing than to learning how to play. The Study is in B flat minor, and it may be accepted as a curious instance of the unsettled manner of noting passages founded on the chromatic scale when we find them here written in two ways—sometimes, for instance, E double flat, D flat, and sometimes D natural, C sharp. It may be possible, however, that the author wishes to prove to students that both methods are available.

Allegretto (All' Ongarese). For Violin, and Piano accompaniment. By W. Bauerkeller.
[Forsyth Brothers].

THE violin is rapidly becoming so favourite an instrument in the family circle that we are glad to see composers writing original pieces for drawing-room performance; and as the composition before us is dedicated to a lady, and the pianoforte part is something more than a mere accompaniment, two fairly good players are here provided with an effective little sketch, even when the domestic concert does not include any male executants. The principal subject is melodious, and the second portion, in the subdominant, has some well-written and effective violin passages, which form a good contrast with the opening theme. For amateurs the piece may be recommended with confidence; for, apart from its tunefulness (always a strong recommendation with the majority), it has decided character.

The Woodman. Song for a Bass Voice. Poetry by Edward Oxenford. Music by Stephen Stratton.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE are glad to find that the composer of this Song calls it "for a bass voice," and does not publish it in two or three keys, to suit the vocal register of every purchaser. It is an excellent composition, honestly written in the bass clef, and carefully laid out for the compass of the voice for which it is intended. The theme at the change of key—più lento—is extremely happy, and contrasts well with the bold subject which begins and ends the song. The accompaniment is good, and sympathetic with the words throughout.

Gavotte Brilliant, in the Modern Style. Composed by Heinrich Muller.
[Forsyth Brothers.]

WE have copied the title-page of this piece, but may mention that, although "Brilliant Gavotte" is English, "Gavotte Brilliant" is not French. The subject of the composition is extremely striking, and the writing by no means conventional. Especially do we like the second theme, in the subdominant; and, although the hands are perhaps somewhat too much together throughout the piece, the harmonies are unexceptionable. As an elegant little trifle for drawing-room performance this Gavotte may be conscientiously recommended.

FOREIGN NOTES.

At a recent meeting of the Berlin Wagner-Verein some important fragments from "Parsifal" were performed, under the direction of Professor Mannstädt, who presided at the pianoforte. The prelude, part of the first and the entire third act, were the extracts from the new work which obtained a first hearing on this occasion, under the co-operation of some eminent Berlin artists and a select chorus of about eighty voices. The meeting was a most enthusiastic one, the choruses especially creating a marked impression upon the crowded assembly.

A second edition of H. von Wolzogen's "Parsifal-Leitfaden" ("Guide to 'Parsifal'") has already become necessary, and is being issued by the publishers, Messrs. Senf, of Leipzig.

The entire series of Wagner's recognised music-dramas, from "Rienzi" to the "Nibelungen" tetralogy (inclusive), has just been performed at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, previous to the closing of the establishment for the summer vacation. The same may indeed be said to have taken place during our present London season on the part of different companies; but, as having been accomplished by a single theatre, not exclusively devoted to opera, the feat is certainly a remarkable one, and worthy of being recorded.

We have lately had an opportunity in this country of admiring the energy and enterprising spirit of Herr Angelo Neumann, but we doubt whether even he would be equal to the ubiquitous feat prospectively ascribed to him and his excellent company in various Continental journals. Thus one authority tells us that he will perform the "Nibelungen" tetralogy at Berlin, another at Prague, and a third in London—all these representations to take place in the first half of October next! Surely there must be some mistake in the dates.

It is stated in German journals that Richard Wagner is engaged upon a new music-drama, entitled "Der Sieger," the subject of which is founded upon Indian mythology.

Gluck's comic opera, "Der betrogene Kadi," was revived on May 31 at the Berlin Opera with great success, the work having been originally written for Berlin, and produced there in the year 1783, together with "Die Pilgrime von Mekka," by the same composer.

The Conservatorium at Stuttgart has just celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation. During this period over five thousand pupils have studied at the institution, of whom 590 were of English, 436 of American, 302 of Swiss, 95 of Russian, and the remainder of German nationality.

Dr. L. Nohl's recently published work, "Allgemeine Musikgeschichte" ("General History of Music"), will shortly appear in an English translation.

At the sale of autographs held at Leipzig last month (and referred to in these columns) the Mendelssohn manuscripts (fifteen numbers) were sold for 9,212 marks, of which 4,090 marks were realised for the original score of "St. Paul." Four autographs by Schubert, amongst them the Pianoforte Sonata No. 4, fetched the sum of 5,145 marks, and a Sketch-book by Beethoven 1,300 marks.

A meeting of German choral societies will take place next month at Hamburg, in which some nine thousand amateur vocalists have already promised to take part.

The following operas have been performed at the Paris Grand-Opéra during last month, viz.: "Françoise de Rimini" (Thomas), "Le Tribut de Zamora" and "Faust" (Gounod), "Les Huguenots" (Meyerbeer), "Hamlet" (Thomas), and "Freischütz" (Weber). At the Opéra-Comique a revival has taken place of Méhul's "Joseph" (scarcely a comic opera!) and of Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," both of which have drawn full houses. The Paris operatic season is, however, drawing to a close, and the doors of the Grand-Opéra will be closed about the middle of this month until next autumn.

M. Camille Saint-Saëns's new opera, "Henri VIII.," has been accepted by M. Vaucorbeil, the Director of the Paris Grand-Opéra, where it will be produced next season. A new operatic work by M. Léo Delibes, entitled "Lackmé," is likewise to be brought out during the coming season.

Gluck's "Orpheus" is to be remounted at the Paris Grand-Opéra, where the work has not been performed since 1859.

The long projected Opéra-Populaire in Paris is at last to become a reality, and will, it is said, be opened on October 1, under the direction of MM. Vianesi and Hartmann, who have rented the Théâtre des Nations for a period of three years. Massenet's opera "Hérodiade" is to be the opening performance.

The annual Prix de Rome of Paris has been awarded this year to M. E. Guinand for his cantata entitled "Edith."

Richard Wagner has written a letter to M. Lamoureux, the Paris conductor—at whose concerts entire acts of "Lohengrin" have lately been produced with a French version—of which the following is an extract: "So far from sympathising with the projected performances of 'Lohengrin,' it is my express wish that they should not take place, and for the following reasons. In the first place 'Lohengrin,' having already made the round of the civilised world, stands in no need of a Paris representation. But, moreover, it is simply impossible to translate it into the French language in such a way as to convey to the public an idea of the action; and concerning a representation in German, it is my opinion that the Parisians will not readily listen to it. So long as fragments only of my operas were produced at your concerts I have offered no objection to it. Now that fragments have been succeeded by entire acts, I cannot conceal from you, my dear sir, that I look upon this as undesirable. . . . My works are, above all, German, and I confidently believe that your countrymen will prefer to become acquainted with them in the original. You will oblige me by giving publicity to these lines, as I am anxious that my position in reference to the 'Lohengrin' question should clearly be understood in Paris." The poet-composer has, we believe, prevailed upon Herr Angelo Neumann to desist from his projected performance of "Lohengrin" in the French capital.

M. Pasdeloup and his orchestra will give a series of Concerts this summer at Bordeaux during the Exhibition.

The Belgian National Music Festival, which is alternately held at Brussels, Antwerp, Ghent, and Liège, will take place this year at the first-named town, where it will commence on the 20th of next month. The following works will be included in the programme of the performances, viz.: "Deutsches Requiem" (Brahms), "Alexander's Feast" (Handel), "Ode to Beauty" (P. Benoit), "Le Retour" (Samuel), "Festival Overture" (Radoux), &c. The orchestra will consist of 110 instrumentalists, and the chorus of the united Belgian societies will form a body of some 400 amateur vocalists. Herr Brahms will be present to conduct his Requiem, and there is reason to believe that this year's Festival will prove an unusually interesting one.

At a recent extensive sale of musical instruments held at Bruxelles, a "clavecin" was placed under the hammer, which had been in turn the property of Gluck, Rousseau, Grétry, and Nicolo Isouard. The interesting instrument was manufactured in 1769 by Johannes Stumpe, of London.

At the Theatre Alfieri, of Turin, performances of opera have recently taken place under the direction of Signor Forcillo, that of "Fra Diavolo," with Signora Elena Rosa as the prima donna, having been especially successful. At the Vittorio Emanuele Theatre, Suppé's operetta of "Boccaccio" has proved a great attraction. The last of this season's concerts of the Stefano Tempia Society took place on the 25th ult.

A new opera by Pietro Floridia, entitled "Carlotta Cleprier," has been received with much favour at the Teatro del Circo of Naples.

The proprietors of the Archivio Musicale, of Naples, are offering a prize of 100 lire for a pianoforte composition in memory of Garibaldi, to be superscribed "Il Due Giugno," and to be competed for by Italian composers, irrespective of their place of residence.

Signor Bottesini, the celebrated contrabassist, having some time since obtained the first prize for the composition of a Requiem, at Milan, the work was about to be rehearsed for a public performance when it was discovered that the score had mysteriously disappeared, and has, in fact, not yet been found. The unfortunate composer has thus been obliged to set to work again upon a new score from his previous sketches.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" is to be produced, with an Italian version, in October next, at the theatre of Bologna.

Wagner's "Lohengrin," which was but coolly received last year in the Spanish capital, has just achieved a decided success at Barcelona.

Herr Carl Formes, the bass singer, who in consequence of failing voice had been obliged to retire from the stage and has since resided at San Francisco as a teacher of harp, has just successfully reappeared in the theatre of that town as Leporello in "Don Giovanni."

Herr Max Bruch has accepted the conductorship of the New York "Liederkrantz."

At Venice died, on May 26, Maestro Fortunato Maggion, artistic director and professor of harmony at the Lice Benedetto Marcello.

The death is also announced at Florence of Vincenz Taruffi, a professor at the Instituto Musicale of that town.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TONIC SOL-FA AND STAFF NOTATION SYSTEMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I tender my apology to Mr. Thomson for the incorrect statement I made in your May issue concerning the results of his teaching at Westminster Training College, and sincerely hope I was in error with regard to Mr. McNaught's. I cannot but feel, however, that the remarks made by Mr. Hullah in his "Report on Musical Instruction in Elementary Schools on the Continent" fully justified my conclusions, the expression of which was certainly misleading. The following table, showing the marks gained for sight-singing at the four largest London Training Colleges in the years 1878, 1879, 1880, should be almost sufficient to shake Mr. Thomson's confidence in the excellence of his method, and render unnecessary any efforts of my own:—

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

COLLEGE.	AVERAGE FOR			AVERAGE FOR THREE YEARS.
	1878	1879	1880
Battersea ... ..	30	27	26	27.5
Borough Road ... ..	28	28	31	29
Chelsea ... ..	29	27	25	27
Westminster ... ..	27	26	26	26.3

For various reasons it is unfair to compare the results generally gained at provincial with those at the four largest London Training Colleges; the above are those with which Mr. Thomson should compare results, and by means of which he can estimate the value of his method. But I do not quarrel with Sol-faists because they fail to agree with me as to the best means of approaching the staff, but because they so long, so needlessly, and often entirely defer its use. They put forward their letters as an introduction to the staff, and as such only are they accepted by their most ardent professional supporters, Messrs. Stainer, Taylor, and Prout. Messrs. S. Curwen and J. Evans have conclusively shown that the application of their Sol-fa teaching to the staff is so remarkably easy; and there cannot be the slightest reason for any opposition to the adoption of some such course as that suggested by Mr. Sedley Taylor—that no teacher in an elementary school should be allowed to confine his teaching to Sol-fa. Very recently Mr. S. Curwen visited a school in the east of London where the boys were Sol-faists, but knew nothing whatever of the staff. With five minutes' instruction they were able to sing at sight from the cumbersome staff, a power Sol-faists have for forty years asserted they could not acquire during their entire school life. Such results would appear to indicate that there is no sufficient reason for the total exclusion of the staff from our London Board Schools.

It is a fact that the letter notation is supplanting the staff in the great majority of elementary schools, that in the course of a couple of years nine-tenths of our English children will be receiving instruction in sight-singing, and that where one will be taught the staff, it is probably no exaggeration to say three will be confined to the letters; further, the Government recognises the Chev   on equal terms with the Sol-fa and staff notations. I ask: Would the Government countenance a method of teaching spelling or reading, professedly the most scientific and interesting, the result of which was that a boy having passed through six standards, that is, six years of active school-life, should be unable to read or write a single word of the English language? Such a result would be a total failure; the boy should have been put in communication with his distant friends, his business associates, the literature and science of the day. Why then the acceptance of an introductory musical notation which entirely fails to put its readers in direct communication with musical authors of the world, and this for the want of a single lesson of five minutes?

I would not have dared to trespass at this length on your space, were it not for the immense importance of this question to musical England.—I am, sir, faithfully yours,

FRED. W. WAREHAM.

South Norwood, June 16, 1882.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

*.* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

W. WILSON.—Apply to the Secretary of Trinity College, London.

EXCELSIOR.—Hidden fifths are produced when one part skips to a fifth from any interval but a fifth. The bad effect may be made more apparent by filling up the interval with the notes of the scale.

HILDA LEA.—We have made inquiries, and find that every information upon the subject will be furnished to all the Local Centres in a few days.

HUDDERSFIELD.—The D written on the fourth line of the staff, with the treble clef, if sung by a tenor or baritone, would sound an octave below. The question of pitch in vocal music would never arise were the proper voice clefs in general use.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABINGDON.—On Thursday, the 9th ult., a Meeting of the Church Choirs of Abingdon and its neighbourhood took place in St. Helen's Parish Church, when 250 voices took part. It is many years since a gathering of choirs was held in this church, but the success upon the present occasion justifies the hope that the Festival may become an annual institution. A great part of this success is perhaps due to the fact that the demands of the Service Book did not overtax the capabilities of the village choirs. No anthem was attempted, but Goss's arrangement of the hymn "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven" proved a good substitute. Mr. Fred. K. Coudrey acted as Choirmaster, and Mr. H. R. Coudrey, of Windsor, presided at the organ. The preacher was the Hon. and Rev. M. Ponsonby, Vicar of New Swindon.

ADDISCOMBE.—A Sacred Concert was held at Christ Church on Tuesday, the 20th ult., when an excellent programme of instrumental and vocal music was given by the Organist and choir, assisted by solo vocalists. The most important item was Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, the incidental solos being sung with much refinement by Miss Frisch. Miss Jeanie Rosse gave a good rendering of "O rest in the Lord." Other vocal pieces were contributed by Miss New, Miss Comly, Mr. Greenwood, and Mr. Izant. The choir sang with accuracy and precision a selection of choruses from the standard oratorios. Among the special features of the Concert was Mr. H. L. Balfour's organ-playing. Mr. Larkin (the Choirmaster of the church) conducted. After the Concert an offertory was taken on behalf of the Building Fund, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus brought a successful Concert to a conclusion.

BEDFORD.—On Tuesday evening, May 23, the members of the Musical Society gave the second Concert of their sixteenth season in the Corn Exchange. One of the chief items in the programme was Beethoven's Symphony in D major, which, considering that the performers were nearly all amateurs, was played in a highly creditable manner. Gade's Erk King's Daughter was exceedingly well rendered. The principal vocalists were Miss Lila Farrar, Miss Eliza Thomas, and Mr. James Sauvage. Mr. P. H. Diemer conducted.

BRECON.—The Philharmonic Society gave its first annual Subscription Concert for this season on May 31, before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Miss Hilda Wilson, R.A.M., Mr. Fredericks, R.A.M., and Mr. Clark. The principal works in the first part were Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer and Spohr's God, Thou art Great. The second part was miscellaneous. Conductor, Mr. Stepany Rawson; accompanists, Miss L. Buck and Mr. R. T. Heins. The Concert was a great success.

BRISTOL.—The members of the People's Concert Society gave their last Concert of the season in the Colston Hall, on Wednesday, May 24. The work selected was Judas Maccabaeus. The solo vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Madame Rosa Bailey, Mr. Videon Harding and Signor Monteco. Mr. F. Watts led the band, Mr. A. Morris Edwards presided at the American organ, and Mr. Whitaker conducted. In the interval between the parts Mr. Bird, on behalf of the choir, presented Mr. Whitaker with a handsome English lever watch, with an inscription recording that it was a slight token of esteem and respect towards him as Conductor and promoter of the Society. Mr. Whitaker, who was quite taken by surprise, briefly returned thanks.

CANTERBURY.—On Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., the Philharmonic Society gave a successful performance of Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria and Spohr's Last Judgment. The soloists were the Misses Robertson, Mr. J. G. Robertson, and Mr. R. Rhodes. The band and chorus were highly efficient, and Dr. Longhurst conducted with judgment.

CHELMSFORD.—The fourth annual Festival of the Association for the Improvement of Church Music was held in St. Mary's Church on the 15th ult. Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted, and Mr. F. R. Fry, F.C.O., accompanied the choirs on the organ, being assisted during the service by members of the Grenadier and Queen's Guards Bands. Before the service Mr. Fry played an excellent selection of organ pieces. The vocal music was admirably rendered.

DUBLIN.—The Royal Irish Academy of Music gave the annual Pupils' Concert on the 12th ult. The Overture to Don Giovanni was performed by full orchestra, and the programme included a Gavotte for six violins by Bach, a clarinet trio, and pianoforte solos, amongst which Miss Kellett's able performance of the G minor Fugue and Miss Hogg's rendering of Kullak's "Etude des Arp  ges" deserve notice. In the vocal department, the duet "Giorno d'orore" (Semiramide) was very well sung.—Signor Esposito gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Royal Irish Academy on the 13th ult., playing from memory five compositions of his own, a Nocturne and Polonaise in A flat by Chopin, Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, and compositions by Rameau and Schumann. Signor Esposito's performance proved him to be an able executant.

The third Concert of the Dublin Musical Society took place on the 15th ult. The programme included the chorus "Happy and blest," from St. Paul; an unaccompanied chorus, "The deep repose of ocean"; Spohr's God, Thou art Great; Schumann's Mignon's Requiem; the "Chorus of Angels," from Mrs. J. Robinson's Cantata God is Love; and Beethoven's Mass in C. The choruses were faultlessly rendered by the choir of three hundred voices, ably assisted by full orchestra and organ. Mr. Robinson conducted.—The St. Patrick's Cathedral Oratorio Society have performed the following works during the season: Haydn's Creation, Meyerbeer's 91st Psalm, Spohr's Calvary, Gounod's "By Babylon's wave," and Costa's Eli.

DURHAM.—The twenty-first Private Concert of the Musical Society was given on May 23, before a large audience. The first part was devoted to a performance of Mr. Henry Gadsby's Cantata The Lord of the Isles, the solo vocalists being Miss Sweeting, Mrs. Whatford, Mr. Mutton, Mr. Welch, the Rev. Thomas Rogers, and Mr. Goodhead. The second part was miscellaneous. The Cantata and the whole of the music in the second part elicited warm and well-deserved applause, much of the success of the Concert being owing to the indefatigable labours of the Conductor, Mr. T. A. Alderson, of Newcastle.

EASTBOURNE.—The first of four Subscription Concerts, arranged by Mr. Julian Adams for the present season, was given in the Floral Hall on Thursday, the 18th ult. The artists were Mdlle. Clarice Zisch and Madame Antoinette Sterling, vocalists; and Miss Adelina Dinelli, violinist. The programme was excellently selected, and included Mendelssohn's A minor Symphony (No. 3) and Gounod's "Wedding March," composed for the marriage of H.R.H. the Duke of Albany. Mr. Adams conducted.

EXETER.—The members of the Oratorio Society gave a performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea, and Weber's Jubilee Cantata The Praise of Jehovah, in the Victoria Hall, on Tuesday, the 6th ult. The solo vocalists were Madame Edith Wynne, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Mr. F. Meredith, and Mr. F. Dison. The orchestra was led by Mr. Barre Bayly; and Mr. G. W. Lyon conducted.

FRAMLINGHAM.—On Wednesday evening, May 31, the members of the Harmonic Society gave their first evening Concert in the Castle Hall, when Mozart's Twelfth Mass was performed. The choruses were sung with good effect, and the solos well rendered by the Misses Fanshawe, Tate, Seager, H. Cone, Attwood, Walker, Mrs. Massey, and Messrs. Chille, Tuskip, Dyer, Bullen, and G. Hall. The instrumental part was undertaken by the Misses Walker, Wright, and Taylor; Messrs. T. W. Wright, C. A. Wright, F. W. B. Noverre, and the Rev. T. S. Shaw. Mr. T. J. Wright conducted.

GALWAY.—An amateur Concert in aid of the Salthill Industrial School was given in Black's Assembly Rooms on Wednesday, May 31. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered, a feature of the evening being the excellent performance of some instrumental items by the string band of the Artane Industrial School, under the leadership of Mr. Burke. Mr. R. J. Lamb conducted.

GLASTONBURY.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave their fifteenth open Meeting in the Assembly Rooms on Thursday, May 25, when Handel's Judas Maccabaeus was performed before a large and appreciative audience. The choruses were sung with great firmness and precision, and the solos were well rendered by the Misses Murray, Bishop, and Norman (members of the Society), Miss Probert (of Bristol), Mr. Taylor (of Wells Cathedral), Mr. Hunt (of Ryde) and Mr. Drayton. Besides the harmonium and piano, there was a small band, which rendered efficient service. Mr. Hemsley (of Wells Cathedral) conducted with his usual ability.

GREAT GRIMSBY.—A successful Organ Recital was given in St. Andrew's Church on Tuesday, May 23, by Mr. J. E. Ward, the programme including selections from the works of Rossini, Schubert, Weber, Handel, &c.

HANWELL.—The members of the Musical Society closed their season with a Concert in the National Schoolroom on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, and the second was devoted to Rimbault's Cantata Country Life, which was well rendered. A violin solo was contributed by Mr. Gunn, and a pianoforte solo by Mr. Physick, who also accompanied on the pianoforte. Mr. Turner presided at the harmonium, and Mr. W. Hopkins conducted.

HARTLEY WHITNEY.—An excellent Concert was given by the Society of Amateur Musicians on Thursday, May 25. The first part of the programme consisted of Abt's Cantata The Water Fairies and a miscellaneous selection; and Sterndale Bennett's May Queen formed the second part. The solos were admirably rendered by local amateurs, and the accompaniments were played on the pianoforte by Mrs. Oldfield, and on an American organ by Mr. Arthur W. Smith. Mr. J. S. Tolley conducted. On the 6th ult. the Choral Festival took place, when ten choirs attended, numbering 200 voices. The Rev. H. Everitt intoned the service, in which the Rev. J. Keate took part. Sir George Elvey presided at the organ, and Mr. J. S. Tolley conducted. The Service was Goss in A, and the Anthem "Praise the Lord" (Sir G. Elvey).

HERNE.—The Whitsuntide Services at the ancient Parish Church of St. Martin were, as usual, of a special character, and attracted very large congregations. The Morning Service was Dykes in F, the Anthem "Come, Holy Ghost" (Attwood), and the Communion Service Helmore. The Evening Service was Ridsdale in F, and the Anthem "Holy, holy" (Handel). The solos were sung by Mr. H. Scott, and the accompaniments, &c., played by Mr. Fawcett, the Organist, assisted by an excellent orchestra, under the direction of Mr. E. Norwood, of Margate.

HOLYBOURNE.—The members of the Choral Society gave their second Concert on Tuesday, May 23, in the Free School. The principal work was Dr. Gladstone's Cantata Nicodemus, which was well rendered throughout. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Andrews and Mr. S. Mussell. Miss Pechell presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. C. Cobb at the harmonium. Mr. J. Goose conducted. The second part was miscellaneous.

IPSWICH.—On Thursday, the 8th ult., Special Services were held at St. Matthew's Church, when the new organ built by Messrs. Foster and Andrews, of Hull, was opened by Dr. F. E. Gladstone. The instrument contains three manuals: great organ, compass CC to G in alt., 56 notes, 7 stops; swell organ, compass CC to G in alt., 56 notes, 9 stops; choir organ, compass CC to G in alt., 56 notes, 5 stops; pedal organ, compass CCC to F, 30 notes, 2 stops; in all 28 stops and about 1,400 pipes. The stops are arranged on a spayed reveal, making them easy of manipulation. At the afternoon Service the Psalms were sung to Barnby in D and Russell in G; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to a Service in F composed for the occasion by the Organist of the Church, Mr. T. Palmer, Mus. Bac. The Anthem was Beethoven's "Hallelujah to the Father." After the service a Recital was given by Dr. Gladstone.

KNIGHTON.—The annual Festival of choirs in the Knighton district, in connection with the South Shropshire Choral Union, was held in the Parish Church of St. Edward, on Tuesday, the 20th ult. The combined choirs, numbering about seventy voices, were conducted by the Rev. W. Rayson, Choirmaster of the Union. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis had been composed for this year's Festival by Mr. Langdon Colborne, Organist of Hereford Cathedral. The Anthem was Calkin's "I will always give thanks." The preacher was the Rev. Sir Fredk. Ouseley, Bart., Mus. Doc. The whole of the service was very efficiently rendered, and reflected much credit on all concerned. Miss Woodward presided at the organ with her usual ability.

LAUNCESTON.—The eleventh annual Festival Service of the District Association of Church Choirs was held in the Parish Church on Tuesday, the 6th ult. The service was as follows: Processional Hymn; Festal Responses, Tallis; Special Psalms, 100, 122, 134, 135, to single Anglican Chants, by Dr. Steggall and Dr. E. G. Monk; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Clarke-Whitfield in E; Anthem, "Praise ye the Lord for His goodness," by Dr. G. Garrett. Seventeen choirs, comprising 300 voices, took part in the service, which was exceedingly well rendered throughout. The union passages were very striking. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the various choirtrainers, who laboured so assiduously, under the direction of the Organist and Choirmaster (Mr. Dalby), to bring the choirs to such proficiency, and the success which rewarded them was well deserved.

MELBOURNE (AUSTRALIA).—A Testimonial Benefit was given to Herr August Wilhelmj, in the Town Hall, on May 6, when, in addition to the excellent solos of this eminent violinist, several part-songs were finely rendered by the Metropolitan Liedertafel and the Melbourne Liedertafel—trained male-voice choirs which have been for some years in existence. The vocalists were Madame Gabriella Boema and Miss Marie Conron. There was a good orchestra, conducted by Mr. Max Vogrich and Signor Steffani.

NORWICH.—A morning Concert was given in St. Andrew's Hall on Thursday, the 1st ult., in aid of the Jenny Lind Infirmary, under the direction of Sir Julius Benedict. There was a full orchestra and chorus from the English Opera Company performing at the Theatre Royal, with the Norfolk and Norwich Festival Choir. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from Benedict's St. Peter and Rossini's Stabat Mater, and the second part was miscellaneous. The solo vocalists were Madame Blanche Cole, Madame Alice Barth, Miss Lucy Franklin, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Mr. Walter Clifford, and Mr. Aynsley Cook. Sir Julius Benedict conducted, assisted by Mr. Julian Edwards and Dr. Horace Hill.

PETERBOROUGH.—On the 21st ult. two Oratorio Services took place in the Cathedral. At the first Haydn's Creation was sung, and at the second selections from The Messiah, Elijah, and other oratorios were given. The solos were taken by Madame Marie Roze, Miss Mary Davies, Mrs. John Wilkinson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Lucas Williams; and the Cathedral Choir was strengthened by members of the Choir of Ely, the Peterborough Choral Society, the Leicester Choral Society, and others. The orchestra numbered about sixty. The Rev. W. Farley Wilkinson conducted, and Dr. Keeton presided at the organ. The congregations were large, and the services very successful. The proceeds, after paying expenses, will be devoted to the Royal College of Music.

PLYMOUTH.—A Concert was given in the Guildhall on the 3rd ult. by the members of Mr. Weekes's Choral and Orchestral Societies, assisted by a few professional artists. The playing of Madame Norman-Néruda was the great feature of the evening. The solo vocalists were Miss Triplett, Miss Jessie Croft, and Mrs. S. Trelawny. Miss Bulteel accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. F. Weekes and Mr. Weekes joined Madame Néruda in Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor. Mr. S. Weekes, Mus. Bac., conducted.

ROTHERHAM.—An Organ Recital was given on Thursday evening, the 8th ult., in St. Stephen's Church, Eastwood, by Mr. H. T. Lewis, the recently appointed Organist and Choirmaster of the church. The programme, which was excellently rendered, included selections from the works of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Merkel, Gounod, &c. There was a large attendance, and the Recital was much enjoyed. At the close an offertory was taken, when a considerable sum was contributed.

RUGBY.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Bennett's Cantata The May Queen at the Town Hall on Thursday, May 25. The solos were well sung by Miss Edith Phillips, Mr. George Cox, and Mr. Beckley. The choruses, on the whole, were well given, and the band, augmented by professional assistance from Birmingham, was very complete. Mr. E. Edwards, F.C.O., conducted and Mr. Petterson led the band.

ST. AUSTELL.—On Trinity Sunday, the 4th ult., the Feast of the Dedication of the Church was observed by special choral services. The Anthem at Evensong was Dr. Stainer's "I am Alpha and Omega," the solos being taken by Master Bramble and Mr. Jacob. At the conclusion of the service Mr. C. E. Juleff, the Organist and Choir Director, gave Handel's "Hallelujah" on the fine organ recently erected by Messrs. Bryceson Bros., London. On the 20th ult. the St. Austell Deanery Choir Association held their annual Festival in Holy Trinity Church, the building being crowded. The choirs numbered about 200 voices. Service commenced at 6.45 p.m. with Processional Hymn. The Magnificat, Nunc dimittis, anthem, and hymns were carefully rendered, and the psalms steadily sung, the decani and cantoris being well balanced. The Rev. C. Sowell acted as Precentor, and Mr. C. E. Juleff Director of the Choirs. At the dismissal the National Anthem was given, followed by Gounod's "Marche Militaire," well played upon the organ.

SALISBURY.—The members of the Vocal Union held a meeting on May 31 for the purpose of presenting the Conductor, Mr. John M. Hayden, with a silver mounted bâton and a handsome black marble clock with gold and bronze ornaments, surmounted by a figure representing St. Cecilia, both presents bearing suitable inscriptions. Mr. Harwood, the senior member, presented the testimonial in the name of the Society, and his expressions of esteem for the recipient were repeated by Messrs. Moore, Gilbert, and Mabbett. Mr. Hayden, who appeared taken by surprise, briefly replied. The sacred Cantata Ruth, by A. R. Gaul, is to be performed at the Society's next Concert.

SHEFFIELD.—The fine new Organ just erected in Emmanuel Church, by Mr. G. F. Heald, was formally opened on Tuesday, the 6th ult., by Mr. J. W. Phillips, who gave a Recital, displaying the instrument to its fullest advantage. On the following evening another Recital was given by Mr. G. Wilkin, the Organist of the church.

TWICKENHAM.—A very good performance of The Messiah was given in the Town Hall on the 1st ult. The soloists were Miss Patti Winter, Miss Harriet Kendall, R.A.M., Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Cross. Mr. Kenningham gave with much artistic finish "Comfort ye" and "But Thou didst not leave." "He shall feed His flock" was excellently rendered by Miss Kendall, and enthusiastically encored. The choruses were given with great precision, especially "All we like sheep" and "He trusted in God."

WALSALL.—Mr. J. C. Clarke gave an Organ Recital in St. George's Church on Thursday evening, the 15th ult., when there was a large congregation. The Recital was preceded by a short service, which included a new setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by Mr. Clarke. The choir sang several anthems excellently. Mr. Bingley Shaw, of Southwell Minster, was the principal vocalist, and rendered several solos with good effect. A collection was afterwards made on behalf of the Organ Fund.

WALTHAMSTOW.—The Musical Society closed its season on the 7th ult. by a very successful Concert at the National Schoolroom. Mr. J. F. H. Read, the Conductor, produced his new Cantata, Caractacus, which was received with great enthusiasm. There was a band of about twenty-five performers, and a chorus of over one hundred voices. The wind parts were played on the harmonium. Amongst the principals were Messrs. Buziau, Van Praag, Schneider, and Miss Nunn (violins), M. Rudersdorff (violinello), Mr. A. White (double-bass), Miss Arnold (harp), and Mr. H. R. Bird (harmonium). The vocalists were Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. H. Jones, Mr. J. Henry, and Mr. R. H. Cummings. There was a miscellaneous selection after the Cantata, in which Miss Read played Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor with great brilliancy and finish. Solos were also contributed by the other artists.

WARRINGTON.—On Sunday, the 18th ult., a performance of Mozart's Mass No. 2, with full band and chorus, was given in St. Alban's Catholic Church, in aid of the schools of the mission. The work was very finely rendered, and great credit is due to the director of the choir, Mr. P. Caldwell. The leader of the band was Herr Praeger. Mr. Caldwell, junior, presided at the organ, and the principal vocalists were Miss Cavanagh, Mrs. Whitehead, Messrs. F. J. Dell and C. Cotterill. Mr. E. Whitehead conducted. Over £20 was given to the schools of the church. The band parts were transcribed from an old German score, published in the time of Mozart.

WIMBLEDON.—Mr. Sumner gave his annual Concert on the 7th ult., at the Drill Hall. The programme comprised the 84th Psalm (Spöhr), the 42nd Psalm (Mendelssohn), the Presto from Mendelssohn's Concerto No. 1, in G minor (the pianoforte part excellently played by Miss Mason), and Haydn's "Spring." The choruses were well rendered, and Miss Maynard (soprano) was much applauded for her singing throughout the Concert. Mr. Sumner conducted.

WITHAM.—The sixth Concert by the Choral Class was given in the Public Hall on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult. The first part consisted of Haydn's "Spring" and "The heavens are telling," the soloists being Miss Helen Stark, R.A.M., Mr. F. Brown, and Rev. J. T. Halland. The second part was miscellaneous, and comprised songs by the Choral Class, violin solos by Miss Nora Geache, a duet for harmonium and pianoforte by Miss Morrell and Miss Laurie, and vocal pieces by Mr. Halland and Miss Stark. The Concert (under the able conductorship of Mr. Bowles) was highly successful, one of the features of the evening being the singing of Miss Stark, who received several encores.

The music selected for performance was simple, consisting of hymns and psalm-tunes, the former including Dr. Wesley's well-known tune, "Alleluia! sing to Jesus," and an effective composition by Miss Havergal. ## New Edition of Bach's Organ Works. THE ORGAN WORKS OF JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH

EDITED BY

J. F. BRIDGE AND JAMES HIGGS,
Mus. Doc., Oxon. Mus. Bac., Oxon.

BOOK I.—EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES.
PRICE 2s. 6d.

In this edition much help is offered toward a correct and effective rendering of Bach's Organ Music. The distribution of the parts between the two hands is clearly shown. The notes most conveniently played by the right hand are printed on the upper, and those best taken by the left hand on the lower, of the two manual staves. The pedalling is indicated where necessary. Marks of expression and phrasing are added occasionally, and suggestions for the effective use of the organ are given throughout. The preface contains many useful hints.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of
LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them. Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,
English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON's Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

J. & J. HOPKINSON

Invite attention to the following Testimonials:—

I have had occasion to test HOPKINSON'S Pianos in London and in Paris, and I am bound to declare that with regard to power, evenness of tone, and equality of touch, I have found them of rare excellence.

They are Instruments that all Pianists ought to appreciate, for they allow them to give expression to their feelings, and to play with the most delicate nuances.

PARIS, July 23, 1878. (Signed) CH. GOUNOD.

I have played at the Paris Exhibition on Messrs. HOPKINSON'S Pianos, and I say with pleasure that the quality of sound has completely satisfied me, as well as the elasticity of touch, which leaves nothing to be desired.

(Signed) ANTOINE DE KONTSKI.

July 30, 1878.

I have had the opportunity of trying the excellent Pianos of Messrs. HOPKINSON, whose instruments have the qualities I esteem in a Piano; "they have a soul," which permits the performer to communicate the poetic feeling in his heart, and in the spirit necessary to forget himself in his performances.

(Signed) D. MAGNUS.

PARIS, July 30, 1878.

The Grand Pianos of HOPKINSON, London, are very remarkable. They are equal to those of the best Houses already known. All the qualities which can be demanded by an experienced virtuoso—vigour of attack, openness of sound, possibility to give the necessary shade to the music, and to produce effects of extreme delicacy—are found in HOPKINSON'S Pianofortes. They possess also a sonority of a crystalline nature, which gives them a certain charm, and characterises their own personality.

(Signed) NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,

PARIS, August 3, 1878.

I state with pleasure that the Grand Pianos of Messrs. J. and J. HOPKINSON of London, which I have had the opportunity of hearing and of trying myself, are remarkable for their fabrication, and that they rival those of the best Houses of Paris and London for their wonderful power and elasticity of touch.

I should wish no other for my personal use, and to accompany me in my concerts.

(Signed) CH. NILSSON.

In this edition much help is offered toward a correct and effective rendering of Bach's Organ Music. The distribution of the parts between the two hands is clearly shown. The notes most conveniently played by the right hand are printed on the upper, and those best taken by the left hand on the lower, of the two manual staves. The pedalling is indicated where necessary. Marks of expression and phrasing are added occasionally, and suggestions for the effective use of the organ are given throughout. The preface contains many useful hints.

FROM "THE TIMES," JULY 19.

"In speaking of a work of Gounod, it is scarcely necessary to add that there is abundance of beautiful melody, that the orchestra is treated in a masterly manner, and that the harmonic effects are often new and striking, the accompaniment of one recitative showing, for example, an all but unbroken sequence of augmented fifths. Altogether, there is every reason to think that Gounod's new work will be among his most successful efforts. It contains all the elements of popularity, and not a few of the higher artistic qualities which appeal to the cultured musician rather than to the masses."

FROM "THE DAILY TELEGRAPH," JULY 19.

"With regard to the music, we can now only testify to its serious spirit and lofty purpose. Whether M. Gounod has been equal to or fallen short of the stupendous theme is a matter for future consideration, but that he approached it and handled it in the true spirit of an artist does not admit a moment's doubt. The music makes no concessions to anything or anybody, but with laudable strictness addresses itself to the subject and leaves the rest to fate. This is the course that often ensures success, and always deserves it. At present, a knowledge that it is M. Gounod's course will intensify the respect and sympathy with which our musical public are prepared to receive that which he has called 'Opus vitæ meæ.'"

JAMES TURLE.

ON June 28 the organist's seat at Westminster Abbey became vacant for the first time in more than half a century. Full of years, and attended not only by the love of his personal friends, but by the respect of all acquainted with his character and reputation, James Turlé passed away, and the place that knew him so long now knows him no more. It becomes our duty to pass in review his life and work. Doing this, we have to recount no dazzling achievements—to follow no course marked out by the fire of heroic deeds such as draw the attention of a world. We cannot, it is true, apply Milton's words to the late organist of Westminster Abbey, "They also serve who only stand and wait." James Turlé did more than stand and wait. He was a worker, but one of such invincible modesty that his contemporaries beyond his own immediate circle knew but little either of what he did or of what he was capable. A less self-assertive man, having regard to his distinguished place among Church musicians, never devoted his talents to art. Quietly, and with a humble mind, he discharged the duties of his station, nor ever sought, as time went on and withdrew him more and more from active life, to remind the world of his existence. Such men have more of the truly heroic in them than a good many heroes. They are not like the figure-head of the ship, but they help to supply the means and skill which secure a prosperous voyage.

James Turlé was born in 1802, and at an early age entered the service of the Church as a choir-boy of Wells Cathedral. In later years he would sometimes recall his experience of the ways and manners of cathedral services at that time, for the astonishment of those who listened. The nave of the sacred edifice at Wells, it would appear, was the recognised playground of the singing-boys, and there they were wont to indulge a juvenile passion for stone-throwing, and such like potentialities of mischief. If anybody then cared about painted windows—which is doubtful—he trembled for the storied glass of Wells while the urchins of the choir pursued their gambols. Young Turlé distinguished himself as a stone-thrower by sending a missile through St. Andrew's nose, and the fact is said to have been remembered long after by a sacristan who, pointing out the damage, remarked: "That was done by the present organist of Westminster Abbey." Another playful habit of the Wells boys was to rush from their places during the reading of the lessons in order to watch the action of a clock which, every hour, set in motion some mechanical figures. The ingenious Glastonbury monk who is said to have fabricated the article in question scarcely anticipated the effect of his skill upon these "children of the altar." In due time (1817) Turlé left the choir and was articled as a pupil to an uncle of the late Sir John Goss, the future organist of St. Paul's being also a student under the same master. Little did these lads then imagine that their destiny was the two great churches of the metropolis. Turlé soon came to London and to the Abbey, where his life was spent. He acted as assistant to Williams, the then organist, and afterwards to Greatorex, whose permanent deputy he subsequently became. On the death of Greatorex (1831), the young West Country man, then only twenty-nine, was appointed Organist and Master of the Choristers by Dean Ireland, which posts he retained for fifty-one years.

With regard to Turlé's capacity as an organist, we cannot do better than cite certain opinions and facts which will be recognised as having authority. In this respect our thanks are due to Mr. E. J. Hopkins, of the Temple Church, for permission to print the subjoined remarks:—

"Of the ready manner in which Mr. Turlé made himself at home at a comparatively strange organ a good example was given at the Handel Festival, held in Westminster Abbey, in 1834. In the course of that series of performances, no less than seven organists took part; but, the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe records, 'It was not till the latter part of the second concert—when Mr. Turlé, the organist of the Abbey, took his seat at it and accompanied "Israel in Egypt"—that it was heard with proper effect. Then, indeed, its deep tones were drawn forth, and its full chords filled up the harmony, and completely gratified the ear. The difference was striking.'

"At the rehearsal for one of the Birmingham Festivals Mr. Turlé produced a thrilling effect by the way in which he introduced the organ in Handel's chorus, 'Let us break their bonds asunder,' about a dozen bars from the end of the vocal portion, where a return to the original key (C) is made. Mr. Turlé kept the organ in check up to this point, when he let it burst in with its full strength. The effect was so startling that the conductor (Knyvett, I believe) fairly reeled at his desk.

"Mr. Turlé possessed great fluency as an improviser, never being at a loss for a pure or graceful harmonic progression, or for a clear and unaffected modulation; while it was always consistent in design and texture. One of the neatest descriptions of Mr. Turlé's expressive playing, whether extemporising, accompanying the voices, or playing the voluntary, was that given many years ago by one of the canons of Westminster, when he said, 'Mr. Turle makes the organ talk to him.'

As far back as 1844, a writer in the British and Foreign Review bore emphatic testimony to the taste and skill with which Turle presided at his organ: "Whether we regard the selection of the music performed at the Abbey," said this gentleman, "or the manner in which it is accompanied, our commendation is wholly unqualified. We are always made to feel that the organist is thinking, not of himself, but of his author; and in his preludes to the anthems of Purcell, Blow and Croft it seems as if he were moved by the spirit of his illustrious predecessors." On the same subject we read, much more recently, to the same effect. Speaking of Turle's playing on the fifty-sixth anniversary of his entrance upon professional life, a writer in a musical contemporary said: "In the extemporised introduction to the anthem the subject was worked out as skilfully and felicitously as ever, and in the concluding voluntary the organ rang out with marvellous effect, the peculiar 'grip' of the instrument for which Mr. Turle has always been distinguished being specially observable." The testimony of circumstances accords with that of opinion. At the Festival referred to by Lord Mount-Edgcumbe, Turle was associated at the organ with such men as Bishop, Crotch, Knyvett, Novello, Attwood and Adams; but a yet more honourable connection awaited him when "St. Paul" was produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1837. Turle had succeeded to the place of Festival Organist once held by Grotto, and was thus brought into contact with Mendelssohn, who, as all amateurs know, conducted the performance of his oratorio. In after years he loved to dwell upon his meetings with the illustrious composer, and their discussions as to the manner in which the organ should be used, &c. That he impressed Mendelssohn with respect for his judgment would appear from the fact that a hint as to the tempo of a certain movement was actually adopted and carried out. Turle also officiated as organist at the Norwich Festival, in which capacity he made acquaintance with Spohr and Professor Edward Taylor, of whose friendship he was justly proud. He presided at the organ when the German master's "Last Judgment" entered upon its fortunate English career, and thus became associated with an event scarcely less important than the production of "St. Paul." Facts of this kind bear uniform and unmistakable testimony. The man so honoured by distinguished functions must have been a master of what he professed to do.

In exercising the influence attached to his position, Turle acted with rare discretion and sympathy. A conspicuous example of this has lately been cited by Mr. E. J. Hopkins in the columns of a contemporary, he himself being the subject of it. Forty-eight years ago, Mr. Hopkins, then "a youth of sixteen in a light blue jacket-suit of clothes with gilt buttons," aspired to the vacant organist's-seat at Mitcham. Turle knew of this, and one day contrived that Hopkins should play a service at Westminster Abbey in the hearing of an influential Mitcham amateur. The competition took place, and No. 7 (Hopkins) was chosen, but his sixteen years, to say nothing of his "jacket-suit," were against him, and the committee hesitated. Then spoke up the influential amateur, who quoted Turle: "Tell them" (the committee), "with my compliments, that if they fear to trust Hopkins to accompany chants and hymns in Mitcham Church, Mr. Turle does not hesitate to intrust him to play services and anthems in Westminster Abbey." That, of course, decided the question. "The foregoing," adds Mr. Hopkins, "is not related as an isolated instance, but rather as a type of the ordinary manner of the late Mr. Turle towards those 'struggling to make a start.' I will venture to add that Mr. Turle never, so far as I am aware, received any pecuniary return for the kindness which he was in the habit of bestowing. He seemed to consider himself sufficiently recompensed by the knowledge that he occupied a lasting position in the affections and grateful hearts of his young friends." Of Turle's private and social relations his modest and retiring disposition did not allow much to be said. He is known, however, to have been an occasional guest at the Prussian Embassy in the well-remembered time of Bunsen. On one occasion he there met and discomfited the Chevalier Neukomm, who boasted that he could extend his hand on the keyboard over an octave and three notes. Turle quietly approached the piano, and taking an octave and a half into his enormous grasp, exclaimed: "One more for luck." A roar of laughter announced the triumph of the English fingers.

Mr. Turle formally retired from active duty at the Abbey on September 26, 1875, when his Service in D was sung; but he retained a titular connection with the sacred building and lived in his cloister-house till his death, enjoying well-earned rest amid "love, honour, obedience, troops of friends." To his remains would have been accorded honourable burial within the venerable precincts, on the invitation of the Dean, but for his own express desire to rest by the side of his wife in Norwood Cemetery. Filial affection, however, will not leave the fifty-years organist of Westminster Abbey without a memorial within the building he served, as it is intended by one of his sons to fill with stained glass, as a tribute to James Turle, the window above the graves of Henry Purcell and Sterndale Bennett.

THE LONDON MUSICAL SEASON.

BY HENRY C. LUNN.

WHEN, a few years ago, we recorded our conviction of the baneful effects of the establishment of Italian Opera in England to the exclusion of that in other languages, we scarcely imagined that such a decisive change could be effected in so short a space of time. That some reform in the matter was imperatively demanded, however, appeared at length to be admitted even by the lessees of the lyrical theatres themselves, for gradually works by the composers of other countries have replaced those by Italians; and latterly some of the most attractive operas of the season have been originally written to German or French words. But these small concessions could hardly satisfy the true lovers of art, who naturally would not accept a libretto in Italian when the music was decidedly opposed to the Italian School, and the result is the recent friendly invasion of German artists, who, by successfully placing their works before us during the very time that the lyrical drama has been usually given over to the fashionable loungers of the Italian Opera, have at least given a practical lesson to the lessees of the future. The barrier which has so long impeded the progress of opera in this country having been at length removed, we may now hope not only that the lyrical works of various nations will be constantly presented to us, but that English composers themselves may have a chance of being heard without the necessity of having their Operas translated into a foreign language for production before their own countrymen.

The representation of the "Nibelung's Ring" at Her Majesty's Theatre has been so fully noticed in these columns that we need only now refer to it as one of the most important events of the busy musical season just concluded. The series of performances of German Opera at Drury Lane Theatre must also be recorded as a movement in the right direction; for although perhaps we may have heard some of the parts in these works sung by more finished vocalists, there can be no question that the ensemble has so thoroughly realised the composers' intention that the Italian versions to which we have been so long accustomed will now appear like colourless imitations of the originals. This positive teaching is infinitely more effectual than columns of arguments, however forcibly they may be written; and we are glad to hear that the welcome accorded to our guests has produced such a feeling of satisfaction in Germany as to make it probable that their visit may be repeated next season.

Meanwhile, however, the "Royal Italian Opera Company (Limited)" has flourished in our midst, and Mr. Gye, the earnest Director of the enterprise, has done his utmost to assure us that the patrons of his establishment are perfectly content to listen to their favourite vocalists in their favourite parts. His prospectus of the season, indeed, was so unusually mild as to read almost like a defiance of the German element with which he was for the first time surrounded. Strong in prime donne, he has resolutely put them forward in the operas best calculated to assert their position, and relied for support upon his subscription and the few fashionable music-lovers who loyally cling to the traditional Italian Opera. One new work—Lenepveu's "Velleda"—he has certainly produced; but as this was evidently placed upon the stage rather to gratify the singers than the listeners, the less said about it the better. We have now learned to estimate the difference between works written for the art, and works written for the artists; and when singers shall have discovered that their true mission is to reveal the genius of a composer rather than to display their exceptional gifts at his expense, the record of an operatic season will no longer be a mere wearisome catalogue of vocal triumphs.

Mr. Gye's company has this year been unusually weak in tenors, M. Lestellier, the new comer, having scarcely satisfied the exacting audiences of the Royal Italian Opera. M. Bouhy, the baritone, made a favourable impression on his début, and has since fairly maintained his position; but no other first appearance has been a sufficiently marked success to justify more than a few conventional words of faint praise. To chronicle the ovations accorded to the many well-known heroines of the well-known Italian Operas would be an idle waste of time; but the superb acting and singing of Madame Pauline Lucca, both in "Carmen" and "Fra Diavolo," must be mentioned as a real and legitimate attraction of the season. It has often been announced that a vocalist would "create" a part in a lyrical work; but, until reading Mr. Gye's advertisement respecting Madame Christine Nilsson, in Boito's "Mefistofele," we never heard that an artist could "create an opera." Perhaps she felt it a difficult task to "create" a work which she had played in a whole season at Her Majesty's Theatre; but, however this may be, Madame Nilsson failed to join the company at all, and—unfortunately for the lessee—Madame Trebelli, who was also to have sung in Boito's Opera, disappeared in the middle of the season. When promises thus widely disseminated are suddenly broken in other contracts with the public, some explanation of the cause is usually vouchsafed; but operatic lessees appear tacitly to be held irresponsible, and we have only, therefore, to bow and submit.

Amongst the orchestral performances of the season we have now to mention the "Symphony Concerts," under the able direction of Mr. Charles Hallé. It is unnecessary here to discuss the circumstances which led to the establishment of these, in addition to the "Richter Concerts," as they are named, but it is certainly to be regretted that this division of interests should have occurred, for there can be no doubt that both these enterprises suffered in consequence. The public is ever ready and willing to welcome a new feature in the musical season; and the advent of a German Conductor with so high a reputation as Herr Richter enjoyed in his own country was a legitimate attraction to a London audience. The "Richter Concerts," then, firmly established two years ago, were eagerly looked for this season; but when, in opposition to them, the "Symphony Concerts" were started, the interest became divided, and we much doubt therefore whether the pecuniary success of either was satisfactory to their promoters.

A new lease of existence has certainly been taken by the Philharmonic Society, which, after sleeping for many years, has, like Rip Van Winkle, found everything changed on awaking. Following, rather than leading, the Berlioz movement last year, by the production of the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, it has this year boldly brought forward Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost" and Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, for the first time in this country. The formation of a Philharmonic Choir has enabled the Society to render choral works with an effect difficult to attain by the occasional engagement of strange chorus-singers; and Mr. Cusins deserves much credit for the manner in which he has trained this newly established Choir, and also for the increased efficiency of his band.

The three Orchestral Concerts given and conducted by Mr. Walter Macfarren deserve warm commendation in a record of the season. The band not only contained some of the best performers in the Metropolis, but the balance of the instruments was so carefully regulated as to ensure the utmost beauty of tone, and the result was such a rendering of several great works as reflected the highest credit both upon the members of the orchestra and their Conductor. In spite of the other attractions of this abnormally active season, all the performances were well attended, and we may hope that next year they will be repeated.

The excellent training of Mr. Barnby has been so decisively manifested in the Concerts of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society as to attract at each performance a large and appreciative audience. In the familiar Oratorios the powers of this body of vocalists are already well known; but the magnificent rendering of Berlioz' "Damnation de Faust" was a musical sensation which will not soon be forgotten; and the amount of hard work necessary to produce this result must not be passed over in a record of the efforts of those zealous amateurs who are content, like true artists, to merge their individual acquirements in a contribution to the general effect.

Mr. Carl Rosa's season of Operas in English at Her Majesty's Theatre, although successful in an artistic point of view, was scarcely as energetically supported as it deserved to be. The day is not far distant, perhaps, when lyrical dramas in our native language may attract large audiences, even in the height of the London season; but at present they can only modestly appear either before the great guests arrive or after they have departed. This year it was obvious that the sole chance of being heard at all was to be early in the field, and to complete the series of performances before operas had commenced at any other establishment; for during the continuance of the Wagner "cycles" the excitement was too great to allow of attention being given to "native talent," and, afterwards, so much money had been spent by the patrons of the lyrical drama as to render the result of a season of English opera more than usually hazardous. During the eight weeks of Mr. Carl Rosa's management, however, many works were excellently placed upon the stage; and in justice it must be stated that to Madame Alwina Valleria and Mr. Ludwig much of the success of the Wagnerian opera was mainly due. The production of Balfe's "Moro" was, in our opinion, an error of judgment, especially at a time when the alteration of public taste was so marked as to render even the once popular operas of this composer scarcely acceptable save to the few who liked to hear once more the airs they used to whistle when they were boys. It is a matter of regret that Mr. Rosa was unable to undergo the fatigue of conducting during the season, but his place was ably supplied by Mr. Randegger, occasionally relieved in his arduous duties by Mr. Pew.

The appearance of Madame Schumann has been a powerful attraction at the Monday Popular Concerts; and the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace have maintained their reputation for the excellence of their performances, although—in spite of the Berlioz novelties—no composition likely to prove of permanent value has been produced. The London Musical Society retains its high position as a well-disciplined amateur body, ready and willing to devote its energies to the rendering of compositions almost unknown to this country. Not only as pioneers in the cause of good music, therefore, but as honest workers for the mere love of art, the members of this choir deserve the warm thanks of the public; and, with so skilful a Conductor as Mr. Barnby, many works of the highest interest may thus be constantly introduced which, commercially speaking, it might be hazardous to bring forward. The performances of the Bach Society, too, under the conductorship of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, have this season been uniformly good; and we are glad to find that the programmes are in no respect narrowed in consequence of the somewhat exclusive title of the Association.

Some excellent Concerts by Mr. Ganz, and also by the Guildhall Orchestral Society, deserve mention; and the laudable efforts of many of the suburban Choral Societies must also be recorded. Amongst the most prominent of these may be placed the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, at the last Concert of which a new Cantata, entitled "Alfred," by the Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, was produced; the Highbury Philharmonic Society, which, under the able conductorship of Dr. Bridge, gave an interesting concert-arrangement of Weber's Opera "Euryanthe"; and the Hampstead Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Willem Coenen, the programmes of which are exclusively confined to high-class compositions. Chamber Concerts of much interest have also been given by Mr. Charles Hallé and Herr Franke; and the Pianoforte Recitals of Madame Sophie Menter have been amongst the prominent attractions of the season.

The Concerts of Mr. Walter Bache are annually looked forward to by the admirers of Liszt, for the programmes of his orchestral performances, and his Pianoforte Recitals are invariably made up chiefly from the works of the great German composer. This year he has given one Pianoforte and one Orchestral Concert, at both of which his enthusiasm in the cause he has devoted himself to was evidenced by the selection of many of the most representative of Liszt's compositions; but feeling, we presume, that there were other composers worthy of a hearing, at his Recital he also performed Beethoven's great Sonata (Op. 106) in B flat, which was deservedly received with warm applause.

The dissolution of the Sacred Harmonic Society is an event to be deeply regretted. The claims of this old-established institution were of so legitimate a nature that even to the last we earnestly hoped that sufficient support would be accorded to prevent such a result. The report issued by the Society, however, stated the matter so clearly that—much as the public might feel the loss of such a valuable exponent of sacred music—not a shadow of blame could be attached to those who had for years unsuccessfully endeavoured to avert the final catastrophe. The return of Sir Michael Costa to the Conductor's desk, after his severe illness, at the last Concert gave additional interest to the performance; and even if the memory of this excellent institution should not be preserved by an association mainly consisting of members of the old choir, the name of the Sacred Harmonic Society will assuredly pass into history, not only as a successful populariser of sacred musical art in the country, but as one which to the end of its career persistently appealed to the elevated taste of a public which it had so zealously striven to educate.

The establishment of musical entertainments for the people at an extremely moderate rate of admission is a hopeful sign of the times. The Royal Victoria Coffee Hall was opened on December 26, 1880, by the Coffee Music Hall Company, Limited. The preliminary expenses, however, were large, and although many eminent members of the profession gave their services, the Company was compelled to close the Hall in August, 1881. A Guarantee Fund was then raised, and in the following October the Hall was reopened, under the management of Mr. William Poel, who has most judiciously lessened the expenses and raised the tone of the entertainments. It is now announced that a new choir will be started in the autumn, Mr. W. Sexton, Lay Vicar of Westminster Abbey, being appointed Musical Director, and that Concerts, consisting of Oratorios, Part-Songs, Madrigals and Glees, will be given once a month. An enterprise so well conducted is thoroughly deserving of extensive support, and as in addition to this a committee has been formed to rent on fixed evenings in the week the large halls frequented by the working classes for the purpose of giving really good Concerts, the admission to which has been fixed for the present at threepence, it is to be hoped that both the pecuniary aid and influence of all well-wishers to the cause will be freely accorded.

Lovers of refined part-singing will share our satisfaction at the revival of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, under the able conductorship of Signor Randegger. One Concert only was given this season, but it is understood that next year the Choir will resume its performances as usual, Mr. Leslie retaining the office of President of the Society, and, we may presume, occasionally aiding the efforts of the choir by his valuable counsel and advice.

The meeting of the French Orphéonistes at the Royal Albert Hall scarcely excited that attention which its promoters evidently expected. At Brighton last year a similar gathering took place; but although the residents and visitors of the "Queen of Watering Places" agreed to regard the event as one of the holiday attractions, it could hardly be expected that a London public, in the height of the musical season, would assemble at the Albert Hall to pass judgment upon the relative merits of foreign instrumentalists, and to see prizes distributed to the successful competitors; and the result was therefore—as Englishmen, at least, anticipated—a comparative failure.

The Musical Union, since the retirement of Mr. Ella, has proved how much the personality of the founder had to do with its success. Exclusive it certainly was, but then it had obtained a character, and it was equally difficult for the recently appointed Director, M. Lasserre, to preserve this character as to acquire a new one. Last year the Concerts were carried on, but this season it was announced by M. Lasserre that, "in consequence of circumstances beyond control," no subscription Concerts would be given. The public can be but little concerned in the continuance of these performances; but many old subscribers will for some time feel that there is a gap in the season should the Musical Union cease to exist.

The anxiety and sympathy called forth by the illness of Sir Michael Costa in the height of the season sufficiently evidenced the position he occupies in the musical art of this country. Occurring, too, during the series of Concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society, of which institution he has for many years been the Conductor, much difficulty would have been experienced in continuing the concerts had it not been possible to transfer the bâton to so able an artist as M. Sainton. The appearance of Sir Michael Costa to conduct the final Concert, however, proved not only his restoration to health, but his desire to show his devotion to the Society by presiding at its farewell performance. The many who look forward with even more than usual interest to the approaching Birmingham Festival may now confidently rely upon his occupying his accustomed post as Conductor of the meeting; and it may also be hoped that he will give his valuable services in the organisation and direction of the Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, which in due course will occur next year.

The meeting in aid of the establishment of the Royal College of Music, convened at St. James's Palace by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, proves that the art is now receiving recognition in the highest quarters; and it is to be hoped that the large sum of money required for the purpose may be forthcoming when the time arrives for opening the College. Meanwhile, it is gratifying to observe that public attention has been awakened to the subject; and, in evidence of the spread of healthy musical education, we may mention that the students at the Royal Academy of Music, the Guildhall School of Music, and other similar institutions appear to increase year by year.

It is gratifying to record that the Dean of Westminster has given his consent for a tablet in memory of the late M. W. Balfe, the well-known English composer, to be placed in Westminster Abbey, in compliance with a requisition drawn up by Mr. W. A. Barrett and signed by the Professors of Music at the Universities and a number of influential persons in the musical world. As one of the events of the season evidencing the increased and increasing estimation of musical artists, the fact is worthy of mention.

The decease of the Dowager Countess of Essex, at the age of eighty-eight, will recall to many the days when, as Miss Stephens, she held the highest reputation, not only as a vocalist in the so-called operas of the time, but as a concert-singer; and amongst those who have passed away during the season must be mentioned Madame Rudersdorff, who died at Boston, in the United States, and who, although known in England for many years as a dramatic singer, had lately devoted herself exclusively to tuition. The obituary of the year likewise includes the celebrated composer Herr Raff, a sketch of whose career was given in our last number; Theodore Kullak, the composer of innumerable pianoforte pieces, and a celebrated teacher; Alfred Jaell, an accomplished pianist, who was always warmly received on his visits to London, especially at the Concerts of the Musical Union; and Friedrich Wilhelm Kücken, whose many vocal works are highly popular in this country. We have also to record the death of Mr. Turle, so long organist of Westminster Abbey, and one of the most respected members of the musical profession. For some time he had retired from the post he had so worthily occupied, but to the last he took a keen interest in all matters relating to art and artists.

We have had so many barren seasons to record that the number of musical attractions presented this year to the London public—evidently not in excess of the demand—cannot but make us doubly estimate their value to the progress of the art. The growth of musical feeling in this country has been gradual, but no less sure and healthy. We are a quiet people, and take some time to think over matters which in more impulsive nations are at once settled and acted upon; and although, therefore, we have this season proved our readiness to receive with pleasure the works which have for some time won the estimation of foreign judges, we are loth to part with—or even to think less of—those which for years we have cherished as priceless treasures. It may be boldly asserted that formless art can never live, but that art may take many forms is an eternal truth; and if, therefore, in this transition age undue prominence should be gained by inferior compositions, let us rest assured that the crucial test of time will accurately determine their worth, and assign to each work its due place in the Temple of Fame.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XII.—ROSSINI.

IN 1792 the temporal dominion of the Pope was not bounded by the garden wall of the Vatican. It stretched across Italy from shore to shore, and embraced, among other seaside towns lapped by the lazy ripples of the Mediterranean, a little place called

Pesaro. Pesaro then as now, when the cross of Savoy floats above its public buildings, was a port doing some business along the coast of the Venetian Gulf, but its utilitarianism had a hard struggle to hold out against the spirit born of beauty—a spirit that in turn produces and fosters art. Pesaro may be described as “fit nurse for a poetic child.” Before it stretch the blue waters of the tideless sea, and behind and on each side wooded hills lift their heads into the azure; trees there flourish on the very strand, and nod to their reflections in the mirror beneath; while the whole aspect of the place and its surroundings is one of dreaminess and peace. Nevertheless, prosaic concerns demanded attention in Pesaro at the time of which we speak. The good people could not live upon their balmy atmosphere, their verdant hills and flower-decked valleys. It was necessary to labour even amid such an Eden, and one of those who suffered from what is sometimes styled the “primeval curse” called himself Giuseppe Rossini. Giuseppe made no pretensions to rank or station. He was, indeed, but a humble servant of the town, and ordinarily might have been seen engaged in the unsavoury duty of inspecting slaughter-houses. The man had, however, a second function, that of town-trumpeter, and on state occasions, arrayed, no doubt, in some kind of livery, he formed an element in the pomps and vanities of Pesaro. Good Giuseppe probably felt content with his lowly lot. At any rate, we know that he was a merry fellow, and so distinguished by humour, even among a light-hearted race, that people called him Il Vivazza, or The Lively One. In later years men concerned themselves greatly about the family of this joyous-minded inspector of slaughter-houses and town-trumpeter; making the discovery that, like Shenkin in the song, he came of “noble race.” “About the middle of the sixteenth century,” said the genealogical Dryasdusts, “a certain patrician, Giovanni Russini, or Rossini, was a famous person, and from him, in direct descent came the Lively One.” Moreover, the Dryasdusts unearthed a coat of arms for the Rossini family, the escutcheon bearing, among other things, a hand holding a rose surmounted by a nightingale, which was assuredly a device of prophetic import. Giuseppe remained ignorant of these honours, and probably would have cared little about them had they come to his knowledge. He visited his abattoirs, blew his trumpet, earned a few scudi by playing the horn in the orchestra when an itinerant opera company visited Pesaro, and settled himself at last as the husband of Anna Guidarini, daughter of a bread-baking neighbour. Anna is described as a handsome woman, by nature serious, elevated and sentimental; but, however this may have been, her husband loved her very much, and experienced the most lively alarm and anxiety when the time of her confinement approached. The vivacity of Giuseppe’s temper now ran in a new channel, and led to comical results. Anna’s critical hour having come, her female neighbours, after the manner of womankind in such cases, gathered round full of interest and sympathy. As the patient’s sufferings were prolonged, the good, simple souls proceeded to burn candles and say prayers before some plaster images of the Twelve Apostles in an adjoining room. Giuseppe had less faith and more concern. Continued suspense tormented him, till at length fear gave way to anger, which promptly turned itself upon the Twelve Apostles. Seizing a stick, the Lively One extinguished the candles, chased away the devout women, and proceeded to demolish the images. Three had already fallen victims to his fury, and the weapon was descending upon the head of San Giacomo when an infant’s cry arrested it. Giuseppe was the happy father of a boy, and, kneeling before the fourth Apostle, he said, “St. James, I thank you. You are the patron of my parish at Lugo, and therefore you have helped us.” The child born under these circumstances was baptised as Gioacchino, and subsequently composed “Guillaume Tell.”

No other offspring resulting from the marriage of Giuseppe and Anna, the parents lavished their affection upon Gioacchino. They seem to have been poor enough at one period to make self-sacrifice necessary in this regard, and we are told that Rossini, in after life, could rarely speak of them or hear them spoken of without tears of gratitude and love. It should be said here that Anna Rossini, who had a good voice together with some musical talent, occupied her leisure in cultivating both; and it was well that she did so, for a storm burst upon the little household and overwhelmed it. In 1796 a young French general named Buonaparte overran Italy in the interest of “liberty, equality and fraternity,” and did not neglect Pesaro. At once the new propaganda counted Giuseppe Rossini among its adherents. The Lively One embraced Republicanism with characteristic ardour, became prominent among its advocates, and was of course marked down by the Pontificals, who bided their turn. As every one knows, Buonaparte went to Egypt, and the Austrians and reactionaries reconquered Italy. Then came a dark day for Giuseppe. He was haled to prison, while Anna, taking her boy, then six years old, fled Bolognawards, resolved to support herself and him by singing on the operatic stage.

Rossini was wont to say that, but for the invasion of Italy by the French, he would probably have been a druggist or an oil merchant. We need not believe this, and ought not, because Music imperatively claimed him for her own; still, the event referred to had a direct influence upon his immediate future. It threw him among musicians, and associated his earliest years with art and artists. Not that Anna, who soon obtained a good place among prime donne buffe, took the boy with her on her travels. While she journeyed from town to town, singing at the theatres opened during fair-time, Gioacchino was intrusted to the care of a pork-butcher, with whom he remained even after the Lively One had been released from prison, a sadder and a wiser man. Giuseppe joined his wife, playing first horn where she sang, and the pork-butcher charged a certain Signor Agostino Monti with the literary education of their son. Signor Monti knew the value of a good name before the world, and he built up his own at the expense of truth, boasting pedagogic successes that existed only in imagination. According to him, young Rossini was a perfect wonder as a Latinist; but Anna had her doubts on the point, and commissioned a Bolognese doctor to examine the reputed prodigy. Alas for Signor Monti!—the lad knew absolutely nothing, and that worthy’s academic halls received the pork-butcher’s charge no more. A Signor Innocenzo next took the lad in hand, and, after him, a Signor Fini; the two between them enabling him to master the “three R’s.” Further education than this, Gioacchino had none of the ordinary kind. He studied for the rest in the great school of the world, and proved himself anything but a dunce. Young Rossini received his first music lessons at the age of seven from Signor Prinetti, a professor of the spinet. Prinetti had peculiar notions about fingering, and taught his pupils to use only two of the five members on each hand—that is to say, when he taught at all; for he is reputed to have been generally asleep. Under such conditions Gioacchino’s progress was not rapid, especially as he had an invincible repugnance to study of any kind. The boy simply would not work. He was as much a vivazza as his father, and loved best to follow the idle hours round the clock, getting what amusement he could out of them. Seeing this, the Lively One came to a stern resolve, and placed his son in a blacksmith's shop, where his mission was to blow the fire. Hour by hour the little fellow pulled at his cord, and made the bellows roar, learning, as he afterwards said, to play in time, while Giuseppe, bent upon shaming him once for all, gathered the boys of his acquaintance round the shop, that they might taunt and jeer their disgraced companion. The iron of the blacksmith entered into young Rossini's soul, but he was wise enough not to resent it. Probably the blacksmith himself did not know what a young philosopher worked at the bellows, nor what a sage determination that little brain arrived at. He would be a good boy in future, would Gioacchino, and when his father, relenting, took him away from the slavery of the cord, he kept his word.

The lad went again under sleepy Prinetti of the two fingers, but not for long. A better master, Angelo Tesei, took him in hand, teaching him singing and accompaniment to such good purpose that soon the youthful treble was in demand at the churches. Gioacchino received three paoli (about fifteenpence) per service, and this sum, small though it was, proved of immense value to the family, now fallen upon evil times, since Anna's voice, used unsparingly and without much method, had gone rapidly to decay. The poor little fellow laboured very hard with his pretty treble, while the priests, finding him an attraction, worked him unsparingly, even making him sing transposed bass and tenor solos—which, by the way, gives us a clear idea of the state of music in Italian churches at that time. Meanwhile Gioacchino pursued his studies under Tesei, and spent many of his leisure hours with the Chevalier Giusti, an engineer, who took a great fancy for the lad and read with him the masters of Italian literature. The influence of Giusti upon young Rossini was most salutary, but did not wean him from music. By this time an excellent reader and accompanist, Gioacchino turned his acquirements to account in increasing the pecuniary resources of the family while still continuing to work at the churches. On one occasion he played Adolfo in Paer's "Camilla" at the Bologna Theatre, but his principal source of income lay in teaching the opera-singers their rôles (few of them could read music), and in playing the spinet at representations, receiving about two shillings for each attendance, rehearsals not counting. At this period he took finishing lessons in singing from Babbini, an artist of some repute, and altogether began to make a figure in local life. Hence we find him, at fifteen years of age, conducting the monthly concerts given by the Accademia d'I Concor di. It appears that there was some not unnatural murmuring among the old members of this association when the appointment was made; "but," says one of Rossini's biographers, "the commanding talent, already very remarkable, of which the young master gave proof in directing his orchestra with the firmness of a veteran, the life which he diffused by his decision and 'go,' and his vivacious repartees, soon made the grumblers obey and hold their tongues, like the grenadier in Scribe's vaudeville." Our boy-conductor signalled his reign by a deed of some daring. The programmes of the society had theretofore been made up of extracts from operas, save on one special occasion, when the singing-master, Marchesi, directed a performance of Haydn's "Creation." At that time the works of the old German composer were making their way in Italy, and the Bolognese amateurs, delighted with the "Creation," resolved to try their powers upon the "Seasons." It became Gioacchino's business, therefore, to rehearse the oratorio and present it to the public—no slight task for one so young and inexperienced. He performed it, however, and Zanolini, one of his biographers, records: "The execution was so perfect that it excited the admiration of everybody." Authorities differ as to the precise date of this achievement. Stendhal settles upon May, 1811, when Rossini was nineteen years of age, but a later and better-informed writer, M. Azevedo, while giving neither month nor year, affirms that the performance of the "Seasons" took place prior to March, 1807, at which time Gioacchino entered the Bologna Lyceum as a student of counterpoint under Stanislas Mattei. M. Azevedo is no doubt correct, and Rossini may justly claim the distinction of doing at fifteen that which, under all the circumstances, would have been sufficiently remarkable four years later. About this time, Gioacchino took another important step in advance—that is to say, he emerged from the limited sphere of Bologna and displayed his growing talent in the theatres of Ferrara, Sinigaglia and other towns; acting as maestro al cembalo where his father played the horn. It may be that he was not altogether unknown out of Bologna, since his talent had been discerned by persons well qualified and well disposed to spread the fame of it abroad. Just then a family named Mombelli were itinerant opera-singers in Italy, and, save for a solitary "outsider," formed a complete company of themselves. The mother, who did not act, met young Rossini at Bologna, and, being, it is said, a woman of remarkable penetration and judgment, formed a high opinion of his powers, to test which she now and then gave him verses to set to music. The eager boy was flattered by the notice he received, and plied his pen with zeal; though quite unconscious of the fact that the verses received from Signora Mombelli were closely connected and formed a complete story. In this way grew, bit by bit, the opera "Demetrio e Polibio," a work we shall presently meet again. Something of this probably became known through the agency of the Mombellis, but, unhappily, there are no means of following Gioacchino through his first tour. M. Azevedo is, however, responsible for an anecdote of which it might well be said se non è vero, è ben trovato, since it shows young Rossini to have been as a boy the true progenitor of Rossini the man. The prima donna of the theatre at Sinigaglia was a lady named Carpani, a bad singer, but withal a person of influence, owing to the footing on which she stood with the intendant, a certain Marchese Cavalli. Between our juvenile maestro al cembalo and La Carpani no very cordial relations existed, and one day came an open rupture. In endeavouring to execute a florid passage, the lady acquitted herself so badly that the boy in the orchestra broke into a shout of laughter, which the audience were not slow to take up. The consequences may be imagined. La Carpani complained to the intendant, who summoned Gioacchino before him, and loaded him with reproaches. The boy heard in silence to the end, and then spoke: "Ornatissimo Marchese, you have reasons for taking the part of your prima donna, and, in my quality as a refined musician, I had mine for laughing at her this evening before the public. All the cannon on earth levelled at me could not have prevented it. You yourself, had you been there, would have followed my example, for you are a dilettante. Frankly, now, could you have contained yourself had you heard her sing like this?" Rossini followed up this audacious speech by so perfect an imitation of the lady's voice and style that Cavalli shouted with laughter. Here plainly was the making of something more than an accompanist at three shillings and fourpence a night, and the astute intendant thought it worth while to act upon the discovery.

"Little one, thou desirest, no doubt, to write operas?"

"Assuredly. Do you think I want to pass my life in accompanying singers like your Carpani?"

"Well, when thou thinkest thyself capable, let me know. I promise thee a libretto and an engagement."

Cavalli, as we shall discover in good time, kept his word, and made the bright boy's offence a stepping-stone to fame.

Our young hero is now a student at the Bologna Lyceum, and one of no common sort, if the following summary of his attainments may be accepted as true: "He was master of all the secrets of the art of singing in such fashion as to be able to teach them to the best artists in Italy. He could reduce full scores for the keyboard at first sight. He was a most finished accompanist, and most capable of following and anticipating the changes of time desired by the singers. He had composed by instinct little duets for two horns; a number of pieces for the voice and pianoforte; and, without having learnt a rule of counterpoint, had written 'Demetrio e Polibio,' in which the quartet is a striking proof of the insight of genius. The manner in which Rossini has combined the voices in that movement shows in effect all that he had divined of the difficult art which he had not been taught. As a pianist he played for his own gratification a great number of concertos, sonatas, and pieces of all sorts both by Italian and German masters, and that which he once played he kept intact in his memory. He knew the horn, as we have already seen, and in the course of some lessons given to him by Rastrelli he mastered enough of the mechanism of the king of instruments to be able to continue his study alone. . . . He learned also to play a little on several wind instruments, but without masters. Some hints that he obtained from virtuosi sufficed, and when he had acquired the embouchure and the fingering he troubled no further. His sole object was to know enough for good writing." Such was the youth, gifted, ardent, and ambitious, whom Father Mattei took into his class. That worthy pedant found Gioacchino an enfant terrible, of the sort which Berlioz must have been to another swallower of formulas, Lesueur. Mattei, as the pupil of Father Martini, and a prominent representative of his school, could boast an authoritative position by inheritance, but in person he was simply the incarnation of musical "red tape." He once published a manual which treated harmony in six pages and counterpoint in eight. "Do this, and this," he said in effect, "but don't do that, and that;" and if a pupil asked "Why?" he was told that the rule enjoined, or the rule forbade, and had to be content with the answer. Imagine our vivacious and audacious lad under such a man—a young Pegasus with clipped wings describing circles in a mill! But Rossini did not break out into open rebellion. Perhaps he remembered the blacksmith's shop, but, at any rate, he laboriously worked at the cut-and-dried lessons of his master, all the time acquiring, no doubt, some of the contempt for scholasticism with which certain writers have credited him. This was unfortunate, since it gave some colour for a charge only founded on fact to a very limited extent. The authority of Fétis may be brought forward here. That musical historiographer tells us how, on one occasion Rossini said to him:—

"I should have had a taste for cultivating the strict forms of music, if a master able to explain the reason of the rules had taught me counterpoint; but when I asked Mattei for information, he always responded, 'It is the custom to write thus.' He disgusted me with a science which had no good reason to give for the things it taught." On another occasion, Fétis presented Rossini with his work "Esquisse de l'Histoire de l'Harmonie," saying, "You will not read it, but I cannot put the book into better hands than those of the man who has been a creator in harmony." Rossini smiled, and said nothing at the time, but after a few days observed to his friend, "I have read your book with much interest. . . . If I had had you for a master, my dear Fétis, I should have been that which is called a learned musician, for I had a taste for the style of the old composers. The keenest pleasure that music ever gave me was experienced on hearing some pieces by Palestrina at the Pontifical Chapel, in 1812. But I had at Bologna a — who, when I asked the reason of that which he made me do, pointed to the authority of the schools. I sent him to the right-about, and have consulted only my own taste."

There is reason to believe, from what we know of Rossini's doings at the Lyceum, that the foregoing testimony is true—at least, in the sense that he was not the mere melodist often described to us. For conclusive proof of the fact it almost suffices to mention that Mattei often styled his brilliant pupil the "little German." Thanks to a friend, Rossini made acquaintance with the scores of Haydn and Mozart, and instinctively felt that here was a higher order of music than that which, in Italy, was cribbed, cabined and confined by the supremacy of the vocalist. The German masters gave him visions of a new world, full of vast possibilities for the genius which eagerly longed to make it a reality. Thenceforth he knew what to study, and lacked no stimulus to the task. When free from Mattei's intolerable formulas, and released from Cavedagni's violoncello class, the "little German" might have been found practising Haydn and Mozart with some of his fellow-pupils, or writing out full scores of their works from the parts; or, perhaps, busy at the town library with the compositions of a period before Italian art had sunk beneath the feet of mere vocalists. It may have been that the lad's "pastors and masters" looked doubtfully upon his tendency to leave the orthodox Italian fold, but they were just enough to commit to him, as the best student of the year (1808), the task of composing a cantata for public performance. Thus came into being "Pianto d'Armonia per la morte d'Orfei," a work for soli, chorus and orchestra, produced with success at Bologna on August 11. After this event, Rossini remained some months at the Lyceum, and then, according to certain authorities, left abruptly, not to say rudely. We are told by the biographers in question how, Mattei having pointed out to his pupils that they knew enough to write operas, but not sacred music, Rossini seized his hat exclaiming, "Venerable master, as my only ambition is to write operas, I thank you with most profound gratitude for all the trouble you have taken," and left the class never to return. M. Azevedo calls this a legend, and avers that, after having studied fugue for five months subsequent to the production of his Cantata, the young man absented himself more and more often from the Lyceum, and thus gently broke the bonds that had become intolerably irksome. Rossini, his pupilage over, now fairly launched himself upon the sea of life.

ÆOLIAN MUSIC

By CARL ENGEL.

PERHAPS most musicians will be of opinion that the wild and mysterious sounds of nature, of which I purpose to give some account, ought not to be called music, since they do not emanate from the human heart. However, as long as musicians disagree about the proper definition of the term music—indeed, almost every theorist gives a different one—it may be permissible to use the expression “Æolian Music,” at least with the same right with which the vocal effusions of the nightingale are commonly designated as the nightingale’s song. At any rate, the fascinating sound of the Æolian harp, unaided by human hand, appears to me more impressive than many brilliant musical compositions; and the charming tones of the nightingale I am apt to regard as more elevating than most of our skilful flute concertos. Thus much by way of introduction, to prevent disappointment, and to induce musicians who possess a different taste to save themselves the trouble of perusing the following discussion. No doubt, to take an interest in old and antiquated popular traditions, such as will be found recorded here, requires a peculiar imagination which is not possessed by every lover of the noble art of music.

THE SUBTERRANEAN CLIFF CONCERT.

In the year 1740, Johann Mattheson, in Hamburg, the well-known prolific musical author and the friend of Handel’s youth, received unexpectedly from Norway a letter containing two extraordinary documents respecting a subterranean cliff concert and the musical accomplishments of mountain dwarfs, which surprised him probably not less than they will surprise the reader, to whom they are here submitted in an English translation. The letter was sent to Mattheson by General von Bertuch, governor of the Fort Aggerhuus, near Christiania. The first of the documents consists of a statement made by Heinrich Meyer, leader of the musical band of the town of Christiania; the other contains a communication addressed to General von Bertuch by one of his military officers, whose name was C. Barth, and who has duly signed his assertions, which he evidently so fully believed that he would readily have confirmed them with an oath, had he been requested thus to attest to their truth.

“In the year 1695, when I had been about three months apprentice to Paul Kröplin, the leader of the musical band of the town of Bergen, it happened, one Saturday evening before Christmas, that we were practising some pieces of music which we intended to perform during the festival.

“Now, there lived in the neighbourhood of Bergen a peasant who supplied my master with milk and butter, and who usually came to our house every Saturday for his money. Having called on that Saturday also, and finding us engaged in practising, the peasant remained some time standing and attentively listening to our music. At last my master jokingly said to him, ‘This time you shall not have any payment for your milk and butter, for you have been amply paid with the music which you have heard!’

“‘Dear me!’ cried the peasant. ‘Bless my soul, if I do not hear better music, every Christmas Eve, in the cliffs a short distance from my farmyard!’

“This remark caused my master ironically to laugh; and likewise the organist and the cantor, who assisted at the rehearsal, joined in the merriment and sneered at the peasant.

“‘Very well, gentlemen,’ retorted the latter, ‘if you doubt the truth of my words, you may soon convince yourself that I tell no stories. To-night is Christmas Eve; so you have only to come to my house, and I shall conduct you to the cliffs.’

“After the peasant had gone and the rehearsal was finished, my master, the organist, and the cantor conversed about the proposal, and finally resolved to call upon the peasant for the purpose of ascertaining whether any explanation could be found for the supposed delusion. So they went all three together, and I was ordered to follow them and to carry a bottle with brandy, for it was intensely cold.

“It was nearly midnight when we arrived at the farmyard. The peasant intimated to us that it was time to proceed at once to the mountain; and after we had reached the place indicated by him, he desired us to sit down and to listen attentively.

“Now, when my master, the organist, and the cantor had been sitting in that cold place during about a quarter of an hour without hearing anything, they grew impatient, and began to upbraid the peasant, saying: ‘How long do you intend to make fools of us?’ But the peasant begged them to have a little more patience, and to keep quiet.

“Suddenly it began to sound in the hills as if tones were produced in our immediate neighbourhood. First a chord was struck; then a single tone was sounded, apparently for the purpose of tuning the instruments; then commenced a prelude on the organ; and directly afterwards we heard a number of voices accompanied by cornets, trombones, violins, and other instruments without being able to see any performer.

“At last, when we had listened a long time, the organist having become uneasy about these invisible performers and subterranean musicians, called out to them: ‘If you are of heaven, show yourselves; but if you are of hell, leave off that mysterious music.’

“In a moment the concert ceased; but the organist fell down as if he had had a stroke, his mouth and nose foaming. In this condition we carried him to the house of the peasant, where we laid him in a bed, covered him well, and took so much care of him that on the following morning he was able to rise and to return with us to Bergen, which is only about five miles distant from the place in which this inexplicable concert was heard. The place is in the vicinity of Biercheland’s church.

“The above statement, which I, the undersigned have committed to paper, contains nothing but the strict truth. I annex here a melody which I myself have heard in the cliffs near Bergen, and which I have retained in my memory more intact than some other melodies which I likewise heard in the same place:—

“This communication I herewith sign with my own hand. Christiania, January the first, Anno Domini 1740. Heinrich Meyer, town-musician of Christiania, near Aggerhuus, under the government of General and Commandant von Bertuch.”

“In the year 1696, the following event was experienced and observed by me, the undersigned witness. The district Sundhorlen, in the Norwegian province Bergenhuus, situated near the North Sea, contains an island called Storöen, in which is to be found a fine estate with several farms. These farms have enjoyed from time immemorial certain privileges obtained by the nobility from the former kings of Norway. In fact, according to the old Norwegian chronicles, King Harald Haarfager, or 'the fair-haired,' who in the year 868 subjugated all the petty kings of Norway, had his residence on the Island of Storöen. This island possesses a harbour which is much frequented by Scotch traders, who import linen, sugar, Scotch flour, cakes, wheaten bread, and other products, for which in return they export to Scotland a large quantity of wood.

"On this island is an estate called Bieland, which is the residence of the inspector of the duties which the merchants have to pay. This is also the place where I was born, and where in my childhood not only I but also my brothers and sisters and the servants in our parents' house have seen and heard those subterranean folks, or dwarfs, who at night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, after the labourers had finished their daily work and had retired to bed, were in the habit of squatting round the hearth in the farmyard and warming their babies before the fire. These dwarfs, or whatever they may be called, used to sit down in a circle around the glimmering coals, exactly in the same manner and appearance as our little children are wont to do. Having warmed themselves, they suddenly vanished, all of them at the same time, without making the slightest noise. They did no damage nor any mischief; on the contrary, everything was preserved by them carefully and uninjured.

"Their lights, or little candles, burn quite blue and very bright. In general, their habitation is in the mountains among great cliffs of stones, or in subterranean caves, and in suchlike places.

"I have also heard, together with many other persons, their music, which consisted of playing on Jew's-harps, on the langeløeg, on fiddles, trumpets; and also of vocal music executing a peculiar song, which, however, was incomprehensible to me, and which produced rather the impression of a pastoral dance-tune indistinctly vociferated.

"Their cattle are very small, and generally of a brown colour. The dwarfs often lead their cattle out of their habitations into the valleys; but, whenever this is the case, they make themselves invisible as soon as any human being approaches them. However, there are in that neighbourhood many persons who have been permitted to visit them in their caves. But when a visitor has stayed with them four or six weeks, he is expelled from the cave, because he is unable or unwilling to perform whatever the subterranean creatures order him to do. Moreover, the persons who have been expelled are afterwards greatly excited, and their mind is affected.

"That the above statements refer to facts well-known to me, and that they contain nothing but the strict truth, I herewith attest with my signature written with my own hand. Aggerhuus, the 5th of January, 1740. C. Barth, installed major in the infantry of His Royal Majesty the King of Denmark; also Commandant of the Fort Aggerhuus, under the General Bertuch's government."

It would hardly be worth while to record the above superstitious communication had it not been accepted as an indisputable truth by the credulous General von Bertuch, and transmitted by him to Johann Mattheson. The latter thought it of sufficient interest for publication, together with Document No. 1, in a pamphlet entitled "Etwas Neues unter der Sonnen, oder das Unterirdische Klippen-Concert in Norwegen, aus glaubwürdigen Urkunden auf Begehren angezeigt von Mattheson. Hamburg: im Brachmonath, 1740, gedruckt bey seel. Thomas von Wierings Erben im güldnen A.B.C." Mattheson was too enlightened an author to believe these statements, and too shrewd an editor to intimate that his publication contained superstitious notions or delusions, perhaps amusing, but not deserving further attention. In the year 1742, Lorenz Mizler, in his "Musikalische Bibliothek," published in Leipzig, reprinted the two documents with General von Bertuch's letter, and endeavoured to prove that the witnesses must have laboured under some misconception, if they did not make intentional misstatements. He insinuates that the organist helped himself too freely out of the brandy bottle; hence his sudden swoon.

This may have been the case; who does not know the proverb cantores amant humores? At any rate, in our century it would be almost an insult to the reader to endeavour to explain stories like those here told. The Norwegian peasants are still rather superstitious. However, some of their old notions about mountain-dwarfs and giants are so childlike and naive, so poetical and fascinating, that one might feel almost sorry they should be proved unfounded, and should not be longer believed by the people in general. Very likely the cliff concert near Bergen may still be heard, wind and weather permitting, any winter night, when the requisite condition of the atmosphere, or perhaps a change in the temperature of the air, causes the delicate leaves of the fir-trees to vibrate, and when the crevices in the rocks occasion a draught; but as the simple-minded natives listen for it on Christmas Eve only, they are not likely to be aware that it may be heard at other times also.

As regards the langeløeg, which is stated to be one of the favourite musical instruments of the dwarfs, it may interest the reader to know that it is a stringed instrument which was formerly popular, and is now only occasionally to be found among the Norwegian peasantry.

THE MYSTERIOUS TRUMPET.

The natives of the Island of Madagascar have a dreadful fear of the sounds of a mysterious trumpet which are sometimes heard in a lofty mountain, called Ambòndrombé, into which the spirits of the dead are believed to go. This mountain is covered with forest on the eastern edge of the highland of the Bétsilé country; and its mysterious trumpet sounds, inexplicable to the ignorant natives, are explained by James Libree ("The Great African Island Madagascar"; London, 1880, p. 312) as follows: "The mountain consists not of one hill, as it appears at a distance, but of a large group of hills some six or seven in number, with very deep gullies between them. The gorges have a general north and south direction. The northern end of the gorges or valleys is open, but at the south three hills, or one large hill with three tops—I could not tell which—blocks up the southern end, except at the south-west corner, which is open to the west. This peculiar arrangement of an isolated block of hills is, I think, the first cause of the strange sounds which are the origin of the superstitions connected with this place. The eastern hill is one of the highest in Bétsilé, and the wind, generally easterly, rushes with furious force round the north end, and over the top into the three longitudinal valleys, out of which there is no outlet except the narrow mouth at the south-west end. In this way a natural trumpet is formed!"

In addition to this explanation the reader may be reminded that there exist several other records of invisible performers in the mountains, and of singing rocks, current in different parts of the world. Alexander von Humboldt, in his "Relation Historique" (tome vi., p. 377), mentions a rock called Piedra de Carichana Vieja, which is situated on the River Orinoco, in South America, and which emits sounds resembling those of an organ. The cause of these sounds he ascribes to the gush of air through the crevices when the sun rather suddenly changes the temperature outside the caverns.

To a similar cause may be ascribed the famous sound of the Memnon statue of the ancient Egyptians, in the Theban plain on the west bank of the Nile. The sound emanating from a colossal statue, about fifty feet in height, appears to have puzzled the ancients, to judge from the allusions to the phenomenon made by some of the classical historians. The sound was heard at sunrise. According to Pausanias, it might be compared to the effect produced by the twanging of a harp-string. Strabo, who visited the statue about the year B.C. 24, cautiously records (Book xvii., chap. 1): "When I was at those places with Aelius Gallus, and numerous friends and soldiers about him, I heard a noise at the first hour of the day; but whether proceeding from the base, or from the colossus, or produced on purpose by some of those standing round the base, I cannot confidently assert. For, from the uncertainty of the cause, I am disposed to believe anything rather than that stones placed in that manner could send forth sounds."

Again, Tacitus, about A.D. 100, mentions (in his "Annals," Book ii.), among the wonders of Egypt, "the stone statue of Memnon yielding, when struck by the solar rays, a vocal sound!"

Perhaps the rising sun, rather suddenly changing the temperature of the stone, caused a draught in a certain direction against the statue favourable for producing the sound; and if the same condition of the atmosphere existed usually at sunrise, as appears probable, it is not surprising that the statue should have made itself heard generally at daybreak.

In short, Æolian music is occasionally produced by nature unaided by the ingenuity of man. The wind passing over a hole in the hollow trunk of a tree, and vibrating the air which it contains, may produce tones much in the same way as the Pandean pipe is blown.

The Celtic poets have much to record about supernatural sounds which were often heard in Ireland. Sometimes they were soft and plaintive; at other times loud and harsh. Of course superstition ascribed them to spirits of the air, instead of the air itself. Thomson, in his "Seasons," adverts to these melancholy voices of the elements as follows:—

Along the woods, along the moorish fens,
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm;
And up among the loose disjointed cliffs
And fractur'd mountains wild, the brawling brook
And cave presageful, send a hollow moan,
Resounding long in listening Fancy's ear.

THE MUSIC OF THE SPHERES.

Pythagoras, B.C. 550, theorised about the music of the spheres—glorious Æolian sounds which, however, mortals are incapable of hearing. This fanciful conception of order and harmony in the motions of the heavenly bodies was likely to find favour with poetical minds. It is beautifully expressed by Shakespeare ("Merchant of Venice," Act v., Scene 1):—

Look, how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold:
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins;
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.

ORIENTAL ÆOLIAN MUSIC.

We arrive now at certain remarkable human contrivances invented for the purpose of aiding nature to produce Æolian music. These contrivances are of an ingenious and manifold kind, especially in Asia.

In fact, they are so numerous that only a short survey of them can be given in the present discussion.

Let us turn first to the Malay Peninsula, where the natives construct a curious instrument called bulu-pârindu (i.e. "the languishing bamboo") or bulu-ribut (i.e. "the bamboo of the storm"). This instrument consists of a bamboo cane, from thirty to forty feet in length, which is perforated with holes, and is stuck in the ground to be exposed to the wind. Mr. Logan, who during a journey in the interior of the Malay Peninsula was much surprised by the sounds of the bulu-pârindu, has given the following account of it, which is inserted in J. Crawford's "Descriptive Dictionary of the Indian Islands and Adjacent Countries": "On our right there was a succession of neat cottages amongst cocoanut trees, forming the village of Kandang. On nearing one of these, our ears were saluted by the most melodious sounds, some soft and liquid like the notes of a flute, and others full like the tone of an organ. These sounds were sometimes interrupted, or even single; but presently they would swell into a grand burst of mingled melody. I can hardly express the feelings of astonishment with which I paused to listen to and look for the source of music so wild and ravishing in such a spot. It seemed to proceed from a grove of trees at a little distance, but I could see neither musician nor instrument, and the sounds varied so much in their strength, and their origin seemed now at one place and now at another; as if they sometimes came from mid-air, and sometimes swelled from amidst the dark foliage, or hovered faint and fitful around it. On drawing nearer to the grove of trees, my companions, Malays, pointed out a slender bamboo which rose above the branches of the trees, and from which, they said, the music proceeded; and when the notes had died away in the distance, our ears were suddenly penetrated by a crash of grand and thrilling tones which seemed to grow out of the air that surrounded us instead of pursuing us. A brisk breeze which soon followed, agitating the dark and heavy leaves of the fronds of the gomuti-palms, explained the mystery, while it prolonged the powerful swell. As we went on our way, the sounds decreased in strength, and gradually became faint; but it was not until we had left the 'bamboo of the wind' far behind us, and long hidden by intervening trees and cottages, that we ceased to hear it."

According to John Cameron ("Our Tropical Possessions in Malayan India"; London, 1865, p. 120), the natives of the peninsula construct two kinds of these Æolian instruments. He says: "On a windy day, the traveller will be apprised of the vicinity of huts inhabited by the aborigines by hearing strange wailing musical notes rising and falling with the breeze. These sounds are produced by long thick pieces of bamboo split between the knots so as to resemble the cords of a harp, which they hang on the tops of the highest trees in the forest in such a position that the wind vibrates the cords as it sweeps by. In addition to these Æolian harps they make out of the smaller bamboos a number of pipes, which they string together and expose so as to be sounded by the passing wind. In strong weather, the soft wailing notes of these instruments can be heard miles off."

An English gentleman residing in Singapore records: "Two curious musical instruments were lately presented to the Museum. One is a bamboo, some thirty-five feet long, with long slits cut at intervals of eight or ten inches. This, I am told, is planted upright in the ground, where the wind can reach it, when it produces an Æolian harp sound.

The other instrument is a bamboo tube turning on a pivot, with a vane made of bamboo, and with horse-tails extending from its rear end. The vane keeps it to the wind, when, I understand, it sounds like an organ-pipe."

This may be the place to notice some curious Chinese contrivances which produce Æolian music. The merchants at Hong Kong use carrier-pigeons for the purpose of conveying news of the arrival of the English, French, or American mails to their partners in trade at Canton. To protect the pigeon during its flight from attacks of birds of prey, a whistle is attached to its tail, and the shrill sounds of this contrivance, as its bearer flies through the air, terrifies the falcons or hawks. Furthermore, the Chinese construct sound-producing arrows with which they shoot, so to say, music into the air. The point of the arrow is provided with a horn tube, which is perforated with a hole. When discharged from the bow, it, while passing through the air, produces a distinct tone. Again, the Chinese construct kites which, by means of round holes supplied with vibrating cords, produce sounds when flying through the air. J. H. Gray ("China: a History of the Laws, Manners, and Customs of the People"; London, 1878, vol. i., p. 270) says: "Chinese kites, which are without tails, are of all shapes, and resemble birds, insects, baskets of flowers, serpents, centipedes, ships, and even men. Those resembling serpents and centipedes are sometimes of enormous length. The most beautiful kite I ever saw was at Tam-sui, in Formosa, and was in the form of a catharine-wheel. The largest kites are made at Tientsin, and some of them require four or five men to hold them. In the centre of Chinese kites four or five metallic strings are fixed, on the principle of the Æolian harp. When they are flying, slow lisping notes as of the Æolian harp are distinctly heard. The legend which describes how these strings came to be used in this way is very characteristic of the people. During the reign of the emperor Low-pung, of the Han dynasty, a general who was much attached to the dynasty which had been obliged to give way before the more powerful house of Han, resolved to make a last vigorous effort to drive Low-pung from the throne he had recently usurped. A battle, however, resulted in the army of the general being hemmed in and threatened with annihilation. At his wit's end to devise a method of escape, he at last conceived the ingenious idea of frightening the enemy by flying kites, fitted with Æolian strings, over their camp in the dead of the night. The wind was favourable, and when all was wrapt in darkness and silence the forces of Low-pung heard sounds in the air resembling 'Foo-Han! Foo-Han!' ('Beware of Han! Beware of Han!') It was their guardian angels, they believed, who were warning them of impending danger, and they precipitately fled, hotly pursued by the general and his army."

Of the Stiëns, a savage tribe dwelling in the mountainous districts of Siam, Henry Mouhot ("Travels in the Central Parts of Indo-China"; London, 1864, vol. i., p. 254) remarks: "One of their favourite amusements is to send up kites, to which they attach a musical instrument somewhat resembling a bow; and this, when agitated by the wind, produces sweet and melodious sounds, to which they are fond of listening."

The oriental Æolian contrivances which have just been noticed are, as the reader will have observed, of two classes, viz., stringed instruments and wind instruments; or, in other words, the sound is produced either by the vibration of one or more strings, or it is produced by the vibration of the air in a tube resembling a flute or a trumpet. Some oriental nations, however, construct also Æolian instruments of percussion, of which some notice requires to be taken here.

The South Kensington Museum possesses a Japanese instrument of percussion which contains twelve leaves of white metal, gilt. The frame in which these leaves or thin plates are suspended is of copper, and is ornamented with silken tassels. When the instrument is exposed to the wind, the leaves are caused to touch each other, whereby silvery and remarkably pure sounds are produced, continually changing in the degree of loudness according to the greater or less force of the percussion.

Small bells, which sound when they are exposed to the wind, are commonly suspended from the roofs or projections of the Buddhist temples in Burmah, Nepal, China, and other Asiatic countries. These bells are provided with clappers, which terminate in a thin plate shaped somewhat like the ace of hearts. A moderate current of air is sufficient to cause the bells to ring. Sometimes a large number of these bells are attached to the roof of a temple, and as they are of different sizes and dimensions, different tones are produced. A pagoda in the vicinity of Shanghai, in China, has sixty-four bells of this description; and the famous Porcelain Tower at Nankin has (or had formerly) an iron spire, from the summit of which are suspended eight chains, each having nine bells attached to it; and there is, besides, a bell hanging at each angle of the lower roofs, making in all 144 bells. When the wind rises and the tinkling of the bells is heard, the priests say that it is the tribute of praise to Buddha from inanimate nature.

DR. FERDINAND HILLER, in a letter published by the Leipzig Signale, makes a common-sense proposal to his German brethren in the art intended to remove a time-honoured anomaly in the German denomination of the notes of the diatonic scale. According to the existing system, the German pupil is told that, while employing the letters of the alphabet in naming his scale, their regular succession is to be altered from A B C, &c., to A H C D E F G, the missing B being used to indicate the semitone below the H. If the puzzled pupil inquire the reason for this, as it appears to him, absurd transposition, he is treated to a necessarily abstruse historical explanation with which he has no practical concern, and it is by the force of habit alone that he becomes reconciled to the anomaly. There is, of course, no plausible reason for changing the alphabetical denomination in favour of the ut re mi, &c., of solmisation adopted by all Latin races, which would moreover do away with an undoubted advantage possessed by the German system, where the alteration of notes by sharps and flats is indicated by the simple means of adding the syllables is and es respectively to the alphabetical letters—the German B flat being the only exception to this rule. Dr. Hiller now makes the obvious suggestion to his countrymen that the regular alphabetical order should be restored in naming the notes of the diatonic scale, thereby following the example of England and Holland in the matter—i.e., substituting B for H, and, in accordance with the above rule, Bes for the note now called B. We shall be surprised if Dr. Hiller has not been merely the spokesman of German practical musicians generally, and if at any rate the great majority of them are not willing to sacrifice the historic tradition of the subject for the sake of simplicity and rationality. At the same time it must be remembered that Dr. Hiller's proposal is not a new one, and was indeed already made some eighty-five years ago by one Schwanenberg, who published a pamphlet on the matter. It is tolerably certain, therefore, that theorists will again raise their voices against the desired improvement, as they did then; whilst reforms, however slight, of any deeply rooted system, difficult to carry out as they are at all times, would seem to be peculiarly so when touching upon the domain of musical theory.

ASSUREDLY those persons who are desirous of cultivating music without the expense and trouble of going through the usual course of study under an accredited professor need not wait long for the opportunity. Every newspaper informs us that there are innumerable teachers, quite unknown to the world, and appearing only under initials, who are the lucky possessors of a method by which, in two or three months, anybody can become an accomplished musician; and only a few days since, in one journal, we read two advertisements announcing that pupils might be initiated into the mysteries of what has been so long considered a difficult art by "an easy and rapid process," for sixpence a lesson. Many "royal roads" to the study have also been invented, the broad principle of which appears to be founded upon that of the almanacs, which, if you will only set them every morning, will tell you at once the day of the month. But the most extraordinary advertisement we have yet seen on this subject is one which recently met our eye in the window of a suburban shop—"Music taught by Electricity." Here, indeed, is a riddle which no doubt our readers, like ourselves, will endeavour to guess. Does the master, by a system of "electro-biology," place the pupil so en rapport with himself that he can feel as he feels, and act as he acts, without the trouble of imparting instruction at all? Or, by telegraphing from the house of a professor to that of a student, can an artist "wire" his lessons for miles around him without moving from his arm-chair? The matter is indeed surrounded with mystery at present, but it is good to know that such things are; for without such information might not an examiner of the future be astounded when, after passing a student with honours, he is told that he has gained his musical knowledge by "electricity."

ALL persons engaged in teaching music, whether instrumental or vocal, have long felt that the endeavour to make a pupil understand the construction of one scale when another is denoted by the signature is almost a hopeless task. Many eminent theorists—Professor Macfarren amongst the number—have told us that the system of writing the minor scale as it is not played has led to a very large amount of confusion, and we now find that Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. B., has recently treated upon this subject in a paper read at Trinity College, London. Truly he says: "A key-signature, to be of any use at all, must represent the scale in which the composition is written, and unless this is the case it is a positive hindrance to the performer." It may be historically interesting to know that the minor scale grew from its "relative" major; but with the raised seventh the affinity between the two ceases, and students should unquestionably now be taught to couple a minor with its tonic, and not its relative, major. Let any musician who doubts this play the opening Grave movement of Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique" and note the fact of every B remaining natural until the modulation into E flat takes place. Surely this is sufficient to prove that the signature of C minor should be two and not three flats, the true accidental being B flat. Mr. Stark says he has "heard that some few works were actually printed with the leading note of the minor scale properly expressed in the signature." We have seen them, and can affirm that they are three times as easy to read as those noted on the present system. It may be that examiners like to ask such a question as "What scale contains B flat and C sharp?" but were these two notes at the signature (as they appeared in one of the pieces we have mentioned) there could be no particular merit in replying correctly.

WE have no great desire to exalt the drum beyond its legitimate position amongst the instruments of percussion—Sterndale Bennett used to say that if you will only treat it like a gentleman you may always rely upon its sympathy—but, whatever may be its true place in the orchestra, there can be little doubt of its paramount importance in a military band. To "follow the drum" many of the young labourers in an English village have often exchanged their rural pursuits for the more exciting life of a soldier; and on the field of battle numerous deeds of valour have been stimulated by the inspiring roll of the side-drum. Strangely enough, however, in France, where for so many years the drum held the highest position as an incitement to military glory, it has for some time been prohibited. With the people as well as the soldiers this was by no means a popular movement; and although the wind-instrument players did their best under the circumstances to compensate for the loss of so essential an element in the effect of their music upon the listeners, the result was never satisfactory. As might be expected, therefore, in a nation so essentially military as France, the instrument is to be restored; and we are told that in the barracks and canteens preparations are being made to welcome its return with all possible festivity. Apart from the excitement invariably caused by the manipulation of the drum by experienced hands in a military band, there can scarcely be two opinions on its value in ensuring steady marching on a journey. We may hope for the day when important national questions shall cease to be decided by an appeal to arms; but as long as soldiers march to battle there must be military bands, and as long as there are military bands there must be drums.

"PARSIFAL" AT BAYREUTH.

(BY TELEGRAPH.)

Bayreuth, July 27.
WAGNER's new music-drama was produced last night in a most successful manner. A crowd of "patrons" filled the theatre, and among the distinguished persons in the Fürsten-Gallerie was the Duchess of Edinburgh. King Ludwig did not attend on this occasion, but will do so later. Abbé Liszt was present. The performance could hardly have been better; the male chorus alone, by uncertain intonation, giving cause for unfavourable criticism. The female chorus was excellent, and the orchestra splendid, acquitting itself of a difficult task in a manner that called for the highest admiration. Among the principal artists the chief honours were carried off by Frau Materna and Herr Hill. Frau Materna equalled, if she did not surpass, the triumph of 1876. Her Kundry is a magnificent conception of an extraordinary character, and crowns the edifice of her fame. The well-known talent of Herr Hill had ample scope for striking display, while the other artists—Winkelmann, Reichmann, Kindermann and Scaria—contributed, each in his degree, to the success achieved. The elaborate scenic effects left nothing to desire, and it may be said for all concerned in the representation—the conductor, Herr Levi, first and foremost—that they well deserved the thanks which, at the instance of Wagner, were awarded by the audience.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

It would be unfair to sit in judgment upon the new works in the programme of the approaching Birmingham Festival before they have been fully revealed in performance, and we have no intention of committing the offence. At the same time widespread curiosity prevails among amateurs with regard to the more important compositions. It is the plain duty of a musical journal to take note of this, and gratify it as far as may be done without the risk of injustice to anybody concerned. Unhappily, we must keep silence perforce as regards some of the novelties forthcoming. Sir Julius Benedict's "Graziella" is not yet printed, if, indeed, the MS. be completed; while of Mr. Stanford's Orchestral Serenade and Mr. Parry's Symphony nothing is known save the babblings of rumour. On the other hand, M. Gounod's "Redemption," Herr Gade's "Psyche," and Mr. Gaul's "Holy City," are available for our purpose, and these we propose to notice, not critically, but with a view to a general idea of their scope and character.

In the early advertisements of the Festival it was said that the French master's Oratorio had been composed specially for the great Midland solemnity. The statement, however, sprang from a misapprehension, the fact being that M. Gounod began his "Redemption" more than ten years ago, and, there is reason to believe, without having any particular occasion in view. Resident in England, he naturally desired to contribute to the repertory of oratorio, and place himself in the most favourable position a composer can occupy where sacred music holds the highest rank. About five years have passed since the committee of a festival proposed to be held in Glasgow opened negotiations with M. Gounod for a sacred work to be conducted by himself, and the "Redemption" was tendered on the one side and accepted on the other. It must, therefore, have been in a forward, if not a finished state at the time; only matters independent of the Oratorio preventing its being heard in the great Scottish town. The circumstances destined to connect it with Birmingham followed in due course, and are too well known for recapitulation. Enough that the "Redemption," for which an unexampled sum has been paid to the composer, and the dedication of which Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to accept, will make its début under conditions most favourable to the fair and candid judgment that will be passed upon it. M. Gounod, who prepared his own libretto, has divided the "argument" into three parts, with a Prologue which describes, by means of an orchestral introduction, the moving of the Spirit of God upon the waters of a world without form and void; refers, through the mouth of a Narrator, to man's original state, and his fall therefrom; and ends with the promise of a Redeemer. These essential premises laid down, the act of Redemption is taken up in the first part, at the point immediately preceding our Lord's crucifixion. Thenceforward the tragedy of Calvary, with many of the connected incidents, engrosses attention; the chorus occasionally interposing pious commentary after the manner of a "Passions-Musik." Thus come in order the scourging, march to Calvary, blaspheming, prayer of the Christ for His enemies, episode of the two thieves, committal of the Virgin Mother to the care of John, the darkness and earthquake, the death, and the centurion's confession. The second part deals with the visit of the women to the sepulchre, their meeting with the risen Lord, the bribing of the soldiers by the priests and elders, the appearance of Christ to His disciples, the injunction to preach the Gospel, and the ascension into heaven. Finally, we have in the third part the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles, their renewed mission, and a summary of the gracious tidings it is their duty to convey. Even this slight outline serves to show with what logical completeness M. Gounod has set forth his subject. Nothing is wanting to the sublime story, nor does the language in which it is told fall short of the dignity and solemnity of the theme. We may add that an English text has been supplied by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, M.A., who deserves congratulation upon the care he has taken to introduce as many Biblical phrases as possible, and upon the general success with which he has discharged a difficult task. In laying out his text for music, M. Gounod provided for liberal, though not too abundant, employment of the chorus, which is heard on some twenty distinct occasions. On the other hand solos in the form of airs are exceedingly few, the principal voices being used either for narrative (tenor and bass), or for the words of persons, as those of Christ, the Virgin, the Two Thieves, the Holy Women, &c. By far the largest share is given to the Narrators, upon whose music M. Gounod has lavished immense pains in order to make it something quite distinctive. None of those pains have been wasted. The narrative arrests and holds attention by the sustained elevation and uncompromising dignity of the means through which it is conveyed. Here we must stop, lest the interest of the subject lead us to anticipate what can be better said after the performance has taken place. Enough if we hazard a guess at the final verdict, and venture to foretell that the new Oratorio will achieve a genuine success on the strength of its noble character, profound and just expression, and unshrinking loyalty to the most exacting of subjects.

Herr Gade's Cantata "Psyche," written at the invitation of the Birmingham Committee, and dedicated by permission to the composer's countrywoman, H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, is a setting of a Danish poem by Lobedanz, and deals, we need hardly say, with the classic legend of the maid whom Cupid loved and Jove endowed with immortality. There are several versions of the story, but the one adopted by Lobedanz has the merit of simplicity and freedom from aught calculated to give pain or offence. This will appear as we sketch the "argument." A Prologue tells, in chorus, that Psyche, having offended Venus by laying no offering on her altar, has been condemned by the goddess to dwell on a lonely rock, where a demon shall demand her for wife, and "fold her in fearful embrace, cold as ice." At the opening of the first part Psyche, on her rock, expresses terror at the fate in store, and is comforted by Zephyr and the Genii, who speak of a gracious mission on her behalf. Then Eros approaches with wooing words. They plight their troth, on the understanding that the bride shall never ask who the bridegroom is, and an invisible chorus invokes night to conceal the lovers' joy. In the second part the attendant spirits comfort Psyche during the absence of Eros, but her dread of Venus is too strong—too strong even for prudence, since she at length puts the forbidden question. By this transgression she has incurred the penalty of death, and the remainder of the part is occupied by her pleadings for forgiveness, by the lamentations of Eros and the spirits over her inevitable doom, and by the resolve of the god to appeal to Zeus. The action of Part III. takes place in Hades. Psyche there meets Proserpine, and is counselled by her to drown the memory of her love in the waters of Lethe. But Psyche begs permission to return to earth in order to seek forgiveness for her fault, and at length the request is granted. When the last part opens, Psyche and Eros are together in the realms of air. She has been pardoned, and would cheerfully return to Hades, but Eros tells her that their destination is the heaven of Zeus, where presently they arrive, to spend in happiness an everlasting youth. Herr Gade's setting of this story, so well adapted for musical expression, is distinguished by characteristics perfectly well known. The Danish composer has not sought to strike out a new path, but remains what he was when first his genius made his name familiar. There is in "Psyche" the same devotion to the graceful and beautiful characteristics of the Mendelssohn school, the same wealth of vocal melody, and the same easy, natural utterance which have charmed in connection with other works from his pen. We may therefore anticipate a welcome for "Psyche" at Birmingham, doing so none the less confidently because Herr Gade has followed the plan, now somewhat old-fashioned, of writing really singable music for artists who are something more than declaimers.

Mr. Alfred R. Gaul's "Holy City," composed—like "Psyche"—for the Festival, and dedicated to the Orchestral Committee, is a sacred Cantata in two parts, with a text almost entirely scriptural. It is avowedly reflective in character, not dramatic. "The first part of the 'Holy City,'" says the composer in a short preface, "was suggested by the passages of Scripture, 'Here we have no continuing city,' and 'Thy Kingdom come,' and sets forth the desire for a higher life, as expressed in the words, 'My soul is athirst for God,' which desire is followed by other passages expressive of the perfection of the higher life, such as 'Eye hath not seen.' The second part was suggested by the words, 'I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away,' thus realising the desire and promises contained in the first part." To this we shall add but little as regards the music. Mr. Gaul, well and favourably known by his part-songs, has never, we believe, essayed an important work at a festival, and it would be imprudent here to run even the smallest risk of misrepresenting him. A great deal depends, in such a Cantata, upon that which is not visible on the pages of the pianoforte score. Let it suffice to state, then, that as far as can be seen the music has features which should predispose amateurs to a sympathetic hearing. The choruses are well and solidly written, and the airs suggest to the trained eye good effects independent of the vocal melody.

With these general remarks we leave the Birmingham novelties to the fate awaiting them, and do so in confident hope of a favourable result.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MANY of our readers will doubtless wish to hear something of M. Lenepveu, whose Opera "Velleda" was produced at this establishment on the 4th ult.; and—more especially as they are not likely to hear anything of him again—we may mention that he studied under M. Ambroise Thomas at the Paris Conservatoire, where he is now a Professor of Harmony, and that he has written also a comic opera, which was performed in Paris with but little success. It is no secret, we believe, that Madame Patti thinks highly of "Velleda"; but although she had the power to bring it before the public, we are glad to find that she had no power to keep it there, for after two representations it was withdrawn. Earnest criticism is assuredly uncalled for upon such a work; but, considering that it was the sole novelty in Mr. Gye's prospectus, a few words upon its characteristics seem absolutely necessary in a record of the season. The scene of the Opera is laid in Gaul. Velleda, a Druidic priestess, is beloved by Teuter, a Gallic chieftain; but she has bestowed her affections upon Cælius, a Roman General, who is also in love with her. Cælius has an attendant, Even, a woman in male attire, who is secretly in love with him; but, discovering his passion for Velleda, she betrays him into the hands of the Gauls; Velleda, in despair, plunges a dagger into her side, and Cælius also stabbing himself, they die together. This melancholy story has appropriately melancholy music to illustrate it; and it may be truly said that there are many portions of the work which deserve commendation, but the want of contrast, and the extraordinary mixture of styles throughout the Opera render it positively wearisome, even to the many who are content with mere vocal display. Reminiscences of Meyerbeer and Gounod abound, with occasional concerted pieces recalling Verdi in his ultra-dramatic mood; but, to prove that the composer is universal in his taste, at the end of the third act we have a positive fugue—not with any profound development, it is true, but still a fugue—and this brings the curtain down, to the surprise of an audience gradually getting accustomed to declamation and crude orchestral effect, relieved only by transient gleams of melody. The singing of Madame Patti in the principal part was superb; and Signor Nicolini, as the Roman General, gave the whole of his music with excellent intention, but scarcely with a due appreciation of the varied shades of expression. Madame Stahl, as Even, was fairly successful in the declamatory portions of her part; Madame Valleria was, as usual, highly satisfactory; and Signori De Reske and Cotogni were efficient representatives of the parts of Sénon and Teuter respectively. The floral offerings to Madame Patti exceeded, both in quantity and quality, those usually accorded to the prima donna; and, as such prizes are still considered proofs of success at an Italian opera house, we can only say that they were fully deserved. The Opera was carefully conducted by M. Dupont.

Boito's "Mefistofele," produced on the 11th ult. for the first time at this establishment, was an unqualified success. In every respect the work has been placed upon the stage in a manner fully worthy of its claims; and both the singing and acting of Madame Albani in the parts of Margherita and Elena can scarcely be overpraised. The death scene of Margherita was a perfect triumph, and in the second part the duet between Elena and Faust, "Ah, amore misterio!" was received with applause as warm as it was thoroughly well deserved, the popular serenata "La Luna immobile" (in association with Mdle. Tremelli) being enthusiastically encored. The Faust of Signor Mierzwinsky was in parts extremely good; but much of his vocalisation is marred by the too frequent use of the portamento, and his intonation is also occasionally faulty. M. Gailhard, although not to be compared with Signor Nannetti in the part of Mefistofele, gave many portions of the difficult, and even eccentric, music with good dramatic effect, his acting throughout the Opera being perhaps better than his singing. Praise must be awarded to Signor Corsi for his rendering of the small part of Wagner; and every credit is due to the management for the excellence of the scenery and the whole of the stage arrangements. The work was judiciously conducted by Signor Bevignani. The season terminated on the 22nd ult., both Madame Albani and Madame Patti having had their usual "gala night," whatever that may mean.

HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

ALTHOUGH the Society so long and favourably known as Henry Leslie's Choir dissolved itself some time ago, few were surprised at rumours of a reorganisation. The public saw from the first that a mistake had been made, and a portion of the press was not slow to say as much in plain terms. Thus an expectation of better counsel and wiser resolve was kept alive, and in due time events justified it. Preliminary steps towards the revival of the Choir were taken at the close of last season—Mr. Leslie himself, we believe, playing an active part in the search for a professor qualified, not only to succeed him as a Conductor, but able, on other grounds, to command the respect and confidence of the members. After some consideration on both sides an agreement was come to with Mr. Alberto Randegger, the understanding being that the Choir should retain its old name, and have its old chief as President. This settled, practice was resumed, and the famous association came again into active life. No doubt for good reasons it was resolved to give only one Concert during the season of 1882, that being sufficient to signalise the resurrection, and secure the attention of the public to a prospect of larger work next year, when Conductor and singers will know each other better. The performance in question took place at St. James's Hall on the 4th ult., and was well attended, albeit the programme contained only one novelty—a Part-song written by Mr. Leslie specially for the occasion. On the other hand, the familiar pieces were all favourites, and included such ever-welcome things as Wesley's splendid Motett, "In exitu Israel," Sterndale Bennett's "Come live with me," Sullivan's "O hush thee, my babe," Morley's "My bonnie lass," Barnby's "Sweet and low," and Macfarren's "Sands of Dee." The rendering of these works showed that the Choir had regained whatever excellence it may have lost during the interregnum, and encouraged a hope that its old character will be fully sustained under the new conditions. In one respect a decided improvement might be made by Mr. Randegger. The singing under Mr. Leslie was marked by a refinement so elaborated and by devices so measured as to make the effect somewhat mechanical. We refer especially to the abuse of the crescendo and sforzando, which were employed with tiresome frequency, and often with exasperating regularity. Mr. Randegger will do well to encourage a style less artificial, the more because such resources as those named lose half their value when drawn upon indiscriminately. Besides the new Part-song, Mr. Leslie was represented in the programme by his "Lullaby of Life," and the first had the advantage of the composer's direction. That the President of the Choir met with a hearty greeting need not be said. The soloists who appeared were Miss Orridge, Mr. Maas, and M. Adolf Brousil (violoncello). Miss Orridge sang Cowen's "The Unfinished Song," and a scena from the "Alexis" of Dr. Pepusch, for the revival of which she deserves thanks from every laudator temporis acti. Mr. Maas contributed songs by Bishop and Leslie, and finally the two singers were heard together in Randerger's "Mille volte." The new Conductor fully satisfied the expectations of those who looked for a skilful discharge of responsible duties.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE second Concert of the season was given at St. James's Hall on June 29, before a thoroughly appreciative audience. The principal work in the programme was one of much interest; for, although Heinrich Hofmann's compositions are gradually becoming popularised in this country, the one selected on this occasion—the beautiful Cantata "Cinderella"—had never before been performed in England with an orchestra. The delicacy and refinement of the music in this work remind us strongly of Mendelssohn, although there is not a tinge of plagiarism throughout; and there can be little doubt that, having now been placed before the public with all the charming instrumental effects which form so essential a portion of the Cantata, "Cinderella" will be accorded as warm a welcome as "The Legend of the Fair Melusina" has already received. Apart from the solo portions in this work, always melodious and fanciful, the contrast of style in the choruses is a decided feature—those for the Fairies and Spirits and those in the castle of the King having marked and definite characteristics which sufficiently evidence the instinctive dramatic power of the composer. The principal vocalists—Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Minna Vivian, and Mr. J. Spooner Hardy—gave a good rendering of the music allotted to them; the choir showed ample proofs of excellent training, and, with a few more rehearsals, the band would no doubt have been everything that could be desired. Another feature in the Concert was the fine rendering of Ferdinand David's Violin Concerto in E minor by Miss Emily Shinner, a pupil of Herr Joachim. This young lady, who comes before us unheralded by preliminary announcements, is unquestionably destined to occupy a distinguished position in the profession she has chosen. Not only her technical knowledge of the instrument, but the higher faculties of precision of accent, purity of style, and intelligent appreciation of the meaning of the composer, were apparent throughout her performance, and she was greeted with warm and well-deserved applause. The Concert, which commenced with Spontini's Overture "Olympe," was ably conducted by Mr. Barnby.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN orchestral Concert by the pupils of this institution was given in St. James's Hall on June 28, before a large audience. A Pastoral Overture by Mr. John Cullen, and an Overture by Mr. G. E. West—both excellent specimens of students' workmanship—were received with warm and well-deserved applause; but keen interest was awakened by the performance of a Credo by Mr. G. J. Bennett, because on many former occasions he has, by some compositions of exceptional promise, evinced the possession of a creative faculty, in addition to the power of using voices and orchestra with skill and judgment. The work presented on this occasion is far beyond anything he has yet attempted, for not only has he deepened the purport of the sacred words by a sympathetic expression, but his instrumental colouring materially aids their effect, and he has the good taste never to obtrude his technical knowledge at the expense of the design of his composition. A bright future is, indeed, before Mr. Bennett if he has only the good sense to bear with, and profit by, the success he has so legitimately earned. Mr. Jewson's new Pianoforte Concerto, excellently played by Miss Dinah Shapley, is a work which reflects much credit upon its composer, who received his training at the institution in connection with which he now appropriately brings forward his latest novelty. As a specimen of good, solid writing the Concerto should take high rank, and will, no doubt, shortly be heard outside the students' concert-room. Mention must also be made of the remarkably good performance of the Romanza and Allegro assai from Mozart's Concerto in D minor by Miss Beatrice Davenport (who introduced a clever and appropriate cadenza of her own composition); the excellent rendering of the Allegro con maestria from Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor by Mr. Arthur Dace; and the effective playing of two movements of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat by Miss Ellis; Mr. Frank Arnold displaying the result of the good violin teaching at the Academy in an Andante and Scherzo capriccioso by Ferdinand David. The solo vocalists were Miss Thudichum, Miss Kate Bentley, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Courtice Pounds, all of whom showed the effect of sound training; Miss Thudichum, especially, giving evidence of rapid improvement since we last heard her. The Concert was ably conducted by Mr. Shakespeare.

ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF MUSIC FOR THE BLIND.

IT was said with regard to the advent of the Light of the World: "I work a work in your days, which ye will in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you." With no irreverence do we quote these Divine words as almost applicable to the noble institution named at the head of this article, in recording the recent performances by the pupils, at Windsor Castle and Guildhall. The results achieved under the admirable management and efficient professorship of the College are such as far exceed, not only the hopeful expectations of those who in simple earnestness commenced the work, but almost the credence of those not acquainted with its operations. Her Majesty the Queen, however, with her usual kindly interest in all that concerns the welfare of her subjects, commanded that a Concert should be given at Windsor, on June 24, to exhibit the results of the tuition which has for ten years been in progress at Upper Norwood. On the following Saturday, moreover, the same programme, with some additions, was repeated at Guildhall, by kind permission of the Corporation of the City of London, on the occasion of the annual Prize Festival of the College. We give the programme entire: Madrigal, "All creatures now are merry," 1601 (John Benet); Concerto, Pianoforte and Orchestra, in A, Op. 54 (Schumann), Master Alfred Hollins; Toggengurg, Op. 76 (Rheinberger), Miss Hyde, Miss Reece, Miss Campbell, Miss Carson, Mr. A. Wilmot, Mr. J. West, with choir and orchestra; Rondo for two pianos, in C, Op. 73 (Chopin), Miss Gilbert and Miss Inskip; Madrigals, (a) "The Silver Swan" (Gibbons), (b) "Fire! Fire!" (Morley); Concertstück, Pianoforte and Orchestra (Weber), Mr. W. F. Schvier; Motett, "Hear my Prayer" (Mendelssohn), soprano solo and chorus.

The small but efficient orchestra engaged for the occasion was conducted by Mr. A. Manns, whose repeated services and unremitting interest have earned the warmest gratitude of the supporters of the College. There were two exceptions, however, the Toggengurg and the Motett, which were performed under the direction of Mr. W. H. Cummings, the esteemed Professor of Singing in the institution.

The Concerto of Schumann makes no small demand on the performer, and it is a high testimony to the ability of Master Hollins, and to the admirable instruction of his master, Mr. Fritz Hartvigson, to say that he accomplished his task in such a manner as to represent the work not only intelligibly, but intelligently. Mr. Schvier's performance of the Concertstück was marked by much refinement of perception—indeed, we would take this opportunity of saying to pianoforte students in general, how much they might learn from these, their fellow-students, whose drawback they may feel inclined to commiserate, as to the non-necessity of the pernicious habit of constantly looking at the keyboard and the hands. The Rondo of Chopin was intended to be omitted at Windsor Castle, from a loyal desire not to weary Her Majesty. But the loyalty met with a royal recognition: for the Queen graciously insisted upon its performance, even after the National Anthem had been sung, emphatically declaring that the Concert was too short, rather than too long. The performance itself was neat, refined, and remarkable for mutual understanding. Rheinberger's "Toggengurg" afforded opportunity to the soloists to exhibit, not only excellent voices, but great intelligence and admirable training. The solo part in Mendelssohn's Motett was sung by Miss Amelia Campbell with exquisitely sympathetic simplicity, and the choral singing was marked by a singularly keen sense of the inter-relationship of the various parts. An opportunity was afforded, at Windsor Castle, of exhibiting the special aptitude and the admirable training of the pupils in this matter, as well as of illustrating the adaptability of the "Braille" notation (so called after its inventor) to the purpose for which it was designed. A chant, simple enough in itself, was written by Mr. Henry C. Banister (the Professor of Harmony and Counterpoint in the College), and, being sent up to Dr. Campbell, the Principal, was by him instantly committed to memory, dictated to the pupils—Her Majesty meanwhile holding the MS.—punctured, and then sung, firstly to the Sol-fa syllables, and afterwards to the Gloria Patri. This whole operation, occupying but four or five minutes, was pronounced by the Queen "wonderful." At the termination of the performance Her Majesty graciously expressed, in felicitous terms, her high appreciation of the training, some results of which she had witnessed.

After the Concert at Guildhall, the prizes were distributed to the pupils by the Lady Mayoress.

The main work of the College is to establish a permanent and continuous system of training by which the blind shall be qualified for helping themselves. Music is found to be a sphere in which this is specially practicable. Experience has demonstrated beyond all contention that the blind are capable of being so trained as to become not only good vocalists, pianists, and organists, but, still further, good teachers and excellent tuners. There are, to our knowledge, students at Norwood who, in addition to their pianoforte studies, are able to play well the whole of Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas, Fugues by Bach, &c. They also pursue studies in harmony and counterpoint, and are able to analyse as well as to play. Moreover, thanks to the energy and perseverance of the Principal, Dr. Campbell, the general education is most thorough and admirable. We much regret that space will not allow of our printing the eloquent address of Canon Fleming, which was delivered at the Prize Festival at Guildhall.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ conducted a rehearsal of the Festival Choir on June 26, taking the whole of Beethoven's Mass in D, and several of the choruses in Rossini's "Moses in Egypt." The rehearsal lasted close upon four hours, and at its conclusion Mr. Hallé expressed himself pleased with the work already done by the Choir, which he considered to give promise of a very satisfactory performance in October. I understand that Gounod's "Redemption" will be taken in hand shortly, and that there is a probability of the composer himself conducting it at the Festival. At present the principal works in rehearsal are, in addition to the two above mentioned, "The Messiah," "Elijah," Haydn's "Seasons," and Wesley's "Praise of Music." Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's new work "Jason" is to be rehearsed this month. I hear that it is proposed to devote the proceeds of the Festival to the foundation of a Bristol Scholarship at the new College of Music; but I am unable to vouch for the truth of this statement.

The musical event of the month was Mr. Riseley's benefit on the 3rd ult. The enterprising Conductor of the Monday Popular Concerts made an experiment in giving two Concerts on the same day so late in the season as July, and as far as the attendance at the afternoon Concert was concerned, the experiment must be owned to have been far from successful, the large hall, which accommodates between three and four thousand people, being sparsely occupied by some eight or nine hundred. Notwithstanding this depressing circumstance, the band gave a very spirited rendering of Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas," the first item on the programme. This was followed by the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto—solo violin, Herr Richard Gompertz—in which the young violinist displayed complete mastery over his instrument, executing the most difficult passages with perfect ease and precision. Perhaps the most marked characteristic of Herr Gompertz's playing is his sympathy and purity of tone, but that he does not lack power was evinced by his rendering of the cadenza, the softest notes of which were audible in all parts of the hall. The remainder of the programme was as follows: Recitative and Air, "From mighty kings" (Handel); Overture to "Tannhäuser"; the Unfinished Symphony (Schubert); Song, "Bells in the Valley" (Weber); Handel's Largo for Violin, Harp, Organ, and String Orchestra; Song, "Tell me, my heart" (Bishop); and the Overture to "Semiramide" (Rossini); Miss Mary Davies being the vocalist.

The Hall was crowded in the evening by a particularly enthusiastic audience, and a more interesting Concert has probably rarely been heard in Bristol. The following programme was performed: Overture to "Leonora" (Beethoven); Air, "Hear ye, Israel," from "Elijah"; Concerto for organ and orchestra, in E minor (Prout); Meditation, "Ave Maria" (Gounod); March, "Alfred" (Prout); Overture to "Der Freischütz" (Weber); Overture and Ballet Music, including Soprano Solo, from Mr. C. V. Stanford's Opera "The Veiled Prophet"; Violin Solo, "Spanish Dances" (Sarasate); Song, "The Lost Chord" (Sullivan); and the Overture to "Tannhäuser." Miss Davies was again the vocalist and obtained more than one well-merited recall. Mr. Prout's Organ Concerto (organ, Mr. Riseley) which has been performed here once before, found great favour with the audience. The Overture and Ballet Music from "The Veiled Prophet" also met with a warm reception, especially the latter, with its descriptive and essentially oriental rhythm. Herr Gompertz secured a marked success in the "Spanish Dances," so much so that, in deference to the vehement and persistent recalls of the audience, Mr. Riseley obligingly suspended his rule against encores, upon which Herr Gompertz played the Bach Fugue in G minor, for violin alone, in admirable style. To judge from his performance on these two occasions, Herr Gompertz's name should ere long become as well known in London as it will be henceforth in Bristol.

The Monday Popular Concerts will be resumed in October, shortly before the commencement of the Festival, and there will probably be no music of much importance in the interim.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

It is gratifying to notice that more recognition is being gradually given to the fact that for a large class of oratorios sacred buildings are the most suitable places of performance. "The Messiah" at Christmas, and the "Passion Music" at Easter, are frequently heard in our churches, but, except at festivals held in cathedrals, it is seldom, at least in Yorkshire, that any other oratorios are performed in their entirety out of the concert-room. The success of "The Woman of Samaria" at Chester no doubt suggested its repetition at the Leeds Parish Church on the 6th ult., a large portion of this choir having assisted at the Chester Festival. On the occasion of the performance at Leeds the choir, which usually numbers from fifty to sixty voices, was augmented to one hundred, but with one exception the soloists were taken from the ordinary singers. Dr. Creser (the Organist of the church) had evidently bestowed great pains on the preparation of the work, and the result was a most impressive and fairly successful rendering, the chief blemish being the dropping of the voices in "God is a Spirit," which was sung as an unaccompanied chorus; the rest of the choruses, however, were excellently rendered, great attention being given to the gradations of tone, a very important point in this oratorio. Mr. Morton sang the bass solos carefully, Mr. Grimshaw took the tenor music, and Miss Clark was very successful with the contralto part, making a great impression in the devotional air "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out"; the treble music was divided between Masters Tomlinson and Hardaker, the latter taking the upper B flat in the interpolated air, "I will love Thee," with the greatest ease. Dr. Creser's accompaniments were irreproachable throughout, both as regards execution and taste.

Dr. Bridge's oratorio "Mount Moriah" has also been heard in a sacred building during the past month; it was sung at St. Peter's Church, Harrogate, as the anthem, on Saturday afternoon, the 8th ult.

The opening of a new organ at St. Peter's Church, Keighley, was made the occasion of some special services on June 28 and 29, and on the 1st and 4th ult. The instrument (a large three-manual by Driver and Lupton, of Keighley) was opened by Dr. Roberts, Organist of Halifax Parish Church, on June 28, when a Recital was given. The programme included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor and his Fugue in B minor, as well as Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat (No. 4). On June 29, the Halifax Parish Church Choir took the services, Dr. Roberts again presiding at the organ, when his Festival Evening Service, in G, was sung; and Sullivan's "I will mention," and Mendelssohn's "Sing to the Lord a new-made song" were given as anthems. On the 1st ult. the choir of St. Margaret's, Ilkley, gave their services; Benedict's "How great, O Lord" (St. Peter), and Elvey's "I was glad" were taken as the anthem. On the 4th ult. the choir of the Keighley Parish Church was present.

Mr. Sims Reeves appeared at the Royal Spa Concert Rooms, Harrogate, on the 20th ult., and sang four of his well-known songs with the usual result. He was assisted by the Misses Tomlinson and Mr. Charles Blagbro; Mr. Sidney Naylor was the accompanist, and Mr. R. S. Burton conducted the orchestra.

There is every indication that the coming season will be a very successful one; there are already several notices of oratorios to be performed in various towns, and of series of subscription Concerts to be given; we have also heard of the formation of more than one new vocal Society in the district.

THE GERMAN MUSICAL UNION AT ZÜRICH.

Zürich, July 17.

THE nineteenth annual meeting of the German Musical Union (der Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein) took place last week at Zürich. No place could be better adapted for such a holiday festival, for no place combines more completely the hospitable capacities of a large town with the delights of the country, its beautiful lake filling it with fresh air for those who have suffered from a long season of concerts, and opening out to the view a circle of green hills with massy mountains beyond. All that is needed to make Zürich perfect is moderately fair weather. Unfortunately the climate was never more inconstant. Rare glimpses of sunshine were interrupted by torrents of driving rain and hurricanes of wind, in such violence as to surprise even the old inhabitants of the town. With this unexpected drawback, the meeting may be pronounced to have been a decided success. The conditions of the Union admit only the compositions of living musicians, with the single exception of the organ concert. Accordingly one has to apply a very different standard of criticism to that, for instance, which would be demanded by the Musical Festivals of the Lower Rhine or of England. When we go to the exhibition at Burlington House we try to forget that there exists such a thing as the National Gallery. And so in the present case we must not let the work of to-day suffer by comparison with the colossal productions of the past. On the other hand, it is imprudent to let the enthusiasm of the moment altogether get the better of us. These remarks are rendered necessary by the perhaps too exhilarating presence of the Abbé Liszt, who came to illuminate the Zürich congress. Certainly the last thing which the veteran would approve is the indiscriminate laudation poured upon his music, to the exclusion of every one else except Wagner. Six Concerts were to be given. One was entirely devoted to Liszt's "Saint Elisabeth," and the other five contained no less than ten compositions by the same master. The heartiest of his admirers must think this number excessive. From any point of view it is disproportionate to the inclusion of three pieces of Brahms or, let us say, to one of Wagner. But, whatever opinion we may have as to the selection of the programmes, there cannot be any question that the performances deserve unqualified praise. To Herr Fritz Hegar, the Zürich capellmeister, the chief honour is due, not only for the admirable manner in which he conducted, but also for the high degree of proficiency to which he had trained the local choirs, the Zürich Choir and the "Harmonie" Choral Union. Only once in the entire series of Concerts did we detect a serious failure in attack, and this was instantly controlled and remedied by the prompt bâton of the conductor. In one Concert Herr Hegar appeared also as the composer of an unpretending but scholarly piece for baritone solo and male chorus, called "Das Abendmahl" (Op. 5). The efforts of the conductor and choir were ably seconded by a mixed orchestra, formed out of that of the Zürich Concert Society (the Tonhalle-Gesellschaft), with thirty members of the royal capelle at Stuttgart and several select performers from Karlsruhe.

The two principal works upon which these forces were combined were the "Saint Elisabeth," of Liszt, and the great Mass (Op. 15) of Albert Becker. The former was produced on Sunday, the 9th. However striking in certain parts, the general impression of the Oratorio is that it lacks inspiration. In the solo portions there is a want of dignity equally with a want of genuine pathos. The choruses, indeed, contain much bold and effective writing: the chorus of crusaders is certainly one of Liszt's masterpieces, in spite of the poor treatment of the opening motive; and the touching chorus of angels accompanying the death of the Saint was received with rapturous enthusiasm by the crowded audience. But it remains very questionable whether the work has in it the elements of permanent popularity. The part of Saint Elisabeth was well sustained by Fräulein Marie Breidenstein, of Erfurt, and that of her husband, the Landgrave Ludwig, magnificently by Herr Staudigl, of Karlsruhe. Herr Burgmeier, of Aarau, also did good service by his powerful, if sometimes inaccurate, bass. Professor Becker's Mass, which was given at the second Concert, is a distinctly remarkable production. The composer has applied the contrapuntal principles which he mastered under the guidance of the learned S. W. Dehn to the creation of a work of the greatest solidity and rich elaboration. He has conceived the Mass, to a certain extent, in a new way, admitting no absolute solo pieces, and only occasionally interrupting the chorus by a solo quartet. The congregational effect, as opposed to that of a Concert hereby produced is kept up by the frequent introduction of choral melodies into the accompaniment of organ or orchestra, or into the counterpoint of the vocal subject. A composer of the present day can hardly hope to be entirely original. In the present case the treatment of the Gloria suggests Haydn; the Et incarnatus est and Agnus Dei have analogies in the great Mass of Bach. There is a conventionality about the ascending scales of the Resurrexit and the thunders of the Judgment. Elsewhere Herr Becker goes to work very independently, as when he announces the theme of the Et incarnatus on the organ solo, to be taken up by oboe, and then by bassoon, before the whole orchestra and choir join. In the Creed there is perhaps some want of earnestness—e.g., in the treatment of the Passion—but the whole is given a striking unity by the adoption of the same subject, just raised from the traditional intonation, for the beginning of the Creed, the article of the Holy Ghost, and that of the Catholic Church. The Et expecto opens finely with drum and a quiver of the strings, but leads into a lyrical Et vitam quite unworthy of the rest of the work and by no means redeemed by the spasmodic and noisy passages ending the Creed. In the concluding portions we doubt if the Osanna gains by the accompaniment of a harp, or if the Benedictus would not be more artistic without the florid cadenza. The work, however, must be judged as a whole, and it could not have had a better opportunity than on this occasion, when the performance was throughout excellent. The solo quartet was formed by Fräulein Breidenstein and Herr Staudigl, already mentioned; Frau Müller-Swiatkowsky, of Moscow, and Herr Dierich, of Leipzig, taking the intermediate parts.

Of the other Concerts the most interesting features are as follows. Brahms's "Nänie" was finely given on the 10th, and portions of Saint-Saëns' "La Lyre et la Harpe" on the 12th, the latter under the direction of the composer. M. Saint-Saëns also appeared in his unrivalled capacity as an organist on the 11th; but although this Concert, given in the old Minster of the town, admitted the works of classical masters, M. Saint-Saëns was only called upon to play the "Propheten-Fantasie" of Liszt, which cannot be considered as in the least congenial to the instrument. Much the same may be said of the rest of the organ-concert. Bach's great Fantasia and Fugue in G minor was indeed included, but played without force or sympathy. Besides this the programme contained chiefly small pieces of chamber-music and songs with organ accompaniment. The great instrument to which the Concert was dedicated was most imperfectly represented, and it would be no kindness to the German and Swiss organists to report their names, since style and execution were alike painfully defective.

Two new orchestral works were produced on the 12th, under the guidance of their composers—Herr Ludwig Deppe's overture to "Don Carlos" and portions of Herr Edgar Munzinger's symphony "Nero." Neither can be described as important, though the latter has some interesting passages. Herr Eugène Ysaye, of Liège, also played one of Wieniawski's Concertos. This talented executant does not appear likely to outgrow for some time the faults inevitable in a certain stage of development, when execution and display are everything, taste and sensitiveness nothing. As, however, M. Ysaye is extremely self-conscious, it is needless to say that he was very warmly received and vociferously applauded. The Concert concluded with Hans Huber's Tell Symphony.

A singularly good quartet party was formed by the eminent violoncellist Friedrich Grützmacher, of Dresden, and Concertmeister Heckmann, with two colleagues from Cologne. They played, on the 11th, Raff's D minor Quartet and two enchanting pieces of Tschaiakowsky. Vocal quartets were supplied in a not very interesting "cycle" from Omar Khayyam, by August Riedel, sung by Fräulein Odrich, of Aix-la-Chapelle, Herr Burgmeier, and Professor and Frau Müller, of Moscow—the last two being distinguished equally by the training and the natural qualities of their voices above the others. Another quartet, by Brahms, was sung on the morning of the 12th. Among the solo songs should certainly be mentioned some by C. Attenhofer, a Zürich composer, who has also written admirable songs for a male chorus. An opportunity for hearing these was given at the conversazione with which the proceedings opened. In conclusion, we should notice that the pianoforte element in the festival was a small one. The predominant favourite was Liszt, but among his interpreters was no less a performer than Frau Sophie Menter. At the last concert the composer himself was induced to play, in response to the repeated solicitations of the audience. The success of the whole meeting was happily completed by brilliantly fine weather on the day of the musicians' return home. The fêtes that were to have come off on previous days were instantly arranged, most of our guests thought better of their resolution, and the day was spent in expeditions up the Uetliberg and voyages round the lake.

DURING June and July numerous important meetings have been held in connection with the Royal College of Music throughout the provinces, including, among many others, Leeds, Exeter, Bristol, and Bath. There was also a large meeting at Maidstone on June 2, when the Duke of Edinburgh made a speech, and the Lord Mayor of London attended in state. On June 17 the Prince of Wales was present at a banquet at the Mansion House to meet the mayors of the United Kingdom, and in a speech his Royal Highness referred again to the strong personal interest he felt in the undertaking. A Concert was organised by Lady Folkestone at Stafford House on June 29, by permission of the Duke of Sutherland, when the large gallery was illuminated by the electric light. The Concert was extremely successful, a very interesting feature being the performance by an orchestra of young ladies, under the conductorship of Lady Folkestone. It was attended by their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and a very large and fashionable company, and produced more than £850 to the funds of the College. A Concert was to have been held at Marlborough College on the 25th ult., when their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Albany would have been present, but, unfortunately, this has been unavoidably postponed. Meetings, Concerts, &c., on behalf of the College are in progress in many places. The subscriptions, including £5,000 from the City of London, now amount to about £90,000. Among the subscriptions promised since our last announcement are: Miss Courtenay (the Frank Courtenay Scholarship), £2,500; the late National Training School for Music, per H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, £1,100; Members of the Stock Exchange, £1,002 15s.; Anonymous to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, Mr. Edward Green, Bradford, per the Mayor, Mr. John Hill (first instalment), the Drapers' Company (in five years), each £1,000; the Earl of Dysart, £500; Mr. C. M. Palmer, M.P., £300; Lancaster, per the Mayor, Mr. Samuel J. Harris, £207 2s. 6d.; Mr. W. Cater Price, Professor T. L. Donaldson, Lloyd's (per Mr. Isaac Seligman), each £105; the Earl of Ashburnham, Mr. Charles Tennant, M.P., each £100; Mr. John Noble, Mr. H. J. Chinnery, Messrs. Thomas Goode and Co., Messrs. Caldecott, Sons, and Co., the Earl of Aberdeen, each £52 10s.; Lord Ormathwaite (in two years), Miss Alice de Rothschild, Rev. Sir Frederick Ouseley (in five years), Mr. F. Fish (Mayor of Ipswich), the Duke of Cleveland, Mr. R. F. Hopwood (Mayor of Wigan,) each £50.

THE Annual Distribution of Prizes to the students of the Royal Academy of Music took place in the Concert-room on the 22nd ult., before a large assemblage of the friends of the pupils and patrons of the institution, who warmly applauded the recipients of the awards as they were presented by Lady Goldsmid, one of the kindest and most liberal supporters of the Academy. A short Concert, in which the strength of the vocal forces was well displayed, under the conductorship of Mr. William Shakespeare, was given; and, after an eloquent introductory speech from the Principal, Professor Macfarren, in which graceful allusion was made to the labours of the professors during the recent Examinations, the following prizes were awarded: the Charles Lucas Silver Medal (for the composition of the first movement of a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello), William G. Wood; the Parepa-Rosa Gold Medal (singing), Hilda Wilson; the Sterndale Bennett Prize, purse of ten guineas (pianoforte), Lilian Munster; the Llewelyn Thomas Gold Medal (for declamatory English singing), Kate Hardy; the Evill Prize, purse of ten guineas (for declamatory English singing), John G. Robertson; the Heathcote Long Prize, purse of ten guineas (pianoforte), divided between Arthur Dace and Septimus Webbe; the Santley Prize, purse of ten guineas (for accompaniment and transposition), Beatrice Davenport. Certificates of Merit, to pupils who have previously received silver medals, being the highest award of the Academy: Annie Cantelo, Alfred Izard, Frank Arnold, Walter Thomas Barker, George John Bennett. Silver Medals: Kate Bentley, Charlotte Thudichum, Hilda Wilson, Blanche Cornish, Marian Davis, Alice Dyer, Rose Goode, Evelyn Green, Kate Isaacson, Cecilia Lancelot, Emily Latter, Selina Mackness, Annie V. Mukle, Lilian Munster, Mary Bruce Sanderson, Frances Smith, Winifred Robinson, Edward Croager, George William F. Crowther, Arthur Dace, Herbert Lake, Charles S. Macpherson, Septimus Webbe, Samuel S. Wiggins, James E. Hambleton, William C. Hann, Rowland Briant, William Sewell. A large number of students were presented with bronze medals, several received commendations; a Prize Violin Bow, given by Mr. James Tubbs, was awarded to Edward J. O'Brien, and a copy of Tasso's "Gerusalemme Liberata" to Ellinor Clegg, for proficiency in the Italian language.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY introduced some clever pupils to the public at the Concert given by her on the afternoon of June 29, at the Steinway Hall, when an excellent programme was carried out by students of the Vocal Academy, established some years ago by Madame Sainton-Dolby, and over which she has presided with great advantage to young ladies making the art of singing their principal study. Several of the singers gave more than promise; for instance, Miss Hilda Coward (daughter of the late James Coward, organist of the Crystal Palace), sang with the decision and self-command of a thoroughly trained artist; her rendering of the Romanza "Morire" (Guido Papini) being replete with natural and acquired charm; Miss Amy Carter, in an excerpt from "Solomon," displayed a fine contralto voice, and unforced declamation that speak well for her future career; indeed, the whole of the scene from Handel's Oratorio was exceedingly well performed; Miss Fusselle gave an expressive rendering of the air "Can I see my infant gored?" Miss Woodhatch imparted, by a bright fresh voice, all due vigour to "Thy sentence, great King," Miss Ellen Killick, making her first appearance in public, in "Scenes of horror" gained encouraging applause; and Miss Lord, also a débutante, in "O salutaris Hostia" (Cherubini), showed that she had industriously cultivated a contralto voice of sympathetic quality. During the afternoon, choral pieces for female voices were sung by students of the Vocal Academy with great success. Raff's "Day is at last departing," obtained an exceptionally good interpretation, and the more ambitious "Song of the Norns" (Hofmann), received like praiseworthy attention, the solo being taken with spirit by Miss Blackwell. Two former students, Miss Giulia Warwick and Miss Damian, added by well chosen selections to the attraction of the Concert. M. Sainton conducted with care and skill.

THE third annual Festival of the Church Sunday School Choir took place at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, the 15th ult. Previously to the Concert, several school bands, including St. Dunstan's, Stepney; St. Peter's, Walworth; Holloway School; St. Saviour's, Fitzroy Square; and Holy Trinity, Blackheath, played selections in various parts of the grounds; and at three o'clock the Concert commenced in the large orchestra with "God save the Queen," which was succeeded by "Onward, Christian soldiers," "Arise, shine" (Sir George Elvey), "O, come, let us worship" (Mendelssohn), "Once in royal David's city," "Go when the morning shineth," "Jesus, my Lord, my God, my all," "Blessed are the people" (an Anthem, composed by W. Meston for this Concert, which well deserved the approval it met with), and "God be merciful." The great success of the Concert was the "Hallelujah" Chorus, which closed the first part. During the interval Mr. H. Burbage, the Hon. Secretary, led the Choir through a series of book and manual signs. The second part of the Concert was commenced with "Wind and Sea," followed by "Waiting for the May," "The Carnevale," "The Woods" (Mendelssohn), "The Echo Chorus" (the echo being rendered very effectively by a small contingent of the choir placed in one of the opposite galleries), "Oh, tarry, gentle traveller" (Dr. Callcott), "Ye banks and braes" (arranged with bagpipe effect for this Concert by the Conductor), and "A Stitch in time." All these pieces were excellently sung, and the Hon. Conductor, Mr. W. Roston Bourke, may justly be proud of such a choir. Mr. R. Stokoe, Mus. Bac., Cantab., presided at the organ.

THE annual distribution of awards to successful students of the South-East District College for Ladies, Kennington, took place at the Horns Assembly Rooms, on Friday evening, June 30, the chair being taken by Mr. Scott Nasmith Stokes, B.A. Music, as usual, occupied a prominent place in the proceedings, and in both vocal and instrumental departments commendable proficiency was displayed. The choral music included, amongst other items, Mrs. Meadows White's "Ode to the North-east Wind." The most noteworthy of the pianoforte performances was the intelligent interpretation of Weber's "Rondo Brillante" in E flat, by Miss L. White, who was presented with the R.A.M. certificate for pianoforte-playing. Mr. W. H. Holmes conducted, and merits much praise for the very successful results of his work in connection with the College. A vote of congratulation to the principal, Miss Mackay, brought the proceedings to a close.

MESSRS. JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS will give two series of Concerts in October, November, and December next, in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music. At the first series the artists engaged are Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Signor Runcio, Signor Foli, the Chevalier Antoine de Kotski (Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany), and Signor Bisaccia; and at the second series Madame Sinico, Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Frederick Bevan, and Herr Heinrich Köhler, both companies appearing at St. James's Hall on November 16, in addition to Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Herbert Reeves, and Mr. Barrington Foote.

MESSRS. SCHULZ-CURTIVUS have already issued a prospectus of the six Concerts to be given during the autumn under the conductorship of Herr Richter. The orchestra will consist of 100 eminent performers, and the Richter-Beethoven Choir of 300 members, under the direction of Mr. Theodor Frantzen and Mr. Otto Peiniger. The programmes will comprise the "Walkürenritt," Wotan's "Abschied" and "Feuerzauber" from "Die Walküre," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the "Trauermarsch" from "Götterdämmerung," all of which are stated to be "by kind permission of Mr. Angelo Neumann." The Wagner selection will also include the "Kaiser" and "Huldigung" Marches; the Introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," and the introduction and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde." From Beethoven we are promised the Overture, "Weihe des Hauses," the "Eroica," Choral, and No. 7 Symphonies from Berlioz the "Harold" Symphony, from Liszt the Hungarian Rhapsody in F, and Symphonic Poem "Les Préludes"; and from Brahms his two Symphonies "Tragic" Overture and the new Pianoforte Concerto. The dates of the Concerts are Thursdays, October 26, November 2 and 9; and Tuesdays, November 14, 21, and 28. The series of summer Richter Concerts will take place on the following dates: Mondays, April 23 and 30; May 7, 21, and 28; June 4, 11, 18 and 25; but the works to be performed are not yet announced. Herr Franke is named as the sole Director of all these Concerts.

THE Pianoforte Recital given by Miss Helen Hopekirk at the Marlborough Rooms on Tuesday, the 4th ult., drew together an audience that testified by sustained interest, and discriminate applause their high appreciation of the performer. Coming at the fag end of a season crowded by concerts given by pianists of many nationalities, Miss Hopekirk had a task of more than ordinary difficulty in securing the notice her talents would certainly, at another and less busy time, command. There has, indeed, been an unusually large number of pianists before the London public during the last few weeks—and, it must be confessed, many have shown great merit, and more than one extraordinary talents—therefore it must have been gratifying to Miss Hopekirk to have secured so large and intelligent an audience. The fair pianist gave ample demonstration of high ability in the Sonata (Op. 26) of Beethoven, of versatility in Schumann's "Faschingsschwank aus Wien" (Op. 26), and of poetic feeling in a Nocturne, in E, of Chopin's. In these and other pieces Miss Hopekirk displayed the qualities of a true artist.

A SPECIAL Musical Service—the first of a series with a view of establishing a choir fund—took place on Friday, June 30, at St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, Westbourne Grove Terrace. The service was conducted by the Rev. Walter Morison, D.D., pastor of the church, assisted by the Rev. Dr. J. Thain Davidson, of Islington, the latter of whom gave a most interesting address on "Music." The programme included "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (Handel), well sung by Miss Dickson; and Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," the solos in which were ably rendered by Miss Burr. The choir, reinforced by members of the St. James's (Paddington) and other choirs, was very effective in the choruses and other pieces, under the conductorship of Mr. Adrian G. Stride, Organist.

AT the annual General Meeting of the Hereford Choral Society a handsome testimonial was presented by the members to their Conductor. The present was an inlaid walnut Davenport, beautifully fitted up. A silver plate, with the following inscription, was inserted on the inside of the desk: "Presented to Langdon Colborne, Esq., Mus. Bac., Cantab., Organist of Hereford Cathedral, by the Members of the Hereford Choral Society, as a token of their high esteem and regard for his untiring zeal and interest in the work of the Society. Midsummer, 1882."

MESSRS. ALDERSON AND BRENTNALL announce that they have entered into an engagement with Mr. Charles Hallé to give a series of three orchestral Concerts, with his band of fifty performers, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on November 1, December 6, and February 28, 1883. The most eminent vocalists will be engaged, and Mr. Charles Hallé will be the Conductor and solo pianist.

AN association of ladies and gentlemen has been formed, under the presidency of the Earl of Lathom, for the purpose of giving Concerts of sacred and secular standard works, including part-songs, madrigals, &c., and to produce new music by contemporary composers. The choir already includes many members of the late Sacred Harmonic Society, and will be placed under the direction of Mr. Willing. Four Concerts are to be given during the season 1882-83, and Gade's "Psyche" (to be produced at the forthcoming Birmingham Festival) is announced to be performed on December 12, for the first time in London. The vocalists engaged are Madame Marie Roze, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Ross, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. F. King.

THE examinations of the pupils of the Conservatoire at Frankfort were completed on the 8th ult., later than usual, owing to the lamented death of the principal, Herr Joachim Raff. They were, however, carried out exactly as had been arranged by him in the work which occupied him almost to the last hour of his useful life. Among the most distinguished pupils were three from Great Britain—viz., Mr. John Dykes, a son of the eminent composer, the late Dr. Dykes, of Durham; Mr. Francis Gibson, of Edinburgh; and Miss Marie Warm, of Southampton—who, both as regards compositions and execution, gave great satisfaction. The first-named was very highly thought of by Herr Raff, and his compositions show much originality and excellent workmanship.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union held their usual monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 7th ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, with vocal contributions by Miss Alma Hollowell, Miss Nellie Watts, Miss Louise Augarde, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. Richard Temple; Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinke presiding at the pianoforte. The part-singing by the choir was very good, and included "Gipsy Life" (Schumann), "In the lonely vale of streams" (Callcott), "The chough and crow" (Bishop), "Comrades in arms," &c. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

WE understand that the Bach Choir proposes to give three Concerts next season—in February, March and April—at the first of which the programme will consist of sacred and secular choral music without orchestral accompaniment, including (amongst other pieces) Palestrina's "Missa Papæ Marcelli," and an entirely new anthem left unfinished by the late Sir John Goss, and completed by Mr. Arthur Sullivan. Probably Max Bruch's "Odysseus" and J. S. Bach's great Mass in B minor will be selected for the second and third Concerts.

THE 125th monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was given on Friday, the 21st ult., at the Grosvenor Hall. Cowen's Cantata, "The Rose Maiden," was the principal feature of the programme, which also included a miscellaneous selection of choruses and vocal solos—the singers being Miss Marie Newson, Miss Bessie Davey, Mr. T. P. Frame, Mr. R. Prestidge Tabb, and Mr. A. J. Reynolds—and a bassoon solo by Mr. John Anderson. Mr. G. R. Egerton conducted, and Miss Florence Hartley accompanied at the pianoforte.

MR. CHARLES W. PEARCE, Mus. Bac., Cantab., gave an Organ Recital at St. Mary's, Hornsey Rise, on the 20th ult., in aid of the Organ Repair Fund. The programme included Dr. Wesley's Air composed for Holsworthy Bells; W. Rea's Andante con variazioni in A; H. Smart's Solemn March; Mendelssohn's First Organ Sonata; Dr. Chipp's Andante in F sharp minor; and selections from Handel and Beethoven. Several vocal numbers were well rendered by the choir, accompanied by Mr. J. H. Bunbury, Organist of the church.

THE Dedication Festival at St. Clement's Church, Arundel Square, Barnsbury, was celebrated on Friday evening, the 14th ult., by a special musical evening Service, when Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A (G. C. Martin), "God, Thou art great" (Spohr), and "Hallelujah to the Father" (Beethoven) were given by the choir, slightly augmented for the occasion. Mr. Sidney Hawes, Organist and Director of the Choir, presided at the organ, playing as voluntaries Andante in A (Smart) and Grand Chœur in D (A. Guilmant).

THE Portland Choral Association (conducted by Mr. G. E. Bishop), gave the last vocal and instrumental Concert of the season on Saturday, the 1st ult. The programme included Locke's "Macbeth" music, and Thanos' Cantata "The Piewe." The vocalists were Miss M. Bloomfield, Mrs. G. E. Bishop, Miss C. Hamond, Miss M. Robinson, and Messrs. H. Knight, H. Kearp and B. C. Kiltmer. The choruses were on the whole well rendered. Mr. W. Allen contributed a violin solo, and Miss Newman accompanied.

IN addition to the ordinary service, selections from "The Messiah," "Elijah," "St. Paul," and "Christ and His Soldiers" were given at St. Clement's, Notting Hill, on the 9th ult. The service was divided into two parts. The first part was sung by the choir of the church, Mr. W. Howard-Magrath, Organist presiding at the organ. The second part, including the selections, was sung by the Misses Wakefield and Selby, Mr. Powell, and Mr. Myelby. Mr. Bird presided at the organ during the second part.

MR. AND MADAME EDWYN FRITH gave their annual Concert on the 4th ult., at 13, Park Lane, by permission of Vandeleur Lee, Esq. In addition to the beneficiaires, the singers were Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Alice Kean (a pupil of Madame Frith), and Mr. Dyved Lewis. Both Mr. and Madame Frith were encored in their vocal contributions, the same compliment being paid to Madame Edith Wynne. The instrumentalists were Mdle. Mario Brunelle, Messrs. Otto Booth and Schuberth, and Signor Tito Mattei.

ON Thursday evening, the 20th ult., the vicar—on behalf of the choir—of St. Paul's, Canonbury, presented to Mr. W. J. Winbolt a handsome tea and coffee service, on an oak tray, bearing a suitable inscription, as a parting expression of esteem and satisfaction with the efficient manner in which he had performed the duties of Organist and Choirmaster during the last seven years. Mr. Winbolt has lately resigned his position at St. Paul's, having been appointed to St. John's, Angell Town, Brixton.

A VERY successful amateur Concert was given at St. Saviour's Schools, Herne Hill, on Thursday, the 6th ult., in aid of the funds of the Parochial Room recently opened. The principal contributors were Misses Ada Tolkien, Brookes, Paris, Rich, and Withall; Messrs. J. S. Holliday, Edgar Preston, W. Hellyar, S. W. Merry, Lee, and Byles. The chorus, consisting of members of the church choir and Choral Society, was worthy of much praise. Mr. J. F. Boardman conducted with precision.

A LIST of the subjects for examination of the pupils at the Musical College of Wales, forwarded to us by the Principal, Dr. Joseph Parry, shows that a highly satisfactory standard of proficiency in every branch of the art is maintained in the institution. At the recent competition, we are informed, the vocal scholarship was awarded to Miss Annie E. James, and that for the pianoforte to Miss Violet Howells. The College now numbers nearly one hundred students.

A MUSICAL performance by the blind pupils of the London Society for Teaching the Blind to Read was given at the Institution, Upper Avenue Road, Regent's Park, on the 21st ult., under the able direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes, Professor of Music at the Society's Schools. The programme was exceedingly well selected, and the rendering of every piece highly satisfactory, Wesley's Anthem "The Wilderness" especially being worthy of warm commendation.

SIGNOR ALBANESI, a young pianist from Naples, gave his first Concert on the 18th ult., at the Marlborough Rooms, assisted by Signor Papini (violin), M. Libotton (violoncello), Signor Rotoli, and other well-known artists. Signor Albanesi had a very good audience, and his playing was received with frequent applause. We understand that he intends to remain in London, in which case he will no doubt be often heard.

THE decision arrived at by the umpires, Dr. John Stainer and Dr. J. Frederick Bridge, after very carefully going through the forty-six manuscript Festival Te Deums, sent in for the prize of Ten Guineas offered by the London Church Choir Association, has resulted in the award being made in favour of the one bearing the motto "Te decet hymnus" by Mr. Arthur H. D. Prendergast.

A PERFORMANCE of the Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin to which Sir Michael Costa awarded the prize of ten guineas and a gold medal, offered by Trinity College, London, took place at the College, on Tuesday evening, the 4th ult. The work was admirably performed by Mr. J. Conway Brown, L. Mus. (the composer), and Mr. Victor Buziau, and enthusiastically received by the critical audience assembled.

A PERFORMANCE of Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers" was given at the Church of St. Mary-the-Less, Lambeth, on Friday evening, the 7th ult., by the Choral Society connected with the church, under Mr. W. Sexton, of Westminster Abbey. The solo parts were taken by members, and the work was rendered in a very creditable manner. Mr. A. F. Adcock, Organist, accompanied.

THE first meeting of Mr. T. Albion Alderson's Choir at Newcastle-on-Tyne will take place on September 12, when Dr. Armes's Oratorio "St. John the Evangelist" (conducted by the composer) and Macfarren's "Christmas" will be performed.

MR. WALTER PARRATT has been appointed Organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, in place of Sir George Elvey; and Mr. C. L. Williams (of Llandaff Cathedral) succeeds Mr. C. Harford Lloyd as Organist of Gloucester Cathedral.

THE new organ built by Messrs. Foster and Andrews, for Henfield Church, near Brighton, was opened on St. Peter's Day, by Mr. Richard Lemaire, Organist of St. John's, Southwark, who gave a Recital after evensong.

REVIEW.

L'Histoire de la Notation Musicale, depuis ses Origines.
Par MM. Ernest David et Mathis Lussy. Ouvrage
couronné par l'Institut. (Prix Bordin de 1880.)
[Paris, 1882: à l'Imprimerie Nationale.]

THE recent publication in Paris of a complete History of Musical Notation, by MM. Ernest David and Mathis Lussy, is, in its way, an important event; and in regard to the special attention paid to the subject of musical education at this moment in our own country it is, moreover, opportune. In the French musical and literary world, M. David is known as the author of "La Musique chez les Juifs." Most English musicians are acquainted with the exhaustive treatise on "Musical Expressions" by M. Lussy. We are told in the preface to the new work that it was a prize essay, and that the comprehensive title, "L'Histoire de la Notation Musicale, depuis ses Origines," was given by the Paris Academy of Fine Arts as the subject for competition in 1880. The authors do not profess to travel much out of the region of plain narrative and research; for, as they say, to enter into the question of "comparative Semeiography" would be to create a new science worthy of the labours of a Max Müller or a Bopp. Naturally, in a subject so limited as that of musical notation, the facts they narrate will, for the most part, be familiar to the readers of the excellent articles in musical dictionaries and in encyclopædias compiled from the works of Hawkins, Forkel, Fétis, and other historians. Still, in gathering the results of the researches of a long list of authors of all times and countries into one large quarto, MM. David and Lussy have not lost opportunities of impressing on the mere mass of facts the stamp of their individual opinions. Here and there they freely express their divergence from certain of their predecessors. In the very first page we find it assumed as more than probable that no Semitic nation possessed any graphic system of musical notation. Amongst the Semitic nations are placed the Egyptians; but M. David, to whom, perhaps, we are indebted for the facts of the more ancient periods of the history, explains in a foot-note that he has classified the Egyptians with the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Phœnicians and Hebrews, not on ethnological grounds, but because of their constant intercourse with Semitic nations. The importance of the point as to whether those nations had any graphic system of music notation soon appears in the subsequent questions as to the origin of the Greek notation, and eventually of the modern European. It has often been a favourite theory with some writers that the Greek musical system was brought by Pythagoras from Egypt. Others, with whom MM. David and Lussy agree, ascribe the origin of Greek music to the Phœnicians. So far from the Greeks receiving their system from the Egyptians, the elaborate music of the latter people in after times was wholly of Greek origin. The notation employed was alphabetical and, it may be said, numerical, since the letters served the Greeks equally for their musical and arithmetical notation. Their method of solmisation was in principle the same as the hexachordal system that prevailed in the middle ages throughout civilised Europe, and continued in Italy, according to Padre Martini, even to the latter half of the last century. The principle has lately been revived in France and England. It was a system of mutations. Where we at the present day might sing re mi fa sol, the Greeks, prefixing the letter t to the vowels, sang ta te ti to; and in following the scale la si do they repeated the syllables ta ti to. Their system of mutation was, however, in some respects different from the mediæval, and was more scientific.* The Roman musical doctrine was that of the Greeks, shorn of refinements and superfluities such as delicate intonations and subdivisions of the octave, the multiplicity of modes, and other matters little suited to the more practical-minded Latins; who were content to receive the "immutabile system," and to retain two modes—the Lydian and Hypolydian—out of the seven, eleven, fifteen, or even more, in the Greek system. They retained also the alphabetical notation, which was only transformed by the substitution of Roman in place of Greek letters, and was subsequently adopted by Boetius, handed over to Pope Gregory, utilised by Guido d'Arezzo, finally reappearing, with the Greek system of tetrachords almost intact, in the hexachords of modern history. In regard to certain points we are here of course in the midst of a maze of conflicting opinions. It is asked, "In what characters did Gregory write or note his antiphony?" "In letters of the alphabet," says Fétis. "In neuma," say his adversaries. "In no notation at all," says M. Gevaert, "for Gregory knew none, and simply made choice of traditional chants and had them taught orally." Again, as to what is known in musical history as the nota romana, Fétis asserts it was alphabetical, because the neumes were not known in Italy until the eighth century. M. Gevaert confirms that opinion, in regard to the chronology at least, as he thinks both the neumatic notation and the theory of the eight ecclesiastical tones were of Byzantine origin, and did not penetrate westward until towards the eighth century. Other authorities, with whom MM. David and Lussy seem inclined to side, assert that the neumes were known in Italy long before the time even of St. Gregory, and that it was the neumatic notation—the veritable nota romana—he employed in the antiphony he caused to be exhibited as a model before the altar of St. Peter's. The Rev. P. Dom. Joseph Pothier, whose work on the Gregorian melodies was noticed a short time since in THE MUSICAL TIMES, is of opinion that in all ages the alphabetical or numerical notation has been used only for purely didactic purposes. The neuma are entirely distinct in object and origin, and have never supplanted the letters, nor were the latter at any time substituted for the neumes. They existed simultaneously. The one explained the other; as, we may add, alphabetical symbols, numerals, syllables, grave and acute accents, and other signs are used at this day, to explain the staff notation in regard either to questions of abstract tonality or correct intonation. It appears from what we are told by M. David that the tonal accents employed by the Hebrews had many characteristics in common with the neumatic notation. There is nevertheless some doubt as to the date at which these accents originated. A high authority places it about the period the Talmud was finally edited—that would be only in the sixth century of our era. We have already quoted the opinion of M. David, that no Semitic nation had a musical notation of its own. The music of the psalms and poetry of the Jews in ancient times was therefore learned orally and by tradition, and was noted neither by letters of the alphabet nor other signs.

* To purely English readers the Greek solmisation suggests a curious question as to the correct pronunciation of the epsilon. Was re pronounced tay, or how? No other sounding of the English letter e would answer the purposes of the solfeggio.

The Talmud, which in other respects enters into minutiae absolutely frivolous, does not, says M. David, make any mention of the "tonal accents." What it does mention is that a certain Levite was reprimanded for not teaching to his colleagues—and it is understood orally—a melody he had composed for the recitation of a canticle. Everything, as our authors remind us, moulds itself to surrounding conditions. It may be assumed that the earliest, like later, music used in religious ceremonies had a very restricted compass, and was little more than what Aristotle calls the "seasoning of poetry" by varied and organised modulations of the voice. The neumæ themselves were scarcely more than mnemonics or aids in remembering a melody more or less familiar. The older neumatic signs, made up of points and commas and curves, without guiding lines, were not as numerous or as systematic as those of the Greek notation, but they were more complicated; and, adapted as they were to nearly all forms of vocal expression, they served their purpose so long as the music was homophonic, and the intervals sung were not greater than a third, or at most a fifth. The significance of the fact that the gradual reform of the neumatic notation was contemporaneous with the appearance of the organum and the first germs of harmony in modern Europe has naturally been noticed by all historians; although at this period, from the eighth to the eleventh century, the narrative of musical history is not very connected or clear, and it does not appear that any nascent idea of harmony had much influence in suggesting the happy notion, so curiously overlooked by all ancient nations, of graphically fixing the intervals of the scale by placing the points—or puncta—of the neumes on separate lines and spaces.* Guido, to whom this invention at least may be ascribed, was not by any means unmindful of the organum or diaphony of his day, but he, and his precursors, Aurelian de Réomé, Remi d'Auxerre, Huebald de Sainte Amand, Odon de Cluny, and the rest, were monks, devoted to one object: the service of the Church, and the right rendering of the homophonic tones. It was rather to the second great reform in musical notation—mensurable music—that the gradual progress of harmony lent so much aid and finally perfected. Another powerful element in both reforms—the influence of popular or profane music, always despised by the ecclesiastics—has received ample justice at the hands of MM. David and Lussy. The growth of the modern harmonic system was in its turn greatly assisted by a change of scale, which may not have had its origin in the period we are speaking of, but the first written evidence of the reform occurs in the tenth century. The Greek system of scales was minor, and the central note we may call A, or la. It is often stated that Guido d' Arezzo added the gamma, or G, to that system; but long before the assumed date of the appearance of the micrologus, the scale, or, more properly, system of scales, is to be found in the diagrams of his predecessors, Odon de Cluny and others, and exactly as it is presented in the hexachordal system of a later period, which as a system was in principle major, and by the system of mutations wholly and practically so. The fundamental scales were C and F, and the nominal dohs of the system of mutations were ut, fa ut, and sol re ut. The whole system, gamma included, was Greek, and even the hexachords were founded on an admission and an application of the Greek system of tetrachords. From the fact we have already seen, that the Latins retained only the Lydian and the Hypolydian modes of the Greek system—C and F—there is reason to think that the transformation of the antique and minor system into the modern major system might have commenced at a very early period in our era. Offering here an individual opinion, we confess it is very difficult to comprehend what modern historians and musicians mean in using, so specifically as they do, the expression old tonality, when by a very ordinary process we can evoke at least seven major and modern keys from the Greek "perfect system," and can add more with the "immutable system," taking C and F as points of departure in transposition. MM. David and Lussy quote the disparaging remarks of Aristoxenus and Ptolemy in regard to notation. Those philosophers could not admit that "notation" should be accepted as proof of the science of music. To this our authors rather petulantly reply: "that may or may not be; but if Aristoxenus and Ptolemy had thought proper to give us one or two copious examples of music in the then revised notation, they would have saved posterity a world of trouble." That is most true; but at the same time there is a tendency amongst musicians to mistake the symbols for the things symbolised; and it is just possible that the contempt expressed by the moderns for the "old tonality" is one of the fruits of that tendency. Although we should wish to follow this important and interesting work by MM. David and Lussy page by page, we can afford to pass over, as indeed we have already done, the well-worn subject of "mensurable music," and we feel inclined to make a bound forward to the two examples of modern notation given in the concluding chapter. These are an extract from a pianoforte fantasia by Thalberg, and another from an arrangement of the overture to "Oberon" by Zarbeski; the latter scored on four staves, for the piano à claviers renversés. From this pinnacle of an edifice which is truly one of the greatest marvels we possess of human ingenuity we can with our authors—or shall we say with M. Lussy—review the process by which it has been raised. We need not trouble ourselves to go back again to the age of Pericles or of Nero. Setting aside the two or three specimens we have of ancient music, all of doubtful authenticity, we are asked under the guidance of M. Lussy to judge the music of the ancients by the cumbrousness of their notation; and if that is not sufficiently convincing, by the despicable construction of their instruments. As for Guido, "to the learned," says M. Lussy, "he will henceforth be nothing more than an intelligent reformer of methods of musical teaching; but to the general public, whatever is said or done, he will always be the inventor of the gamut, and the originator of our system of notation." However little Guido may have done, there is at least one thing he did not do—one thing to his credit, in the eyes of M. Lussy—he did not invent that "monstrosity," the "system of mutations and hexachords." As for the "Harmonic Hand," no one knows who invented it—John Cotton, or somebody—but it is better that its origin should remain in obscurity. These old devices of our ancestors began to disappear at the approach of the seventeenth century. But musicians in those days seemed to have thrived so well and lived so long, we have to go back to 1517, the date on which Hubert Waelrant was born in Antwerp, to trace the bud that finally expanded into the full-blown "modern tonality." It was he who invented the system of bocedisation, afterwards approved and adopted by Calvisius. But following Waelrant, who died in 1595, we have Van den Putte, otherwise Erycius Putaneus, who published in Milan, in 1599, a treatise bearing in its long title those significant and almost classical words, "Sive septem discrimina vocum." There were also: Anselm, the Fleming; Pedro Urena, a Spanish monk; and, according to Merseune, the Frenchman Lemaire, in 1605, and others, to whom is ascribed a share in the honour of "inventing"—as it is usual to say; but shall we not say, rather, "re-establishing"?—the seventh note of the scale. It is even doubtful whether the word "re-establishing" is strictly correct. In the book itself we are noticing, as well as in others, and particularly in "L'Histoire de la Musique dans l'Antiquité," by Gevaert, we find that the Greek method of solmisation was by trines, or triads, as they called them; and because the unit, so to speak, of their system of scales was the tetrachord, just as the unit of the mediæval system was the heptachord. Where required, the Greeks changed or repeated the syllabic sign after the third note, as—do re mi { fa sol la }

do re mi { do re mi } . In the Middle Ages they changed the sign after the sixth note. In the fully expanded system of these days, having the whole complication of keys pictorially before our eyes, we only repeat the sign to complete the octave. It seems to us as unreasonable to call the mediæval scale hexachordal as it would be to call the Greek scale trichordal; and the whole difficulty is in confounding a scale with a double-octave system, and, in fact, in confounding theory and system in general with the details of notation. In regard to graphic detail, for which, perhaps, we are as much indebted to Guttenberg as to Waelrant, we are indeed immensely in advance of our forefathers; but it is always a question whether the comparative absence of mental effort, which M. Lussy rightly enough claims as the distinctive merit in the process of reading the modern notation, is an unmixed advantage in regard to a thorough knowledge of music, and whether the very facility of reading is in its effects not somewhat akin to learning by rote or by ear.

As an ardent Fétisian, M. Lussy announces with emphasis the final recognition in the seventeenth century of the pivot of the modern tonality; that luckless interval the tritone, which has been proscribed, detested, and cursed as the diabolus in musica. The marvellous powers of this interval formed part of the almost Pauline call or revelation which, as Fétis recounts, occurred to him whilst journeying in the Bois de Boulogne. The revelation, however, was by no means complete. When from the claviers renversés, or summit of the edifice of that system of modern notation to which M. Lussy himself has contributed some scrolls and ornaments, we look back on the past he and his colleague have so clearly placed before us, we cannot help receiving a different impression to what it appears to us they intend to convey. In tracing with them the evolution of musical notation, the past, instead of receding, seems to come nearer and nearer. This very theory of the tritone, which Fétis had adopted with an appreciativeness only a little more passionate or intense than some of his predecessors, is a link with the past, rather than an abrupt departure from ancient systems. The monkish detestation of the interval is a negative proof of its recognised value in former ages; and all that Fétis could tell us of its power in the modern and vertical system was already made visible in the musica pieta of the ancients. If in making these comparisons we allow our minds to be impressed by the recollections of modern symphonies and music-dramas, the ancients may appear pigmies; if we choose to ponder on all that is suggested by the mechanism of modern musical typography and instruments, they become shadows; but if the question be the theory of the mechanism of notation, we feel inclined, with M. Gevaert, to hint at the possibility of our knowing in some respects less than they did; and of our not even knowing all that our own vaunted system of notation could be made to reveal. In the fifth and concluding chapters of the history of musical notation we are reviewing, MM. David and Lussy deal generously, and in many respects fairly, with the several attempts that have been made in late years to reform the modern notation. Our authors admit that only two systems—the Galin-Paris-Chevé, in France, and its analogue, the Tonic Sol-fa system, in England, have achieved any success. Both methods are systems of mutation like the hexachordal system of the Middle Ages, which, it is worth while remembering, existed for more than half a millenium. We quite agree with M. Lussy that it was a transitional device, and that its permanence was no absolute proof of its merit, in view of the difficulty of disturbing an intellectually indolent and unimpressionable world when it has once nestled itself in rut, groove or crevice. Still, if in the full tide and apparent perfection of our modern notation old principles have been revived, it suggests the probability that they correct some marked defect in the present system. This we can assume, on the principle more than once referred to by our authors, that the general progress of evolution, which has a trick of recoiling and advancing, will be dependent on existing conditions. With perfect justice MM. David and Lussy remind us that the Galin system—and we think it is the same with our Tonic Sol-fa method—was not intended to supplant, but to supplement the ordinary notation. Such we imagine to be not only the true view of the case, but it also indicates the peculiarity which has given to those systems their real value. The modern system of notations undoubtedly deserves all the praise and preference M. Lussy bestows. In its totality we can even allow it to be the best conceivable instrument for the visual representation of musical ideas. The little defects M. Lussy himself has tenderly pointed out are barely worthy of notice; but its chief defect is its very completeness in one direction only. Of all notations, and by reason of its pictorial properties, it best lends itself to what modern musicians know and prize as form. It is exclusively a fixed doh notation; or, to go back to an older terminology, it is a thetical or positional notation, and thus represents above all the practical element in music. What M. Gevaert, in referring to the Galin system, calls a notation dynamique, represents the principle of the movable doh; which can henceforth never be more than a theoretic or accessory principle. We ourselves are not quite satisfied that even such an expression as a dynamic notation is allowable. A notation—of whatever kind—must from the very nature of the thing, be positional, referring to something expressed or understood in the sense of a doh. Even the more or less abstract neumatic notation possessed a species of clef representing the tone. The "functional principle," casually mentioned by MM. David and Lussy, resides in the doh itself. It is the doh only which is in power; not the notation. An apparent difficulty in these too much forgotten doctrines is easily explainable: when the doh is to be considered as an intrinsic part of the notation, and identified by the numeral 1, or by the letter C, or any other symbol held to be initial, it is both in power and position. To discuss questions of this nature did not, perhaps, enter into the purposes of MM. David and Lussy as simple historians, but we must say their penultimate chapter on "Reformers and Innovators" is a trifle lean, and somewhat disfigured by the mere prejudices of specialism. Modern craftsmen in music experts in their own system of notation, and employing only one method of transposition, the keyboard shift, are apt to overlook not simply the intrinsic merits of other methods, but to judge them from a pedagogical point of view, as methods of teaching music, whilst in truth, as a question of principle, they are also methods of understanding music. The broad and separate principles of the fixed and the movable dohs are the foundation not only of systems of notation but of technical theory, which is a question of notation, the notation representing the concrete art and science of music. For the last 150 years musicians have abandoned old methods, and have been beguiled by scientific and arithmetical questions, all important in their way but subsidiary; and they were treated as subsidiary by the ancients, who wisely postponed them as final refinement of the art. It is not therefore astonishing that in the very latest treatises of musicians there is abundant evidence that, with all their learning, they do not even now perceive the difference between one principle and the other; and that, whether it be a question of the fixed doh or the movable doh, the respective principles and methods are curiously interchanged and misapplied. Many of us would find it difficult to explain intelligibly our opinions, and off-hand, as to which of the two principles—the movable or to the fixed doh—are we to refer the Greek system of modes. The old question as to whether the relative minor or the tonic minor represents one principle or the other is not so easy to decide and thoroughly expound as some might imagine. Again, how is it that musicians after presenting their series of chords in relation to a particular tonic, hesitate and prevaricate in pretending to explain to their readers or pupils a fact so elementary as a change of resolution? The reason is that we accustom ourselves to work with the visible representation of the several scales or keys on the horizontal lines of the staves, and all that is latent in the system we overlook. The "dynamic methods," revivals of ancient systems, are calculated to correct these habits. On that account, with all gratitude to MM. David and Lussy for their researches and vivid and orderly presentation of the historical facts of the question of musical notation, we feel disposed to reproach them, not for over-estimating the modern system, but for seemingly to magnify its advantages at the expense of accessory methods. These in reality, provide the key to what is otherwise a labyrinth of only partially intelligible symbols, representing well enough, with the aid of the clef and the staff signature gradations of pitch, and with sufficient accuracy for didactic purposes; but, masterpiece of ingenuity as the modern notation may be, it fails utterly in defining specific tonal or tonic relations in harmony. Unimprovable as it may appear, and in most respects is, as a fixed doh notation, it still bears the impress of a certain period of its existence when the new tonality was already highly developed, but when the "continuous melody," involving the "continuous," or what may be loosely called the "non-cadential harmony" of the modern music-drama, must have been inconceivable. The defect cannot be remedied. It is inherent in the nature of the notation, in its origin practically adapted to a melodic system. But it discloses the use of accessory methods that, whatever may be their value in elementary teaching, are in principle essential to a right comprehension of the theory of modulation, in which a sense of absolute pitch is only of secondary importance. The whole art of music is a question of organised contrasts and of relativity.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE first public performance of Richard Wagner's new music-drama "Parsifal" is to take place on the 1st inst., at Bayreuth, and for some time to come this latest manifestation of the genius of the reformer will supply the chief topic for discussion in advanced musical circles, both in Germany and elsewhere. In the face of the extraordinary interest clustering around the performance in question, we are reminded of the following enthusiastic words of a contemporary German music-historian, viz.: "To speak of the 'success' of a first production of a new work by Wagner sounds in these days almost like a platitude. It is an event. As a matter of fact, every new work of Wagner's since 'Rienzi' has proved an artistic creation of enduring value, and an enrichment of the répertoire."

We read in the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung: "Among the new and most remarkable effects included in the forthcoming performances of 'Parsifal' at Bayreuth may be mentioned a bell-instrument, manufactured by Steingräber, of Bayreuth, after a design made by Hofkapellmeister Hans Richter. The mechanism of this instrument consists in a keyboard of four keys, some six centimetres wide, each striking upon six pianoforte bass strings, whereby the sound of four distinct bells is produced. In connection with four gongs (manufactured in England), of corresponding tonality, the peal of bells is so exactly imitated that we seem to hear four mighty brass tongues speaking down from the giddy heights of a cathedral spire. One of the most difficult portions of 'Parsifal' to manage, both musically and scenically, is the magic with the flower-nymphs in the second act. Thirty excellent singers, including six solo voices, have, however, already completely mastered the intricacies of this scene. Among the six soloists there is a singer from New York, Fräulein Johanna Meta, whose some time since made her débüt at Munich as Elsa, in 'Lohengrin,' and was at once engaged at the Hoftheater."

Among the French musicians who have gone to Bayreuth to witness the "Parsifal" performance are M. Camille Saint-Saëns and M. Charles Lamoureux, the well-known chef-d'orchestre.

Joachim Raff, whose death we announced in the obituary column of our last number, has left two symphonies in an entirely finished state, one of which is already in the hands of the publishers, Messrs. Linnemann, of Leipzig. They are entitled respectively, "In the Autumn," and "In Winter," thus completing the symphonic cyclus of the seasons contemplated by the composer, whose "Spring" and "Summer" symphonies are already familiar numbers in concert programmes. The public examinations at the Hoch'sche Conservatorium, at Frankfurt, whereof the deceased musician was the director, were held from the 4th to the 8th ult. "On the first four days," the Frankfurter Zeitung remarks, "the pupils of the higher vocal and instrumental classes were heard, while on the fifth day the members of the class for composition, which had been personally conducted by the Director, produced some of their own compositions. The result of these examinations is the most honouring tribute that could be offered to the memory of the late Principal of the institution, and the most conclusive testimony to the fact that with his great productive activity Raff combined the best qualities of a teacher who devoted himself with enthusiasm and with the most scrupulous attention to the duties of his office." No successor to the deceased composer in the directorship of the Hoch'sche Conservatorium has yet been named.

At Strasburg, fragments from a new opera entitled "Melusine" (a favourite subject, it would seem, with modern composers) were produced with much success. The composer is Herr Müller-Reuter, a Professor of the Conservatorium of that town, and a late pupil of the Hoch'sche Conservatorium at Frankfurt.

An opera by the Duke Ernst of Coburg, entitled "Diana von Solange," was produced at the Kroll'sche Theater in Berlin last month, and met with a very favourable reception.

A process by which decorations and other scenic accessories are rendered practically incombustible is now being applied by some of the leading theatres in Germany, whose example will doubtless soon be imitated by others. The process, the invention of Herr Pafen, of Frankfurt, consists in the impregnating of canvas and similar inflammable material with a chemical preparation, which in no way affects even the most delicate colours or the durability of the object impregnated, while introducing a new and important element of safety in case of fire. Experiments recently made with the preparation at the Court Theatres of Munich and Cassel have proved completely successful, even sheets of gauze when exposed to a gas flame refusing to become ignited, the only effect produced being a very slow carbonisation. The significance of this fact becomes the more apparent when we remember the enormous sheets of this most inflammable of all materials employed in some of our modern stage representations, notably in the "Nibelungen" Trilogy, for which alone the Munich Hof-Theater, for instance, is said to have some 9,000 square metres of gauze-sheets amongst its scenic properties.

Herr August Wilhelmj, the eminent violinist, has returned to his home at Wiesbaden after an absence of nearly four years, during which time he has made the round of the world, visiting North and South America, New Zealand, Australia, Asia (China, India, &c.), and returning to Europe via Egypt. The artist has met everywhere with the most enthusiastic reception, and has been almost overwhelmed with valuable presents and other tokens of admiration and regard.

Glinka's opera "Life for the Czar" is to be produced next month at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, under the auspices of Dr. Hans von Bülow, who will conduct the first performance of this interesting work.

A commemorative tablet has been attached to the house—No. 18, Galerie Strasse, at Dresden—indicating that Carl Maria von Weber resided there from September 1822 to the time of his death (1826).

On the 12th ult., a hundred years had elapsed since the first representation on any stage (in Vienna) of Mozart's opera "Die Entführung aus dem Serail." Six years later, in 1788, the work was likewise produced at Berlin with great success, although a critic of the period deemed it his duty to advise the young composer to "take a lesson first from Dittersdorf before attempting to write a comic opera."

Contrary to the statement made in German journals, and reproduced in these columns, Herr Max Bruch has declined the proffered conductorship of the New York "Liederkrantz," which has been conferred upon Mr. Theodore Thomas, the well-known American conductor.

Gratuitous performances were given at most of the Paris theatres on the 14th ult., the anniversary of the national fête. At the Grand-Opéra M. Ambroise Thomas' "Françoise de Rimini," was performed, for the last time this season, on the occasion in question, and at the Opéra-Comique "Les Noces de Jeannette" and "Le Pré-aux-Clercs," as the closing performances before the vacation.

Four new operative works are said to be now in the hands of M. Carvalho, the Director of the Paris Opéra-Comique, to be brought out at that establishment during the coming season, viz.: "Lackmé," by M. Léo Delibes; "Manon," by M. Massenet; "Carmosine," by M. F. Poise; and "Diana," by M. E. Paladilhe.

M. Massenet, says La Musique Populaire, will next winter pay a visit to Berlin, Hamburg, and Vienna, in order to be present at the production there of his opera "Hérodiade."

M. Colonne, the conductor of the Châtelet Concerts, has recently given a series of most successful concert performances at Lisbon, the programmes of which consisted chiefly of modern French music. The King and Queen of Portugal were present on every occasion.

A monument has just been erected at Père-la-Chaise, Paris, in memory of Gustave Roger, the once famous tenor of the Grand-Opéra, and subsequently a Professor of the Conservatoire, who died in 1879. Among those taking an active part in the ceremony of unveiling were M. A. Thomas, as Director of the Conservatoire; M. Vaucorbeil, as Director of the Opéra; and M. Halanzier, as representative of the Association des Artistes Dramatiques.

Le Ménestrel says: "Telephonic communication is established between Dieppe and Rouen, so effectually, indeed, that, upon the request of the Mayor, M. Bias has enabled the people of Rouen to be ear-witnesses to his first lyric representation at Dieppe. Previous experiments had already been made with concert performances, which had proved completely successful."

Our Turin correspondent writes: "Signor Roberti, the esteemed conductor of the Stefano Tempia Choral Society, gave an interesting riunione at his private residence on June 22, on which occasion some chamber music by the maestro was produced for the first time. All those most interested in musical matters here were present, professors and amateurs, amongst the former Commendatore Pedrotti, the newly appointed Director of the Conservatorio Rossini (at Pesaro), also the Conte Marmorito, Schumann's son-in-law, to whom we are beholden for the Italian translation of 'Faust' (Schumann's), &c. There was much applause, a quartet in F (manuscript) in particular having pleased greatly. The operatic company lately performing at the Alfieri, under Signor Forcillo's conductorship, concluded their engagement on June 30 with 'Fra Diavolo.' During the stagione they have brought out a new opera, 'Il Sortilegio,' by Scontrino—a young composer already known by two previous operatic works—which was, on the whole, very successful. Signora Elena Rosa, the charming Zerlina of 'Fra Diavolo,' was equally well cast in the new opera. Other works performed were the 'Campana dell'Eremitaggio,' and 'Linda,' with the American Miss Russell as the heroine. A new Mass by the maestro Roberti will be performed by the united choirs of the municipal schools at the church of San Lorenzo, on the 10th inst., in the presence of the dignitaries of the town."

We are requested by a most competent Italian earwitness of the "Mattinata Musicale," mentioned in our concert programmes this month under the heading of "Turin," to call the attention of our readers to the high class of music performed on that occasion, and also to the enthusiastic reception it met with on the part of the audience. The special significance of these facts will become more apparent from the subsequent remarks of our informant. "This," he says, inter alia, "was the very first time I have had the immense satisfaction of hearing truly classical music of this type performed, and admirably performed, in my country." After bestowing high praise upon the vocalists—Signora Paolicchi, "a first-rate singer, with a rich, genuine contralto voice"; and M. Paul, "a young baritone from Geneva, trained at Milan, whose singing reminded me of Herr Stockhausen"—our correspondent concludes by saying: "There can be no doubt that, as having taken place in Italy, this concert is an extraordinary and most gratifying event, and one which I would be glad to see recorded in your columns." We have great pleasure in gratifying the desire thus implied, and merely add it as our opinion that the appreciation of classical music manifested on this occasion by the Turinese public is, in a large measure, owing to the unceasing efforts in this direction on the part of their resident maestro, Signor Giulio Roberti, the conductor of the Stefano Tempia Choral Society and founder of the Normal and Elementary Vocal Schools, which have rendered the city of Turin one of the chief centres of earnest musical activity in Italy.

In accordance with a recent ministerial decree, all musical works to be found in the various public libraries of Rome will in future be concentrated at the Accademia Santa Cecilia of that capital. This is an excellent measure, whereby musical research will be greatly facilitated.

A festival is being organised at Arezzo, in connection with the unveiling of a monument erected in that town in honour of Guido d'Arezzo, the whilom Benedictine monk to whose learning and practical wisdom the art of music owes so much of its progress during the eleventh century. The festivities, which are to be held next month, will include a series of concerts, chiefly of sacred music, under the direction of the maestro Mancinelli, of Rome. It is said that a discovery has just been made at the Laurenziana Library, at Florence, of some documents throwing a fresh light upon the career of Guido, which will no doubt be made public in time for the forthcoming celebration.

A new opera by Signor Sarria, entitled "Regina e Contadina," has been successfully brought out at the Theatre Fiorentino, of Naples.

The Société de Musique of Antwerp is organising a festival in honour of Russian music, which will include the performance of some of the more important works of Rubinstein and Glinka.

A festive concert took place last month at the Hague, in commemoration of the 250th anniversary of the foundation of the university, on which occasion Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust" was performed by 500 vocalists and an orchestra of 100 musicians, under the direction of M. de Lange.

Two theatres—the Arcadia, of St. Petersburg, and the Del Recreo, of Madrid—were recently destroyed by fire, both disasters having been fortunately unaccompanied by loss of life.

The death is announced, on May 29, of Bernhard Stade, organist and "Stadt-Cantor" at Arnstadt, an excellent musician to whom that town owes the worthy restoration of the fine organ of the church of St. Boniface, played by Johann Sebastian Bach during his cantorate at Arnstadt.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Vocal Festival Concert of the Inauguration of the Hôtel-de-Ville (July 14): "Terre, éclaire-toi," chorus (Cohen); Rataplan, from "Les Huguenots" (Meyerbeer); "Le garde passe," from "Les Deux Avides" (Grétry); Chorus from "Hamlet" (Thomas); "Amour sacré," from "La Muette" (Auber); Orgie, from "Comte Ory" (Rossini); Kermesse, from "Faust" (Gounod); Huntsmen's Chorus, from "Freischütz" (Weber); Les Buveurs, from "La Juive" (Halévy); Soldiers' Chorus, from "Faust" (Gounod).

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHEVÉ NOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Mr. Wareham, in his letter in THE MUSICAL TIMES of this month, states the fact of the Government having recognised the use of the Chev  Notation equally with the Tonic Sol-fa in elementary schools.

I believe that I have been the means of obtaining this recognition from the Education Department, for, wishing to use the Chev  notation in my National School here, I wrote to the Department on March 29 last, to inquire whether its use would be allowed for a grant. The reply then was that the point would be considered by my Lords, and it was not till May 25 that the information of recognition came. My Lords, however, "cannot (they say) guarantee that the examination of the school will be conducted by an inspector who has any special knowledge of that (the Chev ) method." But the principle of the Tonic Sol-fa and Chev  notations being identical, it would require the briefest study to enable an inspector who was qualified to examine in the Tonic Sol-fa to examine also in the Chev  notation.

And now, allow me, sir, to say—which is the principal object of my troubling you with these few lines—that, contrary to the opinion of Mr. James Thomson, expressed in the June number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, I am convinced that the Chev  notation "offers the easiest, best, and most natural system of learning to sing at sight." It is "easier" in its reading than the Tonic Sol-fa, inasmuch as it is not incumbered by many unnecessary marks used in that notation for the division and subdivision of the bar as to time. And it is the more "natural," as the figures (not letters) used express exactly the place of the notes in the Diatonic Scale, and, therefore, it leads readily to the use of the Staff notation, which should be the end of either one or the other of the two notations in question.

I feel assured that it only needs an acquaintance with the Chev  notation to make it as generally used in this country as it is in France.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,
Smethcott Rectory, Salop. G. M. K. ELLERTON.

THE SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The paragraph concerning this Society published in your last issue may give rise to some misapprehension as to its nature and objects. It is not based upon similar lines to the London Society. In the first place, its membership is restricted to bona fide professional musicians; and, in the second place, although it aims at the advancement of the art, perhaps its chief object may be better described as the guarding of the interests of the artists.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES DAWBER, Mus. Bac., Wigan, July 18, 1882. Honorary Secretary.

BENCINI'S ANTHEM, "TU ES PETRUS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On the occasion when the Pope is carried in a chair up the nave of St. Peter's, Rome, an anthem, "Tu es Petrus," by M. Bencini, is sung. Can any correspondent of THE MUSICAL TIMES inform me if the above-named anthem is in print, who was Bencini, and what his works? Burney only mentions an opera by him in 1708.

Believe me, sir, yours truly,

Sidmouth, July 11, 1882. N. S. HEINEKEN.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

CHORAGUS.—As our correspondent's letter is the only one we have received upon this subject, the suggested reform appears scarcely called for, and can hardly be of public interest.

F. CONSTABLE.—We have never heard that the essential principles of teaching differ in the two countries.

L. R. D.—The first question should be addressed to the University where you wish to take your degree, and the second to the College of Organists.

DOUBLE B.—We think a Harmonina would suit your purpose.

G. A. PRYCE.—The instrument you describe is called a Glockenspiel.

At Evensong the same Processional was used, the Psalms being taken to Anglican music. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Arnold in A, and the Anthem the same as the morning. The Rev. J. W. Amongst the quartets must be specially mentioned the "Hymn to Cynthia" (Tours), and "Tell me where is fancy bred" (Pinsuti), both of which were warmly received. Several solos were effectively rendered during the evening and much applauded, Miss Durand and Mrs. Marriott being heard to much advantage in two duets. The part-music was well sung by Messrs. H. # CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackley Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

J. & J. HOPKINSON

Invite attention to the following Testimonials:—

I have had occasion to test HOPKINSON'S Pianos in London and in Paris, and I am bound to declare that with regard to power, evenness of tone, and equality of touch, I have found them of rare excellence.

They are Instruments that all Pianists ought to appreciate, for they allow them to give expression to their feelings, and to play with the most delicate nuances.

PARIS, July 23, 1878. (Signed) CH. GOUNOD.

I have played at the Paris Exhibition on Messrs. HOPKINSON'S Pianos, and I say with pleasure that the quality of sound has completely satisfied me, as well as the elasticity of touch, which leaves nothing to be desired.

(Signed) ANTOINE DE KONTSKI.

July 30, 1878.

I have had the opportunity of trying the excellent Pianos of Messrs. HOPKINSON, whose instruments have the qualities I esteem in a Piano; "they have a soul," which permits the performer to communicate the poetic feeling in his heart, and in the spirit necessary to forget himself in his performances.

(Signed) D. MAGNUS.

PARIS, July 30, 1878.

The Grand Pianos of HOPKINSON, London, are very remarkable. They are equal to those of the best Houses already known. All the qualities which can be demanded by an experienced virtuoso—vigour of attack, openness of sound, possibility to give the necessary shade to the music, and to produce effects of extreme delicacy—are found in HOPKINSON'S Pianofortes. They possess also a sonority of a crystalline nature, which gives them a certain charm, and characterises their own personality.

(Signed) NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,

Director of the Conservatoire of Moscow.

PARIS, August 3, 1878.

I state with pleasure that the Grand Pianos of Messrs. J. and J. HOPKINSON of London, which I have had the opportunity of hearing and of trying myself, are remarkable for their fabrication, and that they rival those of the best Houses of Paris and London for their wonderful power and elasticity of touch.

I should wish no other for my personal use, and to accompany me in my concerts.

(Signed) CH. NILSSON.

It possesses all the well-known STEINWAY characteristics in respect to TONE, displaying a volume, fulness, depth, and richness, with a purity, refinement, and exquisite sympathetic quality—utterly unknown in any English Pianofortes, whilst in regard to STRUCTURAL SOLIDITY it obviously compares with them (as has been happily said) "as a MODERN IRONCLAD to a CANOE."

This Society has been established in consequence of the widespread desire, strongly expressed by the public and the Press, that the work so nobly carried on for fifty years by the Sacred Harmonic Society, now dissolving, should not be abandoned, nor the Orchestra and Chorus dispersed; and in accordance with the suggestion of its Committee, that a Society should be formed to continue that work.

Early application for Shares is necessary to enable the Council to make arrangements for the coming Concert Season.

A HAYDN BIOGRAPHY *

By F. WEBER.

"THE difficulty of the task is to portray the developing and gradually maturing Haydn, seeing that of him and of the prevailing circumstances and influences little or nothing has, as yet, been brought to light. The Haydn whom every one knows is not Mozart's predecessor, but his contemporary and successor." Thus, in a letter to a Viennese friend, Otto Jahn expressed himself concisely, and no less truly, concerning a subject for the elucidation of which he was just then collecting materials with the intention of writing an exhaustive life of the composer. However much we may regret the fact that the great Mozart-biographer should have been prevented, by a comparatively early death, from carrying his design into execution, we must admit that the actual accomplishment of the task could not have been intrusted to worthier hands. Indeed, in the two volumes of his biographical work which have so far been published, Herr Pohl has once and for ever disposed of the difficulties pointed out by Jahn; and the earlier Haydn—concerning whom "little or nothing" was known, as distinguished from the "Papa Haydn" whom "every one knows," or professes to know—stands revealed in his youthful struggles and disappointments, his subsequent successes and growing fame, together with the "prevailing circumstances and influences," above alluded to, which have in any way affected the career of our composer during the period in question. It is essentially a human picture which Herr Pohl draws of his hero. He does not attempt to idealise his subject at the expense of historic truth, nor does he at any juncture of his narrative indulge in what frequently passes as "ingenious combination" on the part of some biographical authors—who, if they cannot discover a definite motive for certain manifestations of genius, supply one—unless there be a solid foundation of fact to support his surmises. In a sober, systematic, almost matter-of-fact style the biographer traces the career of our composer from a "singing-boy" to an orchestral member, and thence to an orchestral conductor, confined, in the latter capacity, during a period of some thirty years to the service and the residence of the princely house of Esterhazy. An uneventful life enough, so far, wherewithal to fill two good-sized volumes. But, in his apparently mere chronicling treatment of events, Herr Pohl betrays the subtle hand of an artist. By means of the admirable grouping of his well-digested facts, and of the symmetrical arrangement of his elaborate detail studies regarding the general art history of the period with which he deals, the author enables the reader to arrive at a most vivid conception of the whole personality of his hero as a creative genius, and a generous, kind-hearted, lovable individuality. On comparatively rare occasions only does Herr Pohl add slight but telling touches of his own to the portrait which otherwise he allows the reader to form for himself, tending either to add an expression to the features which might otherwise pass unobserved, or to point out a special significance of certain phases in the artistic development of the composer. Considering the almost marvellous industry and untiring care displayed by the author in collecting, sifting, and finally selecting the materials for his work, it is scarcely surprising that an interval of six years should have elapsed between the publication of the first and the present second volume. With such results before us we have no reason to complain of being kept so long in suspense. Although the work will be complete only by the addition of a third volume, comprising indeed the most important creative activity of the master, it does not require the gift of prophecy to predict for Herr Pohl's "Haydn" a foremost place amongst the standard artist biographies of our time.

In the second volume of his work (a detailed notice of the preceding one will be found in vols. xvii. and xviii. of this journal) the biographer deals with twenty-three years of yoke on the part of Haydn as capellmeister to the Princes Esterhazy, embracing the period from 1767 to 1790. During this time the composer was but rarely permitted to pay even a flying visit to his beloved Kaiserstadt Vienna, the musical and intellectual centre of Southern Germany in those days, in order to enjoy the stimulating society of congenial friends, and to observe at the fountain-head the musical current of the age. Nevertheless, his isolation at Esterházy, where at least he was the supreme ruler of a small but excellent orchestra, was, in other respects also, by no means the mere prison it has been described, wherein his genius languished until it was set free by the composer's visit to England. Indeed, Haydn himself would in after years look back with satisfaction upon the years of undisturbed, harmonious development of his artistic individuality spent at Esterházy, under the surrounding circumstances of which he was "bound to become original." The significance of this fact may be easily tested by a glance at the numerous operas, written to Italian librettos, which Haydn produced for the gratification of the varied artistic tastes of his revered prince. That he had no mean estimation of his own talents as a dramatic composer is apparent from more than one of his utterances on the subject. Thus he remarked, on the eve of his life, to his friend Griesinger: "Instead of the many quartets, sonatas, and symphonies, I ought to have written more vocal music, as I might have been one of the foremost operatic writers." And to his publisher, Artaria, he writes, on another occasion, with reference to two operatic works just completed: "I assure you, the like of this has not yet been heard in Paris, and perhaps not in Vienna either; my misfortune only is my residing in the country." That which the dear master, at any rate in such moments, deemed to be his loss has been the world's gain. His operas are, one and all, cast in the traditional mould of the older Italian school, and are now of value only to the musical antiquarian. As Herr Pohl aptly remarks: "We must feel grateful, in the interest of the development of German music, that Haydn little more than touched upon Italian opera, and that his wish to go to Italy was not gratified. He would there, under most favourable conditions, have become a successful imitator, hardly a reforming leader; for he lacked that higher degree of dramatic conception, the characteristic delineation and objective insight, which are indispensable to the dramatic tone-poet." The number of compositions, apart from his operas, produced by Haydn during the period above mentioned, would seem incredible were it not for the fact that much of it had been written to serve a passing purpose—for festivities in one form or another were the order of the day at Esterházy—and consequently bears an ephemeral character. Still, many a true gem will be found amongst them which has preserved its youthful freshness to this hour. Herr Pohl enumerates, as emanating from this period, sixty-three symphonies, twenty-one divertimentos, forty-four string quartets, sixteen concertos, twenty-eight sonatas for pianoforte and six for violin, thirteen pianoforte trios, five masses, and numerous cantatas, songs, and minor compositions. An analysis of the more important of these productions, dating from what may be termed the composer's middle period of his creative activity, is contained in a separate division of the volume, of which it forms not the least valuable and instructive feature.

Among the number of "symphonies" just mentioned, the famous "Kinder-Symphonie" (known in this country as the "Toy Symphony") is included, concerning the origin of which, although a trifle in itself, it may not be uninteresting to hear Herr Pohl's account. Haydn wrote this musical jeu d'esprit in the year 1788. "How it originated?" asks Herr Pohl—"well, the thing speaks for itself, and willingly we follow the tradition on the subject. At the festively decorated fair we see the country-people making their purchases for the house and family. Kitchen, cellar, the living-rooms, and their inmates: all are thought of. A motley throng there is; every one praises his wares, every one seeks and finds what he may want for himself and others. The lover thinks of his sweetheart, and she of him; the husband of his wife, and she of the children. And of the latter there are here enough and to spare. From merely gazing at the wonders around them they proceed to make a selection, and whatever produces a noise of some description they are sure to like best. One of the boys imitates the note of the cuckoo, another blows the trumpet, a third has discovered the screeching night-owl, a fourth exerts himself with a rattle; but the drum produces more noise than all the rest. Haydn (for he, as a matter of course, is amongst the crowd) is in the best of humours, but more than with anything else is he pleased with the children who with so much genuine enjoyment are meddling with his art. He buys every one his favourite instrument, and finally, for himself, an entire septet, for already the waggish spirit has been stirred up in him. Returning to his room, he places his collection in proper order before him, seizes pen and paper, and adds to the various instrumental parts, by way of cementing links, those for a bass and two violins. His work finished, he summons a portion of his orchestra to an important rehearsal for the coming morning. The rehearsal in question was an unusually protracted one, since, for the first time in their lives, the musicians, admirably trained though they were, broke down at the very commencement, and had to begin again and again, in consequence of ever-recurring fits of laughter. This was Haydn's 'Kinder-Symphonie,' the play of marionettes transferred upon instruments. The original 'orchestral' parts bear the superscription, Sinfonia Berchtoldsgadensis, so called after the well-known little market-town in Bavaria famous of old for its toys." The story as here told is a pretty one, and bears repetition. It is, moreover, whatever the extent of its literal accuracy may be, eminently characteristic of the composer's naïve humour and kindly simplicity of heart. The mere fact of the "Toy Symphony" having been produced at this period goes far to prove that the "abject slavery" wherein the master is supposed to have been held at Esterházy had at all events not succeeded in crushing that spirit of playful humour which Haydn himself defines in the words, "one is seized by a certain waggishness which cannot be subdued." Indeed, so far from being monotonous and dreary, the master's life at the residence of the Esterházys abounded in artistically stimulating influences and occurrences, while his chief troubles would seem to have arisen at his own domestic hearth.

The reader will be glad also to hear, through Herr Pohl, that the current accounts of Haydn's poverty up to an advanced age are much exaggerated: "Haydn's pecuniary position, although by no means commensurate to his high merit as an artist and to the services he was expected to render, has been far too gloomily represented. In addition to his income as capellmeister, many of the sums realised by his compositions can be accurately ascertained. Up to the end of the seventh decade of the past century we cannot, it is true, state with certainty that Haydn derived any pecuniary benefit whatever from compositions of his published at Leipzig, Berlin, Speyer, Amsterdam, Paris, and London. After that period, however, we find out in many cases how Haydn managed the matter, and how well he understood the business side of the question. Let us consider, in the first place, his connection with Artaria. Thus Haydn received for three pianoforte trios ten ducats each 'as usual'; for twelve minuets with trios, twelve ducats ( $\approx 4\frac{1}{2}$  florins); for the well-known Capriccio in C, twenty-four ducats ('the price is somewhat high,' Haydn adds, but assures Artaria that he will make his profit by it nevertheless). For six pianoforte trios he was paid 300 florins. For six string quartets (1784) Haydn agrees to accept likewise 300 florins, although 'I usually received more than 100 ducats when publishing by subscription, which sum Herr Willmann (of Paris) has also offered to pay me.' For the following six quartets (1788) 'the old price of 100 ducats remains.' These payments were for those days by no means inconsiderable, although on one occasion Haydn, in a letter to Artaria, complains of 'not being paid sufficiently,' and of being obliged, in consequence, to seek to derive some further remuneration from his pieces directly they had left the engraver's hands, he having a greater right thereto than the middle-men in the trade. . . . It was a matter of paramount necessity with publishers in those days, when copyrights were as yet unknown, to protect their interests as much as possible. Hence their first object was to make sure of their composer. Documents framed for that purpose are still in the possession of the firm of Artaria. In one of these Haydn engages (1790) to hand over to that firm the original manuscript of three pianoforte trios, with all rights of sole proprietorship, for the sum of 135 florins, upon condition, moreover, that the composer should 'neither here nor elsewhere dispose of them to others.' Shortly after his having become connected with Artaria (1780), Haydn corresponded also with Paris firms (Willmann, Nadermann, Sieber), to whom he sold his symphonies, quartets, and pianoforte pieces, likewise at a good price, as also with London publishers (with Forster, who, in the year 1786, paid him £70 for several works; Longman and Broderip, and with Bland). These were in many instances the same works over again, and from which he thus derived a threefold profit. . . . If, nevertheless, Dies maintains that Haydn had been in want up to his sixtieth year, the statement is, to say the least, exaggerated. Griesinger, however, goes still further in maintaining that Haydn had, up to the period of his departure for London, either derived no benefit at all from his compositions or that they had been considerably underpaid; an assertion which the above items sufficiently disprove. Griesinger likewise tells us that on the eve of his departure the composer's available capital scarcely amounted to two thousand florins. This we can readily believe, and rather question whether the composer really possessed as much. For we need only call to mind the kind of domestic management on the part of his wife, the frequent calls made upon Haydn's purse for the support of his poor relatives, upon one of whom, a most worthless fellow, he expended by degrees a sum of over five thousand florins! There was, moreover, his invalid brother Johann, whom likewise he supported unceasingly." The kind, generous-hearted master might well be occasionally in want himself who so bounteously administered to the wants of others!

"We have seen before," continues the biographer in his vindication of the far more favourable view he takes of Haydn's position generally, while in the service of the Esterházy family, as compared with that hitherto accepted—"we have seen before that Haydn himself acknowledged the advantage of having an orchestra always at hand; it was to him a living score where he might reject or add at pleasure. He, consequently, rarely surrendered a work of his for publication before he had subjected it to this most sure test. Thus, in sending a series of symphonies to Artaria, he expressly remarks: 'I have myself tried them over with my orchestra.' And on another occasion: 'The quartets, which I have had played through this very day, will be forwarded to you.' In the absence of a public, properly so called, Haydn had to attach the more weight to the approval of his orchestra, whose sympathy supplied him with the stimulating element necessary for his artistic creations. And, surely, happy hours they were to him of pure gratification and satisfaction when he could read in the face of his little army of subjects the effect he desired to be produced by some new work. If then his Prince, too, approved of it, his work had not been done in vain, and mightier and mightier still grew the impulse to widen and to firmly establish the self-created paths. Like his brother Michael, the Abbé Vogler would often remark that if Haydn was to be envied it was for his position, wherein, with his talents, he was bound to become a great man. There can be no doubt, too, that our composer himself felt, on the whole, happy in the situation in which he had been placed." Nor does the author fail to make good this assertion in the course of his more detailed account of his hero's position, of which we will now endeavour to give a brief outline.

Of Esterházy itself, where our composer spent so considerable a portion of his life, a most glowing description is given by his biographer. Originally a small mansion, situated in the district of Oedenburg (Lower Hungary), in a marshy region, and frequented by the members of the princely family only during the hunting season, it had been converted by Prince Nicolaus into a palatial residence of truly royal splendour and magnificence. It had been the ambition of this pleasure-loving prince to create in his Hungarian home a second Versailles, and even fastidious French travellers of the period have freely borne testimony to his signal success in this respect. "Perhaps, with the exception of Versailles," one French eye-witness writes, "there is no place in all France which in respect of splendour could be compared to this." And in a similar manner a French ambassador, Prince Rohan, expressed his admiration, exclaiming: "In Esterházy I have found Versailles again." From the imposing and magnificently decorated principal mansion, designed in Italian style, the visitor to Esterházy beheld, extending for miles in the rear of the building, luxuriously laid-out gardens and pleasure-grounds emerging into an extensive wood, rich in varied foliage, and populated with deer and pheasants, an occasional hermitage or fanciful edifice inviting to rest or shelter. Adjoining one of the wings of the main building stood the opera-house, and on the opposite side the marionette theatre, the latter affording a species of diversion much in vogue in those days. A restaurant, too, had been provided, where the artists were wont to assemble, and from whence they could stroll through the various hothouses filled with all kinds of exotic plants. The opera-house, which again was decorated and furnished in excellent taste, was capable of holding some 400 spectators, among whom the princely officials and minor servants formed a regular contingent. Here, performances took place daily during the Prince's stay at Esterházy, opera being produced twice every week, and drama or comedy during the remaining days. A list, appended by Herr Pohl to the present volume, of the performances given at this magnificent private establishment during one year (1778) sufficiently testifies both to the relative excellence of these representations, and the enormous expenditure they must have involved. The personnel of the opera consisted of five or six male and as many female singers (mostly Italians), who, together with the members of the orchestra and others connected with the theatre, resided in a building specially set apart for them: "The orchestra numbered, on the average, from sixteen to twenty-two members, there being two or at most three first and as many second violins, two violas, two contrabasses, one violoncello. Among the wind instruments were flutes, oboes, bassoons, and French horns (of the latter generally four), and, according to requirements, trumpets and kettledrums (clarinets were employed only during the years 1776-78). The rehearsals were held in the morning, performances before the Prince or his guests took place in the afternoon; mixed 'academies' (vocal and instrumental) sometimes in the evenings. On specially festive occasions the grand saloon was used for the 'table-music,' an institution which, according to the then prevailing custom, existed also at the imperial court. At smaller family dinners one or two singers or virtuosi were heard in the private apartments. For his own person the Prince reserved the string quartet, which performed exclusively in the private music-room, Tomasini, the Prince's favourite, invariably occupying the principal desk. Here also it was where the Prince, surrounded by his most intimate friends, was wont to play those pieces for the 'baryton' specially composed for him by Haydn, Tomasini, Kraft, and Pichl." The above modest proportions of the orchestra should, as Herr Pohl also points out, be borne in mind if we would gain a proper estimate of Haydn's earlier symphonies, which in the hands of an orchestra of modern dimensions are apt to become entirely crushed. "The uniformity of life in general at Esterházy was frequently interrupted by visitors of the highest distinction, whose presence gave rise to all manner of private entertainments or brilliant festivities. On such occasions, as well as on the specially commemorative days and anniversaries of the princely family, music invariably took the leading part, and it was Haydn who had to arrange and provide for everything. He had, moreover, to superintend the rehearsals of the Opera and of the orchestra, to study their parts with the singers, to replace such artists as were leaving the company, to settle disputes that arose amongst them or to check their arrogant pretensions, to be their petitioner with the prince when in need; nay, even to look after the prompter. 'Concerning the music and acteurs, and likewise the prompting,' says one of the regulations of the time, 'Kapellmeister Haiden will do the needful, and know how to uphold order.' Burdened with such manifold and harassing duties, one may well be surprised how our composer was yet able to write, at the same time, such numerous works, and to retain for himself the necessary predisposition and cheerfulness." Haydn's position also occasionally involved the obligation of his giving musical instruction in one or the other of the families related to his prince. That his services in this direction, however, were not unrequited may be gathered from the fact that on one occasion Count Erdödy, "as a token of his pupil's satisfaction," presented the master with a carriage, and a pair of horses to boot, for the maintenance of which the Prince generously granted him the necessary means, and of which Haydn made frequent use afterwards. It must be remembered also that it was only during the Prince's stay at Esterházy that the full exercise of our composer's duties was called into requisition, although, owing to the former's predilection for his "Hungarian Versailles," his annual residence there was sometimes considerably prolonged, much to the dismay of the artists, as has been so touchingly demonstrated by their beloved conductor and advocate in his "Farewell" symphony. Readers interested in the true origin (of which so many different versions are extant) of this characteristic piece we must refer to the circumstantial narrative given by Herr Pohl. Assuming an acquaintance with the symphony itself, it will suffice to quote the concluding paragraphs of the story as here given, and which, in connection with our above remarks, will easily explain its general purport. One by one, with downcast looks, the performers have put out their lights, and, in accordance with the instructions contained in their parts, have left the orchestra. "The few remaining candles," continues the narrator, "are extinguished, the last violinist has marched off, and Haydn, too, is about to follow, when the Prince, who has watched the proceedings at first with some estrangement, walks up to him, shaking him by the hand, and saying with some emotion: 'I think I have discerned your intention in all this; the musicians are longing to go home. Well, then, to-morrow we will get ready.'" Many of the artists, it should be added, had their families living at some distance from Esterházy. "In the anteroom, full of expectation, the orchestral members await the arrival of their chief, whose beaming looks, as he enters, soon tell of the happy issue; and it is needless to depict the scene which ensues, to describe how every one, the bachelors included, are thronging around him to press his hands, and how Haydn himself is scarcely able to hide his emotion—a happy father among happy children." The affectionate intercourse which existed between the composer and his orchestra was indeed one of the chief elements which sweetened his existence at Esterházy. The vicinity of the place, too, afforded many delightful walks, of which the master would naturally avail himself as often as he could; he whose mind, like that of every truly creative artist, was so susceptible to the beauties of nature. "They must," says his sympathetic biographer, "have offered him a compensation for the many toilsome hours which his position brought with it, a compensation, too, for the lack of domestic happiness; they must have inspired him with that blissful innermost tranquillity which so eloquently speaks to us in many a one of his devotion-inspiring adagios."

These then were, briefly stated, the surrounding circumstances in which our composer moved during his twenty-three years' residence at Esterházy. If they were to him, in a sense, years of imprisonment, it must be admitted that the prison was admirably suited to the harmonious development of an individuality such as his. Placed in the midst of an artistic life such as rarely, if ever, gathered around the private establishment of any other wealthy patron, constantly breathing the stimulating atmosphere of art-enterprise in one form or another, himself at the head of a small but excellent and most devoted orchestra, the honoured servant of a prince of refined tastes, who took a pride in his already famous capellmeister—he was at least free to devote himself entirely to his art, and to mature in the quietude of his chamber those artistic impressions which his mind could not fail plentifully to receive even during the exercise of his certainly arduous professional duties. Haydn, with all these advantages, was, in fact, in an exceptionally favoured position as compared with many another musician of talent, and perhaps genius, of his time, whose life was ingloriously spent in the obscurity of the retinue of one of the many art-affecting noblemen of the period. Nor were the proud words, written by our composer during his very stay at Esterházy, and addressed to a Viennese society, viz.: "The free arts, and the fine science of composition, tolerate not the fetters of handicraft; free must be both mind and soul"; nor were these uttered by a man who was not himself conscious of the possession of such freedom as he demanded for the proper exercise of his creative faculties. It was time that the erroneous impressions which so long prevailed concerning Haydn's position with the princely house of Esterházy were removed, and the latter's share in the career of our composer placed in its true light. This has now been effectually done by Herr Pohl, who has succeeded in presenting in a new and altogether more cheerful aspect the twenty-three years of the composer's career with which he deals in the present volume of his admirable work. For this fact alone all lovers of dear "Papa Haydn" will feel grateful to him, while it furnishes another proof of the accuracy of Otto Jahn's assertion, viz., that "concerning the earlier Haydn little or nothing" had hitherto been known.

We have already drawn attention to Herr Pohl's interesting analyses of the works produced by the composer during the period covered by the present volume, as also to the valuable contributions to the general art-history of the time which it contains. We can only regret that space does not permit us further to enlarge upon these topics at present. The promised final volume—if indeed Herr Pohl find himself able to compress his material into that space—will be looked forward to with the greater interest by English readers since it will embrace the two important visits of the composer to London, whereof an attractive account has already been rendered by the author some fifteen years ago in his monography, "Haydn in London." Its appearance, and with it the completion of one of the best standard biographies of the world's great masters, may also afford us an opportunity of reverting more especially to the results of the extraordinary creative activity manifested by a composer whose name is justly inscribed in history as that of the father of the string-quartet and the symphony.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XII.—ROSSINI (continued from page 432).

M. AZEVEDO gives some interesting particulars—for which he claims the best authority—with regard to the symphony and quartet placed by some writers among Rossini's earliest works. The "symphony," we are told, was nothing more than an overture (sinfonie) composed in the style of that to Mozart's "Die Zauberflöte," with which the young Italian was enchanted. Upon the matter of the quartet and a companion work, let M. Azevedo himself speak:—

"With regard to the quartet for strings it appears, from investigation in the best quarter, that it was only an arrangement for double-bass, accompanied by other stringed instruments, of certain vocal pieces composed by Rossini, and was due to the request of an amateur, Triossio of Ravenna, for whom he wrote a Mass about the same time. This Mass was performed, under the author's direction, in one of the Ravenna churches, during the fair at that town. It is for male voices, with soli and chorus, orchestra and organ. The artists of the theatre sang the soli, and the orchestra was led by Count Capi, a distinguished amateur of the violin. The getting together of that orchestra caused diverting scenes. A large number of amateurs attended the fair, and all were anxious to take part in such a musical solemnity. They came with eleven flutes, seven clarinets, five oboes, and nine bassoons. It was like the ordinary experience of a picnic, where each person brings something to eat, and it is found that the bill of fare contains nothing but pâtés and melons. Long and laborious negotiations were required to get rid of this superabundance of good things."

We have now to follow Rossini as, emancipated from school and college, he goes out into the world to fight his way, armed with youthful energy and hope, plenty of assurance and abundance of talent. Biographers disagree about the manner in which he obtained his first operatic commission. Stendhal inclines to believe, but is not quite sure, that the family Perticari secured it for him by their influence. Fétis asserts this positively, but Azevedo declares that Rossini was unacquainted with the Perticari till some time later. According to the last-named writer, the young master's friend was the Marquis Cavalli, with whom, it will be remembered, he had such a curious rencontre at Sinigaglia. Cavalli did not ignore his promise to the impudent boy who dared to laugh at the favourite prima donna, but—when reminded of it—gave him a commission to write a farza, or opera buffa, in one act, for the San Mosè Theatre at Venice. A word as to this theatre is necessary here, in order to show the kind of scene upon which Rossini made his first bow. It was a very small place, with a company and orchestra to correspond. It played small pieces (farze) and gave for them a small price, £8, or with the libretto £10. A chorus was never employed, and the orchestra consisted of twenty-seven instruments, all told—twelve violins, two violas, one violoncello, two double-basses, and the same number of flutes, oboes, clarinets, horns, and bassoons. The solitary violoncello, it may be added, was used to accompany the recitatives, in conjunction with a harpsichord. With these resources our young composer had to deal, and for them he wrote his first opera, "La Cambiale de Matrimonio," libretto by Rossi, who made the story turn upon the giving a promise of marriage in the form of a lettre de change. In preparing the work Rossini was greatly aided by the advice of the buffo Raffanelli—a great man in his day, and one whose experience must have been invaluable to the youthful composer. Partly on this account, no doubt, but more for reasons found in the sparkle and vivacity of the music, "La Cambiale" made a hit, encouraging if not brilliant, and Rossini went back to Bologna in a state of elation, with which, however, the weight of his purse had nothing to do. The theatre paid him £8, out of which he supported himself in the city of the Doges.

At Bologna the young man was not idle. He wrote a scena, "Didone abbandonata," for one of the Mombelli family, those encouragers of his boyish efforts, and he produced also "L' Equivoco stravagante," a comic opera in two acts, which was played at the Bologna Theatre and placed £10 in its author's pocket. The Carnival season of 1812 saw Rossini again in Venice, at the San Mosè, engaged upon

"L' Inganno felice," by which he gained another £10, and something more—fame. Stendhal, who was contemporary with the work, writes of it: "Here genius is everywhere apparent. An experienced eye easily recognises, in this one-act opera, the germs of fifteen or twenty capital pieces which, later, made the fortune of Rossini's masterpieces. 'L' Inganno felice' is like the pictures painted by Raphael on leaving the school of Perugino; one finds in it all the faults and hesitations of early youth. Rossini, with the timidity of his twenty years, dared not yet seek to please himself alone." "L' Inganno" undoubtedly added a stone, and a large one, to the foundation of Rossini's fortune. The vivacious Italian public began to recognise a composer after their own heart in this youth from Bologna, and went about humming his melodies, each man an audible advertisement of the new musical lion. M. Azevedo is very likely correct in stating that a second farza, "Il Cambio della Valigia," was produced during the same season at San Mosè. Stendhal, however, is silent about it, and M. Fétis—not that this matters much—holds his tongue also. Other biographers speak of the work under reserve, but we accept the guarantee of Azevedo on a matter not without importance, since in "Il Cambio," we are assured, the master began to take especial pains with his ensembles, thus putting his hand to a task destined to mark, when achieved, an epoch in the history of Italian opera.

Our young master's next step showed that a genuine ambition possessed him, in the absence of which he might have gone on writing farze for San Mosè and been content. He turned from the lively to what was then understood as the severe, and composed an oratorio or serious opera in two acts on the subject of Cyrus in Babylon. This saw the light at Ferrara during the Lent of 1812, and put a trifle over £8 in the composer's pocket. Some critics affect to see here, as in "L' Inganno," the germs of thoughts fully developed later on in "Mosè," "Semiramide," and other operas of like character. As for M. Fétis, he actually discovered in "Cyrus" the theme of "Ecco ridenti" ("Il Barbiere"), and is the only man who ever did so; the rest of the world seeing it in the first act of "L' Aureliano in Palmira." But M. Fétis, who tried to spread himself over the entire musical world, could not be expected to take much pains about matters of detail. From Ferrara, Rossini betook himself to his old quarters at San Mosè, and wrote "La Scala di Seta" for that house, receiving in exchange the sum of £10. A propos to this work, biographers are again at variance. Stendhal and, after him, Fétis declare that here Rossini played off the joke of making his violinists strike the candle-holders on their desks with the bow. Azevedo says however that these novel coups d'archet were employed later in "I due Bruschini," and thereanent enters into a long disquisition which we shall notice in due time. Meanwhile, it seems strange that, with Rossini living till only a few years since, such contrary assertions were possible. The master had not lost his memory, neither was he beyond access.

Rossini now made a great step in advance. From the little theatres of Venice, Ferrara, and Bologna, he passed at a bound to the huge stage of the Milan Scala, and at once became the idol of a difficult public. The work prepared for this all-important début was "La Pietra del Paragone" ("The Touchstone"), a farcical opera in two acts, libretto by Romanelli. Rossini fully appreciated the call which circumstances now made upon him. He knew how much turned upon the result, and, writing with more confidence than heretofore, did his facile and brilliant genius ample credit. Success came like a flood in consequence. On all sides talk was of the new master. "The opera created," says Stendhal, "an epoch of enthusiasm and gladness at the Scala; people travelled in crowds to Milan from Parma, Bergamo, Brescia, and all the towns within twenty leagues round. Rossini was the first person in the land; all crowded to look at him." Fortunate master to make such a hit at that particular moment. The year was 1812, be it remembered—that in which Napoleon led his huge and motley host to Russia, and left them there beneath the snow. Thousands of young Italians followed, not willingly, the banners of their Emperor-King, and, but for "La Pietra del Paragone," Rossini would probably have been among them. Fancy the "Swan of Pesaro" drowning in the black waters of the Borodino! From risk of such a fate he was happily saved by the Minister of the Interior, who begged the Viceroy, Prince Eugène to remove his name from the conscription list. The prince, a good-natured person, having every reason to please the Italians, at once consented; and so Italy preserved a good composer, and Napoleon, in Rossini's own judgment, lost a bad soldier.

The master received £24 for his Milan work, and, no doubt, took some of this unwonted reward home to his parents, whose pride in the fortune of their gifted son it is both easy and pleasant to imagine. Meanwhile Rossini was represented on another stage than that of the Lombardian City; the Mombelli family, for whom he had composed "Demetrio e Polibio," brought out that very youthful opera in Rome, and subsequently took it with them on their tours, to the great advantage of the "treasury" and not wholly without benefit to the composer, whose name was thus spread far and wide throughout Italy. It might be supposed that such sudden and great success, coming to one so young, stirred up arrogance and pride. Of this result, however, we see no trace. Assuredly there was the reverse of a disposition on Rossini's part to kick down the ladder by which he had climbed, and to ignore little San Mosè, with its £10 fee, because of the big Scala with its £24. After a short rest at home he started again for Venice, and produced "L' Occasione fa il ladra," this being the sixth work in the course of a single year. Surely a noble record, insist as we may upon the facility with which the master wrote and the small dimensions of the things he achieved. In return for so much labour he was paid £75, having with this not only to support his parents, but to defray the cost of his many journeyings. The balance at the end of December could hardly have brought him within the category of moneyed men. Yet the year 1812 was in one sense, a golden time. It placed the youth in full view of Fame and Fortune, each with welcoming smile and beckoning finger.

The next year opened for our hero in strange fashion, and brought him before the Italian public under circumstances of some risk at the moment. According to Azevedo, the manager of La Fenice, at Venice, desired a work from the pen of the composer who was enriching San Mosè, and opened negotiations with Rossini accordingly. The bargain was hard to make. On the one hand, the composer demanded £24 for an opera seria; on the other, the director offered £20. They "split the difference," and so came to terms. Presently, of course, the San Mosè manager, Cera, heard of what was going on, and, alarmed at the prospect of losing Rossini, lost his temper, bullied the young man, and ended by saying that he would give him a bad libretto to set to music for the San Mosè, and arrange that the work at La Fenice should be hissed. Rossini answered little or nothing. He had done no wrong, and he quietly resolved to circumvent the manager in the matter of the bad book, knowing that, though bound by his engagement to set music to any libretto, the sort of music rested with himself, while Italian custom gave him a right to insist upon its performance. In due course, the bad book arrived; Rossini composed his opera, "I due Bruschini," and the first representation was announced. A crowd attended, some being in the secret of the composer's joke, if secret it could be called, while others, who had come from a distance, knew only that they were to hear music by the young and rising composer of "La Pietra del Paragone." Rossini began his pranks in the very overture, the second violinists solemnly striking the tin reverberators of their desks with the bow at the first beat of every bar. At this there was laughter among the knowing part of the audience; surprise and murmurs among the uninformed. The curtain rose, and then the full extent of the joke revealed itself. How far it went, let M. Azevedo tell:—

"Where the accents of tenderness were required he had put those of anger, and, contrariwise, those of tenderness where wrath should have prevailed. The most lugubrious music was set to farcical words, and the most comic strains to serious lines. An artist with a heavy voice was called upon to sing roudades. The bass had only high notes, and the soprano low ones. For the voix de canard of Raffanelli the prodigious mystifier had written the most delicate, elegant, and exquisite phrases; while, to put his vocal qualities in the highest relief, he took the touching precaution to accompany him only with the pizzicati of the quartet. . . . Finally, in an ensemble piece, the ingenious musician so disposed the entries of the voices as to produce the nearly incessant repetition of the last two syllables of the phrase 'Padre mio son pentito.' So well was this done that one heard all the time 'tito, tito, tito,' as though there were no other words, and the audience, joining the singers, repeated with them, 'tito, tito, tito.'"

That there was a row in the house at this genuine farza goes without saying. Shouts of anger and roars of laughter filled the place, while Rossini, keeping his countenance admirably, presided at the harpsichord with the gravity of a man engaged upon a serious task. "I due Bruschini" was not repeated, and the precise language in which Signor Cera commented upon it has, happily, not come down to us. A good deal might be said on Rossini's behalf in this case. He was bound to write music for the bad libretto purposely designed by the manager to damage his prospects at the other theatre. Had he treated it in the ordinary way he would have played into Cera's hands. As it was he blew up that personage with his own petard, and actually made capital out of what was intended to be his ruin. But, in any case, Rossini would have succeeded at La Fenice. The opera he took there was "Tancredi."

On the night of the production of the work which gave Rossini a world-wide fame, the composer shrank from facing a public still sore with regard to the San Mosè joke. He remained at the entrance of the orchestra, allowing the first violin to direct till, as the fresh and enchanting music evoked louder and louder applause, it was thought safe for him to appear. Not a sound of disapprobation arose. His genius had pleaded for him and gained his pardon. Nay, from that moment the young musician was a hero. His melodies, so new and yet so Italian, drove his countrymen wild with delight. As for "Di tanti palpiti," all Venice rang with it the next day. The people seemed to have gone mad. They were "possessed" by the tune as though it had been a demon. We are told that they hummed it even in the courts of justice, despite the "Silence" of ushers and the frowns of judges.

"Tancredi" would be pronounced very old-fashioned now, if it were revived, and many a shaft of ridicule would fly at it. Yet the opera, in 1813, and in Italy, was a distinct advance upon anything previously known, and may have excited misgivings among the obstinately nonprogressive. Here, in fact, Rossini started upon his career as a reformer of the Italian lyric stage—a character not generally discerned in him, but which was his nevertheless, as we shall soon have occasion to find. If it be asked what particular reform the master effected in "Tancredi," the answer is not difficult. He applied to recitative in opera seria the mode of treatment it had long enjoyed in opera buffa, and once for all abolished the dreary tirades which made serious opera a desert of talk, dotted with here and there an oasis of song. Rossini saw no reason why recitative should be musically uninteresting, and therefore caused his artists to declaim to the accompaniment of orchestral melody. The whole opera thus became tuneful. There was no more sandy waste, but grass and flowers from beginning to end. We talk of Gluck as a reformer of the lyric stage, and so he was; but honour also to Rossini, whose recitative marked the beginning of a change in Italian opera which has received, let us hope, its full development in Verdi's "Aida." A propos to "Tancredi," some facts may here be stated on the best and most recent authority. "Di tanti palpiti" is often called the "rice air," because of a tradition that Rossini composed it in the few minutes required to boil his rice. We are assured that the whole story is purely and simply an invention. "The celebrated air of 'Tancredi' was written, like all the others, very rapidly, but without rice of any kind." It is sometimes said, too, that the theme was borrowed from a litany of the Greek Church. As to this, Azevedo remarks: "They have made of it, since its appearance at the theatre and in the world, a cantique for the Catholic church, as they do of all popular airs. But litany before or cantique after, this is not at all the same thing, as one readily understands."

After the brilliant success of "Tancredi," the composer rested awhile; writing nothing during the early part of 1814. When tired of idleness he produced "L' Italiana in Algeri" for the San Benedetto Theatre of Venice; in this work laying his reforming hand upon opera buffa as he had previously done upon opera seria. Here he refined the style, and replaced by elegance and sweetness a good deal of the vulgarity thought to be essential by his predecessors and contemporaries. For "L' Italiana," the master received £28, but he demanded and obtained £32 for its successor "L' Aureliano in Palmira." It was a rising market to which he brought his wares, and £32 seemed no doubt, a considerable sum. But we have changed all that. A popular song-composer would, nowadays, demand more for a ballad, and deserves to have it, when he can get it. Still if one were offered the choice of being Rossini in 1813, or a popular song-composer in 1882, the decision would hardly, we think, be difficult. After "L' Aureliano" came "Il Turco in Italia," produced at the Milan Scala with a somewhat doubtful result. This is attributed by certain biographers to Milanese jealousy of Venetian opinion. Amateurs on the Adriatic had acclaimed "L' Italiana," and therefore it would never do for the Lombardians to echo their cry in re "Il Turco." They must show themselves superior and independent; they must criticise and find fault; they must play the rôle of high and haughty; all which they did with a spirit worthy of a better cause. But if they thought to daunt Rossini, they were much mistaken. He knew exactly the true significance of their attitude, and thought it, to him, of no significance at all. His next opera, "Sigismonde" was a dead failure, and deserved its fate. Then the master became really angry—with himself.

ÆOLIAN MUSIC

By CARL ENGEL.

OUR ÆOLIAN HARP.

SOME of the old traditions indicating a remote antiquity of the Æolian harp are very suggestive. For instance, if a certain record respecting a kind of Æolian harp of the Singhalese is authentic, the instrument must have been known in Ceylon at a time anterior to our Christian era; and, if it was known in Ceylon, there can hardly be a doubt that it was known also in Hindustan. Considering the ancient traditions, it appears highly probable that the Egyptians, Greeks, and other nations of antiquity constructed some kind of Æolian harp; and the conjecture is supported by the fact of similar contrivances being found at the present day among nations whose stage of progress in the art of music is far below that to which those ancient nations had attained. In proof of this assertion the reader may be referred to the Æolian bamboos of the natives of Malacca, and to the Æolian kites of the Stiëns in Siam, and to those of the Chinese.

Almost all our musical instruments appear to have originated in Asia. Indeed, with many of them it is not difficult to trace their Eastern origin, and to discover their prototypes in Asia. Nevertheless, it would be hazardous to conclude from such circumstantial evidence that our Æolian harp is of Eastern origin. At any rate, the Indians in Demerara, South America, construct an instrument of this kind. A specimen which was brought to London consists of a cane about five feet in length, and of a very light weight, the surface of which has been cut on one side into four strips, which, towards one end of the cane, are raised by four little bridges, on which they loosely rest. If properly exposed to the wind, these strips will vibrate so as to emit higher or lower tones, according to the force. Similar contrivances are probably known to other extra-European nations without their having been hitherto observed by European travellers.

Our common Æolian harp is made of various shapes and dimensions. The following construction, which is very simple, is most usually adopted, and answers the purpose better than most others. It consists of an oblong square case, about four feet in length, eight inches broad, and six inches deep, made of pine wood about a quarter of an inch in thickness. The upper side contains the soundboard, and the opposite side is either covered or is left open. Towards each end of the soundboard is glued a bridge, about half-an-inch high, upon which the strings rest. The strings are fastened behind one of the bridges by being looped on metal pins, and behind the other bridge by being wound round screws. The strings are of catgut, and are all of equal thickness, which is nearly the same as that of the A string on the violin. They are tuned in unison, and must be screwed but slightly, so that they are rather slack, but sufficiently stretched to produce a distinct tone. In order to elicit the sound, the Æolian harp is placed in a window partly open, so that the air can sweep over its strings. To obtain a sufficient draught, it is generally necessary to open a door or another window, opposite to the in which the instrument is placed. To direct more exactly the passage of the air against the strings, a thin board may be affixed about three inches above the soundboard. The instrument is generally fastened to the window with a string to prevent its being thrown down by the stream of air. It requires some little experience to ascertain its most favourable position for ensuring the greatest variety in the combinations of sound. According to the swell of the air, the tones—running through the harmonics of the fundamental tone, in a compass occasionally extending to six octaves—will increase and decrease in loudness and in rapidity of succession, with a variety of effects astonishing and charming. As the harmonics become distinctly audible, chords are produced as musically as acoustically interesting. Whenever the power of the current of air abates, the wonderful music subsides into a murmuring unison of all the strings from which it arose.

Heinrich Koch, the author of some well-known works on the theory of music, ascertained that the effect of the Æolian harp was greatly enhanced by the substitution of a few strings covered with wire for the usual ones. The covered strings he tuned an octave lower than the others, which were in unison. The result thereby obtained he compares to that produced by the employment of the pedal in an organ. The covered strings he placed in front, so that they were most exposed to the wind. He likewise succeeded in obtaining new and fine effects by the introduction of some very thin strings tuned an octave above those commonly adopted.

The invention of the Æolian harp is by some writers attributed to Athanasius Kircher, a monk who lived in Rome during the seventeenth century, and who was much interested in making acoustic experiments. Athanasius Kircher is well-known to musicians as the author of "Musurgia Universalis," which appeared in Rome in the year 1650. He contrived, no doubt, an improved Æolian harp, as some others have done, who might with the same right claim to be considered as its inventors. Most probably it was known in Asia long before the Christian era. Some old traditions indicate a high antiquity of the instrument. Sir William Jones ("On the Gods of Greece, Italy, and India"); "Asiatic Researches," vol. i.; Calcutta, 1788) mentions that, in the poem entitled "Magha," the invention of the vina, a stringed instrument of the Hindus, is thus alluded to: "Nareda sat watching, from time to time, his large vina, which by the impulse of the breeze yielded tones that pierced successively the regions of the ear, and proceeded by musical intervals." The god Nareda was the inventor of the vina, the principal national instrument of Hindustan.

Again, according to Rabbinic tradition, King David's harp sounded at midnight, its strings being vibrated by the north wind; and he was in the habit of suspending his harp, during the night, over his couch. This so-called harp, the Hebrew kinnor, was probably a species of lyre, small and easily portable. Incredible as it may appear that King David should have had a current of air over his couch strong enough to cause his kinnor to sound, the tradition is nevertheless noteworthy, inasmuch as it indicates an early acquaintance in the East with the phenomenon exhibited by the Æolian harps. As this remark has already been made in the "Descriptive Catalogue of the Musical Instruments in the South Kensington Museum," it would have been omitted here, were it not of some importance in evidence of the opinion previously advanced.

Furthermore, Sir James Emerson Tennent ("Ceylon: an Account of the Island, Physical and Topographical"; London, 1859) cites a passage from the Mahavanso, a sacred and historical book of the Singha-lese, which is as follows: "The King Prakrama built a palace at the city of Pollanarrua, and the stone-works were carved in the shape of flowers and creeping plants, with golden networks which gave harmonious [euphonious?] sounds, as if they were moved by the wind."

These records will suffice to convince the reader that, at any rate, the phenomenon which originally suggested the construction of our Æolian harp was not unknown to the nations of antiquity.

Howbeit, in the seventeenth century the instrument seems to have almost fallen into oblivion on the Continent, since Athanasius Kircher speaks of it as a new invention in his "Neue Hall-und Ton-Kunst" (Nördlingen, 1684), a work containing explanations of various acoustic experiments elucidated by a number of curious engravings. His Æolian harp consisted of a square box mounted with fifteen thin catgut strings.

According to some English writers, Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, about the middle of the tenth century, invented the Æolian harp. At all events, he constructed a stringed instrument which he hung against a crevice in the wall, to cause the wind passing the crevice to vibrate the strings. The soft and gentle sounds thus emitted by an instrument untouched by human hand so greatly astonished and awed the ignorant people that they accused Dunstan of sorcery. If this tradition may be relied upon, the Æolian harp must have been unknown in England before the tenth century; or, if it had been previously known, it must have fallen into oblivion, just as was the case in the beginning of the eighteenth century, when Alexander Pope, the famous poet, brought it anew before the English nation.

While translating Homer, he occasionally consulted the Commentary upon the Iliad and Odyssey written by Eustathius, in the twelfth century. In this work he happened to come upon a passage in which Eustathius remarks that the wind sweeping over extended strings produces harmonious sounds; which suggested to Pope to make the experiment. He communicated his intention to Mr. Oswald, a professional musician, who consequently endeavoured to cause an old lute to sound by exposing its slackened strings to the wind. The experiment proved, however, entirely unsuccessful, and Oswald was disposed to regard the statement of Eustathius as a myth, until an incident of which he became cognisant put him on the right track. Having learnt by chance that a poor harper, who obtained his living by playing on one of the pleasure boats on the Thames, had observed one stormy day that the wind blowing over the water caused the strings of his harp to sound, Oswald took a hint therefrom, and tried to secure a strong current of air for his lute strings by placing the instrument in an open sash-window. The attempt was successful, and may be regarded as the reinvention of the Æolian harp in England. This happened about the year 1720.

Among the ancient Irish, on the decease of a hero, the harps of his bards emitted, according to popular belief, mournful sounds. J. C. Walker ("Historical Memoirs of the Irish Bards"; London, 1786, p. 100), in alluding to this tradition, remarks: "This is very probable, for the bards, while sorrowing for their patron, usually suspended to trees their neglected harps, from whose loosened strings the passing gales might brush soft plaintive tones. Here we have the origin of the Benshi, an invisible being, which is alleged to be still heard in Ireland and in the Highlands of Scotland, crying most piteously on the death of the descendant of an ancient house." The custom of the Celtic bards of suspending their harps on the trees on occasions of mourning appears also to have been an ancient custom in the East, as may be inferred from Psalm cxxxvi.: "By the river of Babylon, there we sat down; yea, we wept when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof." If the Irish harp suspended emitted sounds, the same was probably the case with the kinnor of the Jews alluded to in the Psalms.

THE RIESENHARFE.

In the year 1787, Captain Haas, in Basle, Switzerland, set up in his garden a gigantic Æolian harp, which suggested itself to him by accident. He was in the habit of shooting with a crossbow at a target which stood in his garden. During rainy weather he not unfrequently amused himself with shooting from his room through an open window which faced the target. To avoid the inconvenience of going to fetch back the discharged arrow, he fixed an iron wire to it, by means of which he could withdraw it at will. Perceiving that when the arrow stuck in the target the wire emitted a distinct sound, he conceived the idea of stretching in his garden fifteen wire strings, from one to two lines in diameter, and three hundred and twenty feet in length, which he placed at a distance of two inches from each other. Their tension was effected by a curious apparatus made on purpose by a friend of the captain. The strings were placed from north to south, and inclined from twenty to thirty degrees. At every change of weather they emitted a variety of sounds, which are described as resembling sometimes the sound of a glass harmonica; sometimes that of water when in a state of ebullition; sometimes that of distant chimes, and, again, sometimes that of an organ. The effect was supposed to be owing to electro-magnetic action. On account of the character of the sound being altered by a change of the weather, the apparatus became known by the name of Wetterharfe ("weather-harp"), as well as by that of Riesenharp ("giant-harp"). Some remarks on the acoustic hints derived from it, by the eminent Professor G. C. Lichtenberg, are published in "Göttinger Taschenkalender," anno 1789.

A somewhat similar contrivance is the armonica meteorologica, which the Abbate Gattoni in Milan constructed in the year 1785—two years before Captain Haas made his Riesenharp or Wetterharfe. The armonica meteorologica is also known by the names of meteorological harp and harpe gigantesque. The ordinary Æolian harp suggested to Abbate Gattoni to expand fifteen wire strings, differing in thickness, from the top of a tower ninety feet high to his dwelling house about two hundred and seventy feet distant. He tuned them, however, not in unison, or in octaves, as those of the Æolian harp are generally tuned; but he adopted a regular diatonic order of intervals. Having ascertained that, owing to atmospheric vicissitudes and other uncontrollable causes, his contrivance proved musically rather unsatisfactory, Gattoni used it only for meteorologic observations, since it predicted by its various sounds the different changes of the atmosphere. Through the invention of the telegraph the phenomenon exhibited by the meteorological harp has become more generally known; at any rate, the sounds of the telegraph wires must be familiar to many persons who are unacquainted with those previous experiments.

INVENTIONS AND SUGGESTIONS.

Although the Æolian harp is not used in our performances of musical compositions, it nevertheless deserves the attention of practical musicians, not only on account of its fascinating sound, but also because its peculiarities have suggested the invention of certain curious musical instruments. The most noteworthy of these contrivances is by Johann Jacob Schnell, a native of Wirtemberg in Germany, living in Paris in the year 1789. He called it anemo-corde. It has a keyboard like the pianoforte. Its strings are of wire, those of the highest three octaves being covered with silk. Each tone has three strings tuned in unison. The compass of the instrument embraces five octaves. The dimensions of the case are: length, seven feet; depth, five feet six inches; height of the stand on which it rests, two feet. The strings are vibrated by a current of air produced by means of two pairs of bellows. The mechanism for conveying the wind to the strings is rather complicated, and remained a secret with the inventor. The brass tubes of the mechanism alone weigh three hundred pounds. By means of two pedals, crescendo and decrescendo can be produced. The quality of sound obtained is described as being remarkably fine, impressive, and especially suited for compositions in a slow movement, and for legato passages. The anemo-corde (also called animo-corde and anemo-chord) created a sensation in Paris. Queen Marie-Antoinette, if history may be trusted, so greatly admired the instrument that she offered J. J. Schnell 150,000 livres for it, which he declined. He sold it, however, in the year 1803, for a large sum to an Englishman, Mr. Robertson, who took it to London, where perhaps remains of it may still be extant. The Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, vol. i., p. 39 (Leipzig, 1798), contains a description of the anemo-corde, with an illustration, and with some biographical notices of its inventor. It is stated that he employed eight assistants during four years to complete the instrument.

The piano-éolien, manufactured by Henri Herz in Paris about the middle of the present century, is not a new invention, though, no doubt, an improvement upon the anemo-corde made by J. J. Schnell. It exhibits one of the means which in the present century have occasionally been resorted to for prolonging the sound of stringed instruments provided with a keyboard. The sound of the piano-éolien is sustained by the application of a current of air to the strings.

The "Pianoforte with Æolian Attachment," invented by Obed Mitchell Coleman, and patented by him in London in the year 1844, contains reeds acted upon by wind. The reeds are placed at the bottom of the case of a pianoforte. The action of the pianoforte can be withdrawn and replaced at pleasure. This is not the place to notice the numerous Æolian instruments with vibrating reeds, a description of which would require much space, and appears unnecessary, considering that every musician is familiar with some members of the large harmonium family.

Another so-called invention, which is noteworthy in the present survey, is the Æolian Monochord, patented by F. J. Julyan in London in the year 1854. This instrument is described as follows: "After making a variety of experiments relating to the effect of wind upon musical strings, Mr. F. J. Julyan discovered a very simple and practicable means of causing strings and wires in a state of tension to vibrate without the agency of either percussion or friction—in fact, without touching them. The motive-power employed is a small current of air, either from the human mouth or from a wind-chest, being made to impinge upon the string and into a narrow slit or groove immediately under it, the groove being quite parallel to the string and extending one-tenth along the length of it, leaving nine-tenths of the string available for fingering or attaching to it a sound-board, the rapid alternate rarefaction and condensation of the air at the slit or mouthpiece performing a part equivalent to the bow of a violin, and sustaining the sound as long as the wind continues to act upon it. We have seen it applied to a soundboard and organ-pipes; and we have seen and heard an Æolian Monochord which has one bass string fifteen inches long, one end of which is fixed over a mouthpiece one and a half inches long, in the manner described above. It is held in the same position as a flute, and is blown with the breath. Three chromatic octaves can be produced on this very simple instrument. The tones are of a peculiar kind, and of excellent quality." See also the description given in "Patents for Inventions: Abridgments of Specifications relating to Music and Musical Instruments; A.D. 1694-1861. Printed by order of the Commissioners of Patents" (London, 1864), p. 205.

This contrivance may be regarded as an offspring of the Æolian harp. Would it not be possible to construct a really useful stringed instrument blown through a mouth-tube? If such a combination of a stringed and wind instrument contained the diatonic and chromatic intervals, and permitted the production of chords, we might have compositions written for it with special regard to the characteristics exhibited by the Æolian harp.

Attention must now be drawn to a discovery which is likely to lead to the invention of an instrument of great importance in the musical performances of future generations. In the beginning of the year 1875 Mr. Baillie-Hamilton communicated to the Musical Association in London his experiments on the application of wind on stringed instruments, in which he advocated the expedient of using the tongue of a so-called free reed in connection with a string. By way of introduction to his explanations, he remarked: "There seems to have been a feeling in all times that the combination of wind and string in music would afford some strangely beautiful result. The very words themselves suggest many pleasing ideas, and these are to a great measure embodied in the string of the Æolian harp. There we have a string excited by a natural draught of air, which is sufficient to stir it without restraining those vibrations which afford the sweet but fitful series of Æolian sounds. But all efforts that have been made to secure and confine these sounds have destroyed their sweetness with the very means that destroyed their freedom; and so this string became almost the symbol of what is most beautiful and most uncontrollable."

The previous efforts alluded to aimed chiefly at concentrating an artificial draught of air upon the whole or part of a string. Generally the string so exposed was flattened to increase the "bite" of the wind, and the flattened portion was set over a corresponding slit. In connecting the tongue of a "free reed" with a string, the former does not necessarily interfere with the vibration of the latter, and the string thus moved can be controlled by "stopping," as in a violin.

It would require too much space here to notice the further development which this interesting discovery has experienced since the time when the above communication was made. The details are hardly requisite for a short survey. On the other hand, some description must be given at least of one playable instrument which in its construction and its quality of tone reminds us of Æolian music, occasioned by the wind blowing sideways against a crevice in a rock, or against a hole in a tree.

In the year 1816, Wilhelm Engel, in Berlin (not a relation of the present writer), constructed a musical instrument which he called Flaschenorgel, and which contained as many empty glass bottles as are requisite for the production of a chromatic succession of tones extending through five and a-half octaves. Two pairs of bellows, situated at the right side of the instrument, were worked by means of a pedal, which produced a current of air through a tube over the mouths of the bottles. The Flaschenorgel had the shape of a pianoforte, and was provided with a keyboard. Its sound is said to have been pure, agreeable, and flute-like. Rapid passages—nay, even shakes and other embellishments—could be executed on the instrument with great precision and distinctness. Its compass was:—

Perhaps it may be conjectured that the manner in which the Pandean pipe and the German flute are blown suggested the invention of the Flaschenorgel. However, it admits of no doubt that also those instruments exhibit a principle traceable in the Æolian music of nature, which existed before the ingenuity of man contrived the instruments. An Æolian tube similar to the bulu-pârindu of the Malaysians is unknown in European countries. The howling and screaming of the wind through the crevices of a dilapidated building, or through a loosely shut window and ill-fitting door, represents its effects in the most primitive state, and the remembrance of discomfort with which such concerts are often associated sufficiently accounts for there being no instance on record of attempts to develop them artistically. Still, there are occasionally pure and musically effective sounds discernible in this chaos of wild music.

Again, the noise of the wind blowing through a bed of reeds, or through the branches of trees, is not unfrequently very soothing, and intermixed with flute-like and fascinating tones. Perhaps it originally suggested the construction of the most primitive Æolian musical instrument. If this conjecture is well-founded, the mysterious sounds of the Wild Huntsman, so famous in Teutonic mythology, might not improperly be regarded as the earliest Æolian music of nature.

Perhaps some ingenious adept in acoustics will one day separate all the musically effective sounds adverted to from the chaos which encumbers them, and will construct a room for them at a distance from the dwelling-house, in a garden or park, where they may be listened to without one's running the risk of catching a cold. If the tones of the bulu-pârindu are so organ-like as they are said to be, we might take a hint from the Malaysians in the construction of this music-room, and combine the Æolian organ with the Æolian harp. However, some instruments of percussion ought likewise to be made use of to complete this orchestra of nature. The purity and sustained sound peculiar to some instruments of percussion constructed by Asiatic nations from a metallic compound resembling our bell metal are very remarkable and deserving of attention. Little bells, similar to those which adorn the roofs of the Buddhist temples, might be suspended in rows in a large frame, each row producing a distinct chord. There would be no difficulty in arranging the frame in such a manner that a single row of bells was always exposed to the influence of the wind. This could easily be accomplished by means of a pivot and a vane, which, as we have seen, is the expedient resorted to by the Malaysians in constructing a certain Æolian wind instrument. Nay, the Malayan invention might be adopted, and further perfected so as to yield sweet harmony, and its chords might be regulated in conformity with the attuned bells, and thus advantageously form part of the extraordinary orchestra in question. Whenever the wind changed, or veered from one direction to another, different chords would be heard in more or less rapid succession. The chords, in combination with the sounds of a number of Æolian harps, perhaps supported by the fundamental-bass tones of a genuine Riesenharpfe extending a long distance through an open place near the building, would produce an effect which might be compared to that which is derived from the beautiful designs and colours displayed by the kaleidoscope. The want of a musical composition would be in some measure atoned for by the exquisite delicacy and fascinating quality of sound obtained.

Furthermore, we might have Æolian concerts in the clouds, and far better ones than those which the Chinese produce with their kites. Perhaps we may enjoy such treats when the construction and management of the balloon shall have attained to the degree of perfection which renders the vehicle serviceable for travelling through the air instead of by land or water. The announcement by Æolian music of the arrival or departure of a passenger balloon would certainly be preferable to the signals by the steam-whistle of a railway train. If such aerial music, dying away in the skies, in any degree resembles that of the harp of Orpheus ascending to heaven, described in Spenser's "Ruins of Time," it must be delightful indeed. In depicting a vision, Spenser says:—

I saw an harp strung all with silver twine,
And made of gold and costly ivory;
At length out of the river it was rear'd,
And borne above the clouds to be divin'd;
Whilst all the way most heavenly noise was heard
Of the strings stirred with the warbling wind.

This highly poetical and beautiful conception, which forms the conclusion of the present discussion, will compensate the reader, it is hoped, for the shortcomings which no doubt he has discovered in some of the previous statements, explanations, and conjectures.

THE close of the London Season gives us an opportunity of recalling several of those unostentatious appeals to music-lovers which the constant strain upon our critical staff compels us at the time either to recognise with a few kindly words or, most reluctantly, to pass over altogether. We trust therefore it will not be considered that we at all under-rate the efforts of the many artists who have given concerts or Recitals of classical music, because they have not received that attention from us which they assuredly deserve; but the fact is that public musical performances of much interest are growing so rapidly that it is impossible even for journals solely devoted to the art to keep pace with them; and an assurance of our sympathy with the cause so practically advocated must be accepted therefore in lieu of separate notices of the individual talent displayed. One Association, however, demands more than a mere record of its name, not only on account of the creative talent evinced at its concerts, but because it is established solely for the purpose of bringing forward new compositions which, but for its aid, might never be heard. We allude to the "Musical Artists' Society," under the presidency of his Grace the Duke of Beaufort, the meetings of which are held in the concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music. At the concerts of this Association the activity of our English composers is unmistakably shown by the performance of original works of such undoubted merit, as to make us wonder why they should not find a place in the programmes of some of the many Chamber Concerts given during the season. Even admitting the difficulty of a man becoming a prophet in his own country, there can be no reason why his countrymen should refuse to hear what he has to say; and if the "Musical Artists' Society" can help to show the public how much excellent music is ignored from mere blind prejudice, it will do good work in the cause, and deserve the thanks of all well-wishers to the progress of healthy art.

Now that the idea of supplying musical entertainments to the working classes at merely nominal rates of admission has assumed so practical a form, there can be little doubt that, side by side with this movement, the project of giving choral instruction at an equally cheap rate will take root and flourish. Already it has been decided that halls shall be rented for giving People's Concerts; but, in addition to this, choral classes are rapidly being established, in order, as it is said, "not only to encourage the people to find recreation in hearing music, but to find an added pleasure in its actual performance." This is, indeed, one more—and a highly important—step in the right direction; but it has occurred to us that those who have the cause at heart, and spare neither money nor trouble to aid it, have still something worthy of engaging their attention, which may lead to excellent results. It is, of course, good to form choral classes for the working people, but it ought to be recollected that each member must be provided with the compositions to sing from; and the next charitable act, therefore, should be to organise a musical library in connection with the classes, and under the control of a committee, where members may obtain the loan of works, either gratuitously or at an extremely moderate charge. To carry out this project, the public should be requested not only to purchase and present compositions for the use of the classes, but to forward surplus copies of any works they may possess, which will be available for the intended purpose. In clearing out an accumulation of choral music which may no longer be of any service to the owner, it is good to know that a place is in existence where these pieces will be cordially welcomed; and if a musical library such as we propose were once to be established, we feel convinced that but a short time would elapse before most of the standard works would be freely placed at the disposal of the committee.

THE letter respecting the pitch of a tenor note when written with the treble clef, to which we recently replied, is only one of many on the same subject constantly forwarded to us. It may be a convenience to amateurs that the C clefs should be dispensed with in modern music; but there can be no question that writing all vocal parts with only the treble and bass clefs causes much confusion, especially amongst those who have not received a sound education in the art. Four-part music, it is true, usually appears with an intimation that the tenor part is an octave lower; but the habit of singing songs written in the treble staff makes unthinking tenor vocalists believe that the notes before them are actually sounded. A knowledge of the great staff of eleven lines, with the true places of the various clefs, would unquestionably obviate this difficulty, and we are glad, therefore, to find that in most of the elementary examinations of the present day questions upon this subject are invariably included. That there should be any doubt on the matter (even with amateur vocalists), however, appears extraordinary; for assuredly no tenor can imagine that the ut de poitrine with which operatic singers astonish an audience is the same note as that sung in the high part of the register by a soprano. An accurate knowledge of the pitch of the C clef, wherever it may be placed in the staff, cannot be too strongly urged upon the attention of singers. We do not desire that they shall read only from music printed with this clef; but no person calling himself a vocalist should be as ignorant of the subject as the student who, in an examination paper describing the effect of the tenor clef, affirmed that if you wished to write C you were to write D.

SOME time ago we recollect reading a decidedly disparaging criticism upon a book, a portion of which, to our great surprise, we afterwards found appended to an advertisement of the work, in order to aid in promoting its sale. And really, by cutting out a portion of a sentence, inserting a few asterisks, and dovetailing little bits in here and there, the review seemed not only favourable, but actually laudatory. Something like this we have occasionally seen in advertisements of music; and if the effect of such "sharp practice" should be that reviewers will in the future speak out a little more plainly, and refrain from writing any "quotable" bits of praise when noticing an inferior composition, the publishers who resort to this expedient have of course only themselves to blame for such result. But another method we see creeping in lately, which is to print an opinion between inverted commas. For example, in the announcement of a March we read: "I have not for a long time heard a prettier or more graceful piano-forte piece"; "Worthy to rank with Gounod's 'Marionette March' for quaintness and originality." Now we are not aware that we have ever heard or seen this piece, and therefore, for aught we know, every word upon its merits may be deserved; but what do the inverted commas mean if these sentences are not quotations? and if they are so, from whom or from what are they quoted? Surely it can be no use sending music for review when anonymous favourable opinions can be obtained without this trouble; and the effect of such a system will therefore, we hope, be to lessen materially the duties of critics.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

WITH the week beginning August 21 began also the final preparations for this great triennial solemnity. Much had been done before, especially by Mr. Stockley, the chorus-master, and his army of well-drilled, full-voiced singers. But these early labours are not for public notice, as are, in some measure at least, those which give the last touches to rehearsal, and indicate beyond doubt what may be expected in performance.

The orchestra assembled for the first time on Monday week, the place being, as usual, St. George's Hall, London. It mustered 142 strong, including 108 strings: that is to say—first violins, 28; second violins, 26; violas, 20; violoncellos, 17; double-basses, 17. Sir Michael Costa was, of course, present in his capacity as general conductor of the festival, and received a most enthusiastic welcome. No wonder! Popular at all times with the men who serve under him, his appearance on this occasion, under circumstances which must be in everybody's mind, led to an outburst of almost personal affection. Sir Michael at once set to work, rehearsing, first, the overtures to "The Siege of Corinth" and "Benvenuto Cellini," then resigning the bâton to Sir Julius Benedict, whose "Graziella" stood next in order. The trial of this work took place under rather disadvantageous circumstances owing to many errors in copies which, presumably, had been hastily written out. Even such an idea as can be formed of a cantata from the orchestral part alone was barely possible in this case. Nevertheless, good and useful work was done during the time allotted to Sir Julius, who presently made way for Herr Niels Gade, with his "Psyche." The Danish master is popular wherever he goes, and obtained a hearty reception from the orchestra, most of whom had worked under him before, and knew by experience the graceful and pleasant work he cuts out for them. "Psyche" was rehearsed from printed copies, to the manifest advantage of all concerned; the experienced artists in the band reading off the music with astonishing facility, while the conductor could devote all his attention to higher ends than clerical correctness. Herr Gade's Cantata, we may say with perfect assurance, made a most favourable impression even apart from its vocal music. It was at once seen that the composer had not changed his melodious and flowing style nor lost the play of an agreeable fancy. After one other work of graver character and larger dimensions, "Psyche" will, no doubt, be the success of the Festival.

On Tuesday the band reassembled to deal with Mr. Gaul's "Holy City," Mr. Villiers Stanford's Orchestral Serenade and Mr. Hubert Parry's Symphony—the three new English works in the Festival programme. The Cantata presented little difficulty, since its composer, whose experience in scoring such works has not been great, showed becoming diffidence, and refrained from puzzling his executants with possible crudities. "The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character. Mr. Stanford's Serenade was played con amore by the band, whose sympathies it obviously excited, for just and sufficient reasons which will be dealt with in due time. On the other hand, Mr. Parry's Symphony—a work of immense difficulty—seemed to puzzle the performers, who had, so to speak, only skimmed their task when the time came for Mr. Parry to lay down his bâton.

On the following day (Wednesday) great interest was excited by the rehearsal of M. Gounod's "Redemption," all who had the privilege of entrée taking care to be present on an occasion so important. That the composer of "Faust" met with a hearty welcome need not be said; but what gratified him more, perhaps, was the remarkable manner in which the band read his music from their printed copies. M. Gounod knows what an English orchestra can do under such circumstances, but he had a right to feel surprise, and to express it, on this occasion. The varied, ornate, and splendid harmonies, with which M. Gounod has made his work remarkable, came out brilliantly under the composer's direction, and left no doubt as to the success of, at least, the orchestral part of the Oratorio. The movements for instruments alone were, of course, heard to full advantage, with a uniformly happy result. Cherubini's Fourth Mass and some miscellaneous selections filled up the programme of the day.

On Saturday last a general rehearsal took place in the Town Hall; beginning with Mr. Parry's Symphony and Mr. Stanford's Serenade. These, which occupied all the morning, were followed in the afternoon by the "Redemption," then heard for the first time in its integrity by a considerable audience of privileged persons, among whom was his Eminence Cardinal Newman. It would be improper to anticipate here the criticism which should follow later, but two observations are imperative. First, the oratorio made a profound impression, holding the listeners spell-bound by its dignity, powerful utterance, and wealth of harmonic resources. Second, that the rehearsal was not so much a rehearsal as a magnificent performance; M. Gounod having to make no more than half-a-dozen corrections from beginning to end. The composer himself, in thanking his interpreters, described their exertions as "marvellous," and so they were. All the soloists, save Madame Albani, were present and took their respective parts, but not they so much as the theme absorbed attention. It was felt on all hands that the new oratorio is a great work, and frequent and spontaneous applause testified to the fact. "Graziella" and "Psyche" occupied the evening, and on Monday the remainder of the programme was gone through with care and success.

In proof of the widespread interest which M. Gounod's "Redemption" has excited, it may here be said that arrangements have been made for its speedy performance in London, Bristol, Brighton, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Wolverhampton, Vienna (by the Gesellschaft der Musik Freunde), and Toronto. This is but the beginning of a triumphal progress.

"PARSIFAL" AT BAYREUTH.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Bayreuth, August 4.

MY work in this letter is not of a very arduous character, since I have neither to describe nor analyse Herr Wagner's latest music-drama. That task has already been done in the pages of THE MUSICAL TIMES by Mr. Corder, and so well done that there is really nothing to add, and, from my point of view, very little indeed to question or correct. I am the more pleased to point this out because he and I belong to different schools of musical thought and opinion. He is credited with a sympathy for so-called "advanced" music such as I do not claim to possess. It speaks much, therefore, on behalf of Mr. Corder's fairness that his strictures on "Parsifal" are just those which I should here make myself, if called upon to do so. Let me take this opportunity, writing after a hearing of the work, to recommend a perusal of Mr. Corder's analysis by all amateurs who desire an impartial and truthful opinion.

I do not belong to the "patrons" of Bayreuth, and cannot tell your readers of anything that took place at the two performances reserved for that select body. It is easy to imagine the existence of a unanimous opinion and unalloyed enthusiasm. There must have been a veritable "love-feast" on the occasion—all the knights of the new Grail gathering round and partaking of the good things revealed. Though I could not see it, I think of the scene with pleasure, and, not less than the genius and resolution of the Master who presided, do I admire, if I cannot imitate, the unquestioning faith of the followers. Bayreuth, I suppose, got up an appearance of life to mark the occasion. It should have done so, at any rate, for the town owes much to the man who, far more than Jean Paul Richter, has dragged it out of provincial obscurity, and made it world-known. On this matter, however, there is room for doubt, inasmuch as the "baked meats" of the patron's feast were hardly cold before I reached the place, and then nothing could exceed it in dreariness and melancholy. The weather was wet and gloomy, the streets were almost deserted, and not a decoration of any sort smiled a cheerful welcome upon the depressed visitor. Yet, by a convenient fiction, Bayreuth assumed that all the world was struggling for meat, drink, and lodging within its walls. There were rooms to spare at the hotel which sheltered me; nevertheless I had to pay an exorbitant sum for miserable accommodation. This, clearly, will not do, and Wagner should interfere. Under the best of circumstances Bayreuth is far from attractive. It is out of the way; its manners and customs are not nice; and experience of the place determines an English visitor, at any rate, to leave it as soon as possible. But to be plundered into the bargain, and that under cover of a fiction! Even Wagner's novelties cannot reconcile one to a course of such treatment.

I applied for a ticket on the morning of the second public performance with some little anxiety lest every seat should have been secured. This my imagination suggested as quite possible, notwithstanding the emptiness of the Bayreuth streets. I could not penetrate the walls of the houses, nor deny that every room was filled with anxious waiters upon "Parsifal," turning weary looks at the falling rain and leaden sky. But the ticket clerk quickly set my mind at rest by giving me a choice of many places. I might be near the stage or far from it, on one side or the other, as it suited me. Where, then, was all the world? Where the multitudinous army of Wagnerites and Philistines burning with zeal for and against, and converging upon Bayreuth as a sort of Armageddon? Nothing could be tamer. Tame, moreover, was the appearance of things in the evening of the day. The audience straggled along the muddy road leading to the theatre, looking very melancholy, in harmony with the weather, while not even the friendly shelter of the refreshment booths raised their drooping spirits. It was quite a relief when, after the trumpet had sounded, all took their places in the semi-gloom of the house and waited for the raising of the curtain.

The forest scene which opens the series of tableaux is prettily painted and effectively arranged, though on these points nothing special need be said. Here let me remark, once for all, that the Bayreuth stage pictures—representative, we may assume, of the best art that Germany possesses—do not justify any loud boasting. An English theatre-goer looks upon them without the smallest surprise. He has seen quite as good at home. What really astonishes are the great and rapid changes effected in the course of the piece—changes made possible by the precautions taken to that end when building the stage. Here the Wagner Theatre is unique, but its scenic art-claims, as I have said, no particular regard. Reverting to the forest picture, the old knight, Gurnemanz, and two of the Grail pages are discovered asleep under a tree. They wake as distant trombones are heard from the Castle, and turning their backs to the audience, showing their blood-red mantles, kneel in silent prayer. This is the first of the solemn, reposeful scenes which distinguish the drama. Wagner is never afraid of immobility on his stage, but he always accompanies it by circumstances with which it agrees. Here the kneeling, silent actors are scarcely more than the trees and rocks, which we do not expect to move. The real effect is that of the distant music, sounding from the mysterious castle whereunto the course of the story is about to take us. Even after this ceases, action is of the slightest. Some Knights, who have entered, stand and talk concerning the King's unhealing wound; then Kundry arrives, wild of aspect and convulsive alike in speech and motion; then Amfortas is carried in on his litter, stays awhile, and passes on to bathe in the lake, and Gurnemanz enters upon one of those long stories which it seems impossible for Wagner to keep out of his operas. So far there is nothing that in the smallest degree can be called exciting. The story is retrospective, and the actors are a prosy old knight, a wounded king, and a wild woman who jerks out incoherent sentences and rolls on the ground. Neither does the music present salient features that give us pause. We recognise the various representative themes and the unflinching skill with which Wagner carries out his theory of treatment. Beyond this there is little to arrest attention. Parsifal's entry follows next, and is made with rare perception of dramatic effect. The cries of the esquires off the stage put us on the alert, while the lowering flight of the wounded swan from side to side is a welcome relief from the repose that has long since become monotonous. Then the gathering of the knights and esquires around the body of the bird, and their looks of horror at Parsifal, who stands apart in mute wonder at the consequences of his act, bring the forest youth at once into the very focus of attention. The stage thus suddenly wakes up at the moment when the hero steps upon it, and interest rises high. But it soon becomes immobile and, so to speak, statuesque again. The body of the dead swan, after it has been mournfully regarded, is solemnly borne away, and retrospection sets in, as Kundry and Parsifal together unfold the past of the "pure fool," who has in such sinister fashion come upon the scene. The fainting of Parsifal, the going to sleep of Kundry behind a bush and the passage of the wounded King after bathing, harmonise with the general character of this strange opening. All is sad, gloomy and mysterious. We are in a world to the meaning of which we have no key, and look forward to a solution of the enigma. Genuine interest is present at last, helped, not so much by the music, perhaps, as by the admirable manner of the actors, whose every movement and posture is regulated, yet seems natural and spontaneous, and who play their parts as though the events were real.

The device of moving scenery, which enables us to accompany Gurnemanz and Parsifal on their way to the Castle, is cleverly worked, but, as an illusion, fails of effect, in the sense that it draws too much attention upon itself. The eye is not deceived, because the mind is alert to the deceptive process and thinks rather of the machinery than of the results produced. I confess to surprise at the adoption by Wagner of a trick which may serve for a pantomime but is puerile on a serious stage. And yet, why should I be surprised? The whole drama is an elaborate display of everything that helps to dramatic "sensation"—taste and propriety being quite secondary considerations. A word is due to the panoramic scenery, which becomes wilder and bolder as the journey of Gurnemanz and Parsifal approaches its end. Admirable, too, is the rapid transition from the rocky portals of the Castle to the ordered beauty of the Hall, with its shining dome and rich adornments. This important scene is effectively laid out, and deserves special notice for the novel idea of keeping the front part of the stage in shadow while the centre, under the dome, is alone in light. Not only is a sense of space thus secured, but of isolation. We look through a veil of semi-darkness at the mysterious doings of the Grail fraternity. The picture soon grows in interest. With slow and stately step, the red-mantled knights file in from the back and take their places at the tables, while trains of boys and youths cross the stage, and Amfortas is borne to his couch behind the raised altar-table, the covered Grail being carried before him. All this is attended by grave and solemn religious music, which pervades the entire scene, save only when Amfortas gives utterance to the remorse that fills his soul and the anguish that racks his body. I need not describe the ceremonies attendant upon the unveiling of the sacred cup, nor the physical phenomena so skilfully worked in with them. But I am bound to admit the deep impressiveness of the whole, and the admirable manner in which it is presented. Here, too, the music becomes really charming. It is no question now of phrase-torturing; but of melody and harmony that fill the soul with a sense of beauty. In fact, Wagner has written nothing more worthy of his undoubted genius. I have been amazed to read that the love-feast scene is coldly received. The thing is impossible. It may pass without applause, as was the case in my own experience, but really the emotions excited are in their nature and degree such as applause cannot express. People get up from their seats when the curtain falls and go out of the theatre reverently. This is not coldness, it is exactly the opposite in a peculiarly intense form. A question, of course, arises as to the propriety of a stage scene which is nothing less than a celebration of the Eucharist. This question most men will instinctively answer; at the same time it admits of argument. The representation of religious ceremonies, if justifiable at all, is made so by fitness of manner and purity of purpose. As to fitness of manner, no charge can be brought against the scene in "Parsifal," which, from first to last, is serious and solemn. But with purity of purpose it can hardly be credited. No pretence exists for making men wiser or better through its means. The Supper of the Holy Grail is part of an artistic show, and the fact is fatal. Some have attempted to place the religious scenes of Wagner's drama in the same category with the Passion Play of Ober Ammergau; but even admitting the propriety of what is done in the mountain village, a parallel cannot be established. In its whole inception and spirit the Passion Play is a religious function with a religious end. In "Parsifal" the Eucharistic feast presents itself as one of a series of pictures wherein the devilish and the sensual have also a place, with the common purpose of affording artistic pleasure. Against such an association, and against the employment of sacred things for such an object, all persons with reverence in their nature will protest. The measure of the survival of reverence amongst us is the measure of Wagner's mistake.

The curtain rises for the second act upon a fantastic scene representing the inner keep of Klingsor's castle, with its "magical implements and necromantic appliances." A painfully ugly and repulsive part of the drama begins with the summoning of Kundry, who rises from the depths at Klingsor's command and wails and shrieks in unavailing horror at the work he calls upon her to do. I know nothing more unqualified in its hideousness than the interview between the wild woman and the magician. The surroundings, the characters, the dominating purpose and—I am bound to add—the music, are all painful in the extreme. Everywhere gloom and foulness prevail, while the miserable beings on the stage are monsters with whom our humanity would at once reject the idea of kinship, were such a thought possible of conception. Meyerbeer, in his most sensational mood, is far surpassed by Wagner here. Gladly, therefore, do we welcome the surprising change which comes when the castle vanishes and the enchanted gardens appear. This transformation is a triumph for the machinist. Nothing could be more perfect, but every spectator regrets that the painter of the garden picture did not better realise a vision of beauty. The scene is as poor in conception, and coarse and vulgar in execution, as anything hastily brushed in for a Christmas pantomime.

Moreover, it has the absurd effect of dwarfing the actors, who play their parts against a background of Brobdingnagian roses, and seem no taller than the fuchsia blossoms that droop at the wings. This is the more to be regretted because the dramatic and musical effect of the interview between Parsifal and the seductive Flower Maidens is charming. Dismissing moral considerations from mind, the whole business of the stage here, and much of the connected music, belong to Wagner's happiest efforts. Eye and ear are alike gratified, or would be but for the ungainly vegetation and inconceivably crude colouring of the magic garden. The repulsive prevails again when Kundry dismisses the Maidens, and, transformed into a beautiful woman, begins the temptation. In this instance Wagner seems to have gone far out of his way to offend, making Kundry assail Parsifal on the side of the love he cherishes for his dead mother. Even the kiss with which she seeks to overcome him is given in the guise of maternal benediction from heaven. Horrible association! Unpardonable prostitution of tenderly sacred names and things! Surely this is cynicism unequalled in the annals of dramatic art! Of the music connected with the scene I could say much, but prefer simply to endorse the general opinion expressed by Mr. Corder. It becomes beautiful when reference is made to Parsifal's mother, but for the most part tortures the ear and bewilders the mind. If it be music at all, then I have certainly misunderstood the term, and continue to misunderstand it. The conclusion of the act is dramatically effective, and in point of action rapid. From the moment when Kundry cries for help and Klingsor shows himself with the sacred spear in his hand, there is hardly time even for a consciousness of awakened interest and surprise. The spear is thrown at Parsifal and grasped by him as it remains poised over his head; in another moment its point describes a cross in the air, the castle falls, the garden withers, and all is ruin. Cunningly devised and cleverly executed, this collapse brings down the curtain upon a lively sensation and is always followed by immense applause. Nevertheless, the act, for all the poetic justice of its conclusion, leaves a nasty taste in the mouth, the more bitter because of the degree in which its offensiveness is perfectly gratuitous.

The rural scene shown when the curtain rises for the third and last time is an excellent specimen of stage painting and an appropriate setting for the action which takes place in front of it. Here Wagner, after the comparatively vigorous and exciting doings in the magician's establishment, resumes the slowness with which he opened. The awaking of Kundry from one of her periodic sleeps; her recovery from exhaustion by the attentions of Gurnemanz, now an aged recluse; her quiet submissiveness as she performs menial offices about the old knight's cell; and the slow entrance of Parsifal, weary and worn by his unavailing search after the Grail castle—all these things are quite characteristic of Wagner's deliberate stage. So is the long conversation between Gurnemanz and Parsifal, though here relief comes with the keen sensations excited by the feet-washing and the baptism, to say nothing of the beautiful music which accompanies reference to the peace and loveliness of nature on Good Friday morning. The religious mysticism of the scene, with its obvious reproduction of sacred incident, belongs, like the Eucharistic Supper in the first act, to those questions which are decided by feeling rather than by reason. It is vain to make the propriety of such stage doings a subject of discussion. Men will reprobate them, or tolerate them, or welcome them with cynical contempt for the shocked sentiment of reverent minds—and they will do this before thinking of debating the matter, if, indeed, they ever arrive at that stage at all. For my own part, the reproduction of the scene between the Saviour of the world and Mary Magdalene had the effect of downright blasphemy. I asked the reason for it and could find none save the unworthy reason that the author of the play desired to make a sensation at any cost. Parsifal and Gurnemanz should pass a second time to Monsalvat in the manner of their first journey—that is to say, by "marking time" while the scenery moves. In performance, however, the panoramic business is dispensed with, a change of scene taking place behind a curtain which falls for the purpose of screening it. Once again in view of the Grail Hall, clouds and darkness gather round. The horrible and gloomy prevail. From one side comes the body of old Titurel, who has died through deprivation of the support which the uncovered Grail afforded; from the other Amfortas is carried in on his litter, with the sacred vessel, now to be revealed in honour of the obsequies, borne before him. The agony and remorse of the King, who wishes himself to die, carry on the painful scene till Parsifal appears with the sacred spear, heals the wound, and proclaims himself the appointed Grail lord. Then the cup is uncovered and glows with celestial light as of old. Monsalvat is redeemed and the curtain falls.

It would be unjust and ridiculous to question the dramatic power of "Parsifal," or to deny that it contains some of Wagner's best music. On the other hand, the character and tone of the play is, in its mysticism and morbidness, thoroughly unhealthy. The end comes as a relief, because welcomed as an escape from an atmosphere heavily charged with unwholesome vapours. Of human and elevating interest there is none. The characters cannot be realised. They are sheer abstractions, and most of them very offensive ones into the bargain. Wagner can hardly be expected to write many more operas; but as he has here touched the limit of the sensational, the successors of "Parsifal" will, let us hope, come back to healthy natural life.

So many difficulties are presented in every department of the work that an absolutely perfect performance is out of the question. All that can be done may fairly be credited to the people here, from scene-shifters to leading artists. The shortcomings I noticed were chiefly those that could not be avoided, such as accidental hitches in the elaborate stage-working and a flattening of the pitch in the choruses sung at a distance from the orchestra, &c. Otherwise the representation was entitled to the highest credit. Herr Levi's orchestra did its work specially well, considering the terribly involved and ever-changing nature of the music played. But the effect was never brilliant and sonorous owing to the position of the instruments. Something is, no doubt, secured by sinking the orchestra out of sight, yet a good deal is lost. Not once during the performance could I get free from an idea that a veil had been drawn between my ears and the players, muffling their sounds and causing constant irritation. The chorus-singing, with the exception just referred to, was excellent from first to last, being as much distinguished by intelligence and expressiveness as by correctness. As for the principal artists, one is lost in astonishment at the fact that, while closely identifying themselves with the characters they play, they can get through so much unvoiced, ungracious and difficult declamation without a mistake. They were one and all thoroughly up to their work; the Kundry of Fraülein Brandt; the Klingsor of Herr Hill; the Gurnemanz of Herr Siehr; and the Parsifal of Herr Gudehus being each as perfect a realisation as the most exigent could desire.

I left Bayreuth with varied feelings—gladness at quitting the place; satisfaction at having witnessed a remarkable display of creative and executive art; sorrow at what I could not fail to regard as a sacrifice of splendid genius on the altar of pure sensationalism, of vanity, and of an artificialism more unworthy than even that against which Wagner has so often launched the shafts of ridicule.

A SINGERS' FESTIVAL AT HAMBURGH.

Hamburg, August 16.

THIS seaport town is a busy place, but found both will and means to put itself thoroughly en fête for the third meeting of the Deutsche Sängerbunde, which was celebrated on Friday and Saturday last. Looking at the nature of the decorations, and the way in which they were spread over the entire city, one might have thought that the occasion was a great national festival such as moves the heart of a people to its depths. I mean, of course, that an Englishman might have thought this. A German would perfectly understand the possibility of so great a demonstration meaning nothing more than welcome to some thousands of singing-men. Do not expect me to give a description of Hamburg's civic bravery, nor to tell what elaborate arrangements were made for entertaining the musical visitors, nor to record how they were greeted at the railway stations and in the streets. All this belongs to every-day journalism. Let my reader draw upon his imagination for flags and evergreens, cheers and hand-shakings, beer-drinkings and jovial choruses—everything, in short, that goes to make up a popular festivity. I cannot, however, pass over the greatest of the out-of-door manifestations. At these feasts there is always a procession for the behoof of the general public, who thus acquire a direct interest in the solemnity. Not that the processionists make any sacrifice of feeling by showing themselves in the streets. I can avow that they like it, taking a pride in displaying their decorated banners, parading their numbers, and receiving and returning the cheers of on-gazers. Some of them like it not wisely but too well, and become ridiculous in striving to attract attention through fantastic head-gear; parti-coloured umbrellas; and other devices savouring of a fools' festival rather than an artistic gathering. However, the Hamburg procession, notwithstanding instances of bad taste, was imposing. Its very magnitude made it so; the fifty associations which had come together from all parts of Germany occupying more than an hour and a half in passing the Victoria Hotel. This great body was marshalled in four columns; the first comprising societies from Leipzig, Bavaria, Berlin, Bohemia, the Erzgebirge district and Franconia. In the second, were representatives of Frankfurt, Fulda, Mecklenberg, Neumarkt and Lower Austria. In the third, Schleswig, Upper Austria, Thuringia, Posen, the Rhine countries and Swabia made a brave show, while the rear was brought up by North Germans, including the strong societies of Hamburg and Altona. Each association carried its banner; bands of music played lustily at intervals. Occasionally the societies sang as they marched, and so with pomp and abundant noise the seven thousand—there could hardly have been fewer—passed through the decorated streets. As a spectacle the procession lacked variety, but it was an effective display all the same, and enlisted public sympathy as nothing else could possibly have done. Now let me turn to the more important musical proceedings.

These took place in a large edifice intended, I believe, as an exhibition building, and capable of accommodating, not only the 7,000 singers, but an audience 10,000 strong. If I am not mistaken the hall, which is cruciform in shape, originally formed part of the palace erected on the Champ de Mars for the last French Exposition. Be this as it may, Hamburg possesses a capital place for gatherings like the one under notice; the more because the site is open, and the building easy of access on every hand. Large preparations were made for the comfort and convenience of performers and audience. Thus the space round the hall was inclosed, and within the inclosure refreshment booths and offices of all kinds were erected. Once within the gates there was, indeed, no occasion to go outside from morning to night. Meals could be taken, toilets made, letters written, telegrams despatched, and all the business of holiday life carried on with the least possible friction. Inside the hall, a level platform occupied the whole of one arm of the cross, having in front of it a lofty pulpit for the conductor. This arrangement should have been reversed, and the singers lifted instead of their chief, for, as it was, nothing like the full effect of 7,000 voices came forth. The singers sang into the collars of each other's coats, instead of over each other's heads. It must not be forgotten, however, that a raised gallery for such a vast choir would entail no trifling expense. The platform was so divided as to arrange the singers in two four-voice choirs, one on each side of the orchestra, but this did not work well. There were no double choruses to sing, and the divided voices—of first tenors, for instance—were not always strictly together. The managers, however, had only a choice of evils with such a multitude, and it is, perhaps, ungracious to find fault. When I add that the hall was lit by electricity, everything necessary has been said to prove that neither pains nor cost were spared to further the enterprise as far as that could be done by material means.

Two concerts were given; the first on Friday evening, the second on Saturday evening, rehearsals taking place on the morning of each day. Concerning the doings on Friday I am unable to speak. My arrival in the town was late, and not a ticket could be obtained. I see in the general programme that the selections comprised Beethoven's "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur"; the overture to "Euryanthe," Schumann's "Der Eidgenossen Nachtwache"; Max Bruch's "Salamis"; the overture to "Die Zauberflöte," Schubert's "Nachtgesang im Walde," and the chorus No. 3 from Mendelssohn's music to "Œdipus in Colonos," besides many other works less known, and presumably less important. The concert of Saturday again drew a crowded audience, of whose multitude I was enabled to be a unit. Now, therefore, I can speak from knowledge, and confidently. I have not yet found that punctuality is a virtue much cultivated on the Continent in connection with musical doings; but want of it here was excusable. The singers had had a long, hot, and dusty march; they found the beer outside very refreshing, and they were naturally disinclined to recognise the "Assemblée" which trumpeters blew lustily and often as the hour of commencing approached. At length, however, all were in their places, and Professor Julius von Bernuth, mounting the pulpit, gave the signal to begin. A solid choral, "Dem Herrn," by a composer named Iman Faisst, opened the proceedings, and, owing to its simple structure, was rendered with imposing effect. The mass of voices blended admirably in these long-drawn phrases, while the first tenors and second basses, by their fine quality and power, gave the utmost satisfaction. At the close of the hymn an orator representative of the visiting societies made a long speech in expression of their gratitude for the Hamburg welcome, and demanded from his fellows a "Hoch," which was lustily given, accompanied by a salute from trumpets and drums. Then a telegram from the Emperor was read amid more enthusiasm, and then the musical performance began in real earnest.

A choral song, "Gebt Acht," by Brahms, and Kreutzer's "An das Vaterland" were bracketed together for the sake, I suppose, of contrast, since they have little in common, the one being hard and harsh, the other smooth and flowing. Both had a fairly good rendering, but yielded place in this respect to Max Bruch's "Lied der Städte," which the army of singers gave as though they liked it. Next came the overture to "Egmont," arranged for wind instruments, and most excellently played, and after it a Finnish Volkslied, "Suomi's Sang," and a characteristic piece by Zenger ended the first part. So far all had gone well. The music had been simple and easy. The performers were confident and the effect great. Subsequently less favourable results were obtained, owing to more exacting circumstances and, in some degree perhaps, to the refusal of the twenty minutes interval, at which there were loud murmurs on the orchestra. Two songs from Ferdinand Hiller's "Aus der Edda" were by no means well sung, and seemed to interest the audience very little. On the other hand, Attenhofer's "Abendfeir," a pleasing piece, and Mendelssohn's "Wasserfahrt" evoked loud applause. The last named charmed the audience by its grace and beauty, and stimulated the singers to do for it their very best. By way of interlude the band now played the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," after which Rietz's "Im grünen Wald" was sung by the "Julius-Otto-Bundes" of Dresden, and the concert ended with Abt's "Siegesgesang der Deutschen nach der Hermanns-schlacht." This had to be repeated, albeit the electric light went out during the performance, and left the vast hall to a few scattered gas-jets.

There is obviously very little to say about the pieces in the above list, beyond this—they were, some of them, too difficult.

A BRUSSELS FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Brussels, August 23.

A SOCIETY has been established here under the name "Nouvelle Société de Musique de Bruxelles," the conductor being M. Henry Warnots. It is at present a flourishing institution, having the patronage of Royalty, of the executive government, and of the municipality. Its chorus numbers 400 voices, and its orchestra 120 instruments. It has influence enough to obtain the Palais des Beaux Arts for concerts, and altogether may be accounted fortunate in its character and circumstances. This Society gave two Festival Performances on Sunday and Monday last, the days of the national fête. I propose briefly to describe what was done and the manner of its doing.

The opening Concert attracted a large audience, curious to hear Handel's "Alexander's Feast," then performed for the first time in Brussels. M. Victor Wilders' adaptation of Dryden's text was used, not at all to the advantage of the work, which, perhaps, was handicapped in another fashion by adherence to the original score. The musicians present were, no doubt, glad to have the almost unadulterate Handel, but modern ears, not those of musicians, miss the sonority of modern orchestras and chafe under its absence. I am, therefore, not prepared to say that the reception of "Alexander's Feast" was enthusiastic, or even unanimously favourable. The audience applauded, it is true, but they applauded the soloists, about whom they seemed to think a great deal more than about the Saxon master's work. There was reason to admire the performance, albeit it was not Handelian according to English notions. At a Festival in our own country, Handel is given with much more vigour and noise than delicacy. This is the tradition that has come down to us, and from which the Brussels people were free when they approached "Alexander's Feast." I confess to seeing new beauties in the music as performed here. The refinement and delicate shading of the accompaniments, and the close attention to nuances paid by the chorus, invested it with attractions that were quite fresh. All the concerted numbers were capably given by a well-balanced and highly trained choir, equal to the best that we have in England. The sopranos especially distinguished themselves throughout, singing with marvellous oneness of utterance and feeling, so as literally to resemble a single voice. In Madame Schroeder-Hanfstaengl an excellent interpreter of the soprano solos was found. Her sympathetic organ and artistic style commanded general approval, as did the elocution of M. Bosquin in the tenor recitatives. M. Belhomme, to whom the bass airs were assigned, is a good singer, but seemed ill at ease with Handel's music. For this reason the fine air "Revenge, Timotheus cries," made less than its usual effect. Drawbacks notwithstanding, the performance of "Alexander's Feast" was one of which any society might have been proud, and upon which M. Henry Warnots has a clear right to congratulate himself. The remainder of the concert dealt with new music by Flemish composers. Thus we heard the overture to an opera, "André Doria" by M. Theodore Radoux—a work somewhat patchy in character and commonplace in effect, besides being full of reminiscences. We heard also, a kind of historical symphony in four movements illustrative of Spanish tyranny in the Low Countries, and the successful revolt against it. M. van den Eeden, the author of this composition, cannot be congratulated upon advancing the cause of programme music. His work may mean anything, and in the endeavour to mean something it often sacrifices true musical effect. It is strained, spasmodic, and suggestive of an idea that the composer, having really nothing to say, is trying to divert attention from the fact by mere noise. In all this, however, he is left far behind by M. Peter Benoit, of Antwerp, whose "Hymne à la Beauté" brought the concert to an end. This is a Cantata for solo (baritone), chorus, and orchestra, in which beauty is represented as the destroyer of ignorance and violence, and as working out a kind of earthly redemption by its divine power. The subject is an inviting one, and a dance episode, with badinage between youths and maidens, might have inspired the dullest composer with graceful and pleasant strains. Unfortunately M. Benoit is one of those composers who must ride upon the whirlwind and direct the storm; who must be continually startling their audience, and who prefer original ugliness to the forms of beauty which are familiar. His Cantata is therefore a blatant and ambitious, yet feeble and ineffective work, destitute, as far as I could discern, of any idea worked out according to art. Noise in plenty; violently contrasted episodes, and a constant and painful straining after "sensation"—these are the characteristics of a Hymn to Beauty which is not beautiful. The performance, conducted by M. Warnots, as that of the symphony had been by M. Joseph Dupont, did for the Cantata all that was possible, and M. Benoit received an "ovation" at its close; but the compliment was surely in recognition of excellences manifested elsewhere.

The second Concert, which was attended by the King and Queen, opened with Gluck's Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," and continued with the "Deutsches Requiem" of Brahms, solos by Madame Schroeder-Hanfstaengl and M. Belhomme. A better rendering of the Overture I have never heard, but the difficult music of the "Requiem" seemed but imperfectly known. The chorus, it is true, did well throughout; in the orchestra, on the other hand, it was easy to find room for improvement. That Brahms's work met with a hearty reception cannot be said. Its merits were not appreciated, but its uniform gloom was felt, and to a certain extent resented. The audience were more pleased with what remained of the concert. They applauded to the echo M. César Thomson's performance of Vieuxtemps' Fourth Violin Concerto—a distinguished work, nobly rendered by an artist who appears destined to take the highest rank in his profession. More pure, finished, and expressive playing is seldom heard. A number of vocal solos followed, unnecessary even to name, and over these I pass to dwell for a moment upon a Cantata—"Le Retour"—for soli, chorus, and orchestra, the work of M. Ad. Samuel. The argument of this piece deals with the return of a ship from foreign lands, bearing a number of savages who recognise the blessings of civilisation. I do not exactly understand the drift of the poem, but there is a good deal of sentiment in it that Englishmen would smile at. This, however, matters little in comparison with the fact that M. Samuel, while a little inclined to be incoherent here and there, can write sensibly and naturally. He is not afraid of a full close; he does not run away from a succession of diatonic chords; nor is he shocked at a melody that keeps in one key for four bars. The result was that "Le Retour" achieved the success of the Festival.

I do not know if the Nouvelle Société means to give a Festival every year, but this it may do with advantage and credit. Its means are excellent; its service to art should be great.

THE unprecedented attraction of the Birmingham Musical Festival, which takes place too late for notice in the present number, seems to demand that the earliest record of its proceedings should be placed before the public, and we have therefore resolved to issue a supplement of THE MUSICAL TIMES on Monday, the 4th inst., which will be exclusively devoted to a report of the Festival.

We are sorry to record the death of Mr. William Hutchins Callcott, which occurred on the 4th ult. He was the younger son of Dr. Callcott, whose glees and other compositions have a world-wide reputation, and nephew of the well-known painter and Royal Academician, Sir A. W. Callcott. Mr. Callcott was born at Kensington in 1807, and, after his father's death, pursued his musical studies under the direction of his brother-in-law, William Horsley, Mus. B., Oxon., enjoying all the advantage of that artistic intercourse which his connection both with music and painting so readily procured for him. Besides fulfilling the duties of an organist, he was the author of several compositions of much merit, such as the scena, "The last man" (words by Campbell, the poet, with whom he was intimately acquainted), and the anthems, "Give peace in our time, O Lord" and "In my Father's house are many mansions." Mr. Callcott also devoted much of his time to popular "arrangements," for the pianoforte, of extracts from the works of classical composers. His health, never good, failed entirely about four years ago, and from that time until his death he had to endure constant suffering, which was borne with the most exemplary patience and fortitude. In every relation of life Mr. Callcott won the respect and esteem of all who knew him, and his death will be long and sincerely regretted.

THE musical inauguration of the National Exhibition at Dublin was a complete success; a result largely due to the presence of Mr. McGuckin and Mr. Ludwig, the Carl Rosa company being then in Dublin. The chorus singing was extremely good. There were about forty-five or fifty voices to each part, including a contingent of sixty from the banks of the river Lee. Mr. Joseph Robinson conducted, and Mr. R. M. Levey led. The fine organ of St. Malachy's Church, Belfast, was kindly lent by the authorities, with the sanction of the Rev. Dr. Dorrian, Bishop of Down and Connor; Mr. J. M. Glynn, of the Dominican Church, St. Saviour's, Dublin, being the organist. The selection consisted of the opening of the "Hymn of Praise;" eminently appropriate for an "industrial" exhibition, written, as it was, for the Commemoration at Leipzig, in honour of the art of printing. The early numbers of the "Creation"—omitting one or two—as far as "The Heavens are telling," formed the next portion, in which Mr. Ludwig sang the opening phrases with much effect; and Mr. McGuckin, was also highly successful in the music allotted to him. Of the young lady who sang the soprano solos, Miss Adelaide Mullen, an amateur and a daughter of a Vicar Choral of Christ Church and St. Patrick's, a few words of praise are due. It is about four years ago that she was first heard in public, introduced by Sir Robert Stewart, at one of the concerts of the University Choral Society, in Mozart's "Requiem;" she has since sung in "Israel in Egypt" in St. Patrick's Cathedral, and essayed, with admitted success, the part in "Elijah," for the "Dublin Musical Society," and her success on the present occasion fully justified the truth of Sir Robert Stewart's judgment. The programme also included a march composed by Mr. Joseph Robinson, and a selection of Irish music comprising airs and songs with chorus, and closing with a fine performance of the overture to "William Tell."

THE celebration of what is termed the "Guild Merchant" at Preston—which has been held at intervals of twenty years from 1329—takes place in the week commencing Monday, the 4th inst., when their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Albany have signified their intention of being present. In connection with the festivities, the programme announces the following musical arrangements:—On the first day the new organ in the Corn Exchange, presented to the town by John Dewhurst, Esq., will be opened by Dr. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey. On Tuesday Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be performed; on Wednesday a miscellaneous Concert will be given; on Thursday there will be a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" in the morning, and a miscellaneous Concert in the evening; and on Friday Berlioz' "Faust" will be given. The principal vocalists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Miss Adela Vernon, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Maas, R. Hilton and Santley; conductor and solo pianist, Mr. Charles Hallé; principal and solo violinist, Herr Straus. The chorus will be provided by the Preston Choral Society, Dr. Bridge will preside at the organ, Mr. Charles Hallé's band will play at the musical performances, and the band of the Royal Marines at the balls, Mayor's luncheon, &c. All the Concerts take place in the Corn Exchange.

In our notice of the final Concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society we spoke of an "indefinite" proposal for reconstituting the Association by means of a company. We are happy to state that the project has now become definite, a prospectus having been forwarded to us in which it is announced that the Society will be carried on by a company incorporated with limited liability, not for profit, with a capital of £10,000, in shares of £1 each, with power to increase. Many influential names appear as vice-presidents and on the council; and it is stated that "Sir Michael Costa has been communicated with, and it is confidently hoped that circumstances will admit of his accepting the invitation of the council to become Conductor." As no dividend, bonus, or other profit can be received by the members, it is obvious that the object of the present undertaking is to raise a Guarantee Fund; and a primary aim of the Association being to maintain the high tone which has characterised the performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and not only to give prominence to the acknowledged masterpieces of Oratorio, but to produce new or lesser known works of merit, so powerful an appeal is made to the lovers of sacred art that the hearty support of the musical public, both in London and throughout the country may, we hope and believe, be confidently relied upon.

IN order to bring to a fitting termination the valuable labours of Mr. Nagel, who retires from the active conductorship of the Dundee Amateur Choral Union at the end of this, his twenty-fifth year of service, and at the same time to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Society, the committee has decided to hold a Musical Festival on the 24th, 25th, and 26th of January, 1883. As the outlay necessary to carry out this scheme will be very great, a circular has been addressed to the noblemen connected with the district and the provosts of the neighbouring towns, asking them to become patrons, and also to a number of gentlemen requesting them to serve upon the committee, with the object of securing the financial success of the undertaking. Gounod's Oratorio, "The Redemption," will be performed at the first concert; the second will be miscellaneous, and include Beethoven's Choral Symphony; and the third will be devoted to Handel's Oratorio, "Israel in Egypt," Mr. Henry Nagel conducting the first and third concert, and Mr. August Manns the second. With the exception of Mr. Joseph Maas, who is secured as principal tenor, the vocalists are not yet announced; but the orchestra of the Glasgow Choral Union has already been engaged.

THE prospectus of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society announces four Concerts during the season 1882-3. At the opening Concert, on November 13, Gounod's new Oratorio, "The Redemption," will be performed, the principal vocalists being Miss Mary Davies, Miss Damian, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Blower. At the second Concert the "Messiah" will be given; the third will be an Orchestral Concert, at which Dr. Swinerton Heap's "Voice of Spring" will be produced; and the fourth will comprise Professor Macfarren's Oratorio, "St. John the Baptist," and Haydn's "Imperial Mass." In addition to the vocalists already named, the following are also engaged:—Miss Anna Williams, Miss Clara Samuëll, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Orridge, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Signor Foli. There will be a band and chorus of over 300 performers. Conductor, Dr. Heap.

THE prospectus of the fourth season of Mr. Stephen S. Stratton's Popular Chamber Concerts announces six concerts, to be held in the Masonic Hall, New Street, Birmingham. The programmes will be compiled mainly from the standard works of the great masters; but some novelties will be introduced, including the Octet for strings by the Norwegian composer Johan S. Svendsen. Native art will be represented by a MS. composition by F. E. Bache, a Quintet by Onslow, a Trio for pianoforte and strings by the late J. H. Griesbach, a work by the late Charles Lucas, a new Quartet for strings by Ebenezer Prout, and the Quartet in F by Mr. Villiers Stanford, which was so favourably received on its first performance at these concerts. The list of executants engaged includes the names of several well-known artists. The concerts will take place on Mondays—instead of Tuesdays, as heretofore—commencing on the 25th inst.

THE Triennial Musical Festival, under the immediate patronage of her Majesty and his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, which will be held at the Colston Hall, Bristol, on the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th of October next, promises to be in every respect as successful as any of the preceding meetings in this city. The programme will include Gounod's new Oratorio "The Redemption," "Elijah," "The Messiah," Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," Beethoven's Mass in D, A. C. Mackenzie's new Cantata "Jason" (composed expressly for the Bristol Festival), Haydn's Cantata "Spring," and numerous orchestral and vocal pieces of the highest interest. The artists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Santley, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. Montague Worlock. The prices of admission will, we understand, be on the reduced scale of the last Festival.

THE annual distribution of certificates to the successful students of the Watford School of Music took place in the large hall of the Public Library on the 5th ult. The chair was taken by the Earl of Clarendon, who spoke in the highest terms of the school; and the Rev. N. Price then read the Report of the institution, which announced that much good work had been accomplished in the evening classes, under Mr. Constantine, and that the Choral Union (the advanced choral class of the school), conducted by Mr. Baumer, had made considerable progress during the year. Mr. C. Hubert Parry, examiner to the school, gave a most favourable account of the general efficiency of the pupils; and after the adoption of the Report read by Mr. Price had been moved and carried, the certificates were awarded by Lady Grimston.

THE Edinburgh Choral Union have nearly completed the arrangements for another series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts, which promise to exceed in interest and importance anything hitherto attempted. The series will be extended, the orchestra increased, and Mr. Manns will again be the Conductor. The programmes will include Gounod's new work, "The Redemption," Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and "The Messiah," and several orchestral works to be performed for the first time in Edinburgh. The soloists already engaged include Mesdames Albani, Patey, and Hutchinson, Misses Carlotta Elliot and Orridge, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Maas, Harper Kearton, Santley, and Barrington Foote. Madame Menter and Herr Joachim will be solo pianist and violinist.

IN aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund, the Rev. Canon Farrar preached a sermon in Westminster Abbey on July 31, a copy of which has been forwarded to us by the printer, Mr. W. H. Robinson, of Walsall. The heading of this discourse, "Music: in Religion and in Life," sufficiently describes its purport; but the earnestness and eloquence with which the subject is treated can only be appreciated by a careful perusal of the sermon itself. Truly indeed does the author reveal to us the heavenly mission of music upon the earth; and sincerely do we hope that his words, first heard by a limited number of admirers in the Abbey, may by the circulation of this pamphlet be scattered broadcast throughout the land.

THE twenty-fifth season of the Monday Popular Concerts is announced to commence at St. James's Hall on October 16. Twenty-one concerts will be given, extending to March 19, 1883. The Saturday morning concerts begin on October 21, and terminate on March 17, 1883. Madame Norman-Néruda will be the violinist in October, November, January, and part of February; Herr Joachim will appear on December 4, and remain until December 23, and will also be the violinist from Monday, February 26, until Monday, March 19; Signor Piatti being the violoncellist during the whole of the season. Arrangements are also pending with Mdles. Janotha and Marie Krebs, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mr. Charles Hallé, &c.

HIS Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has, we understand, recently conferred the degree of Doctor of Music upon Mr. E. J. Hopkins, the distinguished organist and composer. The honour was granted on the petition of the Master of the Temple (the Dean of Llandaff); and the Benchers of the Hon. Societies of the Inner and Middle Temple having undertaken to bear all expenses attending the granting of the Degree without the knowledge of the recipient of the honour, the event was, of course, not only a pleasure but a surprise. We are glad to hear of this graceful recognition of the valuable services of an artist so well known and so highly appreciated.

SUBSCRIPTIONS towards the Royal College of Music continue to be received, and during the past month Concerts have been given in aid at Sevenoaks and Southsea, the Prince and Princess of Wales having been present at the latter. A paper on the College will be read at the Social Science Association meeting, at Nottingham, by Mr. C. Harford Lloyd, and there will be a meeting at Portsmouth on the 8th inst., at which Mr. Grove will deliver an address. Sixty Concerts in aid of the College will be given by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons during October, November and December next. It is probable that the College will open early next year.

In the prospectus of the Sessional Proceedings of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, to be held in Nottingham in the week commencing on the 20th inst., we observe that in the art department the following special questions are to be submitted for discussion: "1. On the new Royal College of Music. 2. In what way can the influence of art be best brought to bear on the masses of population in large towns?" We are glad to find that music is gradually asserting its right to be considered as so important an element in the social life of the people.

THE Oswestry Triennial Musical Festival and Festival of Village Choirs, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry Leslie, is announced to take place in the Powis Hall on the 22nd and 23rd inst. On the first day there will be a morning and evening Concert, with a full band and the Oswestry Festival Choir, the solo vocalists being Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Henry Blower; and on the second day a competition of Village Choirs will take place, the prizes to be awarded by Mr. John Thomas, harpist to the Queen.

THE Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace will commence, as usual, in October, and be continued with an interval during the Christmas holidays, till the end of May, 1883. There will be ten concerts before Christmas, and fifteen after. The programmes will be selected with the accustomed care and judgment, and the orchestra maintained in its former state of efficiency. Mr. A. Manns will, of course, retain his post as Conductor.

It is announced that Miss May Brammer has been accepted as a member of the Conservatorium at Leipzig, after an examination, in which she played the Andante in F from Haydn's Violin Sonata. This young lady is only ten years old; and there is only one instance of a student of such tender years being admitted, namely, that of Madame Schumann, who was received at the same age for the study of the pianoforte.

REVIEWS.

Gavotta. Di Giovanni Sgambati, istrumentata da Luigi Mancinelli.

Gavotta per archi. Di Guglielmo Zuelli.
[Florence: G. G. Guidi, 1882.]

SIGNOR GUIDI has long since secured the gratitude of musicians and lovers of the art generally by his cheap score editions, in octavo size, of compositions both classical and modern, including such interesting and hitherto all but inaccessible works as the two settings of the opera "Euridice," by Jacopo Peri and Giulio Caccini. In the above two most recent additions to the series a fresh illustration is furnished of the general comprehensiveness of the scheme. Signor Sgambati, indeed, is already well known both on the Continent and by his recent visit to this country, where, with his Pianoforte Concerto in G minor and other compositions, he has fully justified the reputation of a rising young maestro which preceded him. The name of Signor Zuelli, on the other hand, is as yet unknown to fame, he being still a pupil of the Liceo Musicale of Bologna, and the fact of a composition of his being included with such excellent company as that afforded by Signor Guidi's "Biblioteca del Sinfonista" cannot fail to exercise a stimulating influence upon the artistic progress of the young composer. Let us add that the encouragement thus offered by the publisher to native talent redounds infinitely to his credit. Of the two Gavottas now under notice, that by Signor Sgambati is by far the more elaborate. The composer here moves with perfect ease in the recognised forms of the classical dance, to which he has, moreover, succeeded in imparting sufficient freshness and rhythmic originality to establish the raison d'être generally, and not unreasonably, demanded nowadays for a similar revival of an antiquated movement. The work is rendered elaborate chiefly on account of its instrumentation for full orchestra by Signor Mancinelli, the well-known Roman maestro, who has performed his task skilfully, as might have been expected, although in some parts of the score, we think, a rather indiscreet use has been made of the wind instruments, producing a somewhat ponderous effect where lightness was or should have been intended. The Gavotta has already been successfully performed by the orchestral societies of Rome and Bologna. Signor Zuelli's composition is one of much less pretension, while it exhibits, partly for that reason perhaps, more of the quaintness appertaining to the original type upon which it is moulded. It is written for the string quartet only, with a somewhat unequal distribution of labour amongst the instruments, which occasionally betrays an inexperienced hand. But its general characteristics are those of artistic refinement and gracefulness—and a Gavotte above all should be graceful—which cannot fail to render its performance by a fairly efficient quartet party a real pleasure.

By the Abbey Door. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherly.
The New Kingdom. Song. Words by M. Mark-Lemon.
Composed by Berthold Tours.

Two Wings. Song. Words by M. Mark-Lemon.
The Outpost. Song. Words by Edward Oxenford.

Composed by Ciro Pinsuti.
Unsaid. Song. Written by Julia Cartwright.
Composed by Jacques Blumenthal.

[W. Morley and Co.]

THIS group of songs is a welcome addition to the stock of vocal music appealing not only to amateurs but to artists. Mr. Berthold Tours's contributions are fully worthy of his reputation, "By the Abbey Door" being a charming little story, charmingly told, both in the poetry and music; and "The New Kingdom" affording one more of the many proofs that the attention of an audience can be secured by simple means. In the last-named song, especially, there is genuine pathos in the strain of four bars upon a tonic pedal; and to show how the composer has thought out his subjects, we may mention that the harmonium part, which Mr. Tours has written for both his songs, accompanies only one verse in each. Signor Pinsuti is more at home in the graceful and refined song "Two Wings" than in the martial one which follows in our list. The airy and appropriate accompaniment to the first-mentioned composition is most artistically united with a highly attractive melody, and the harmonies throughout are just what might be expected from so accomplished a writer. "The Outpost" may be made highly effective by a good singer, but the materials used are somewhat conventional. The name of Blumenthal will alone attract vocalists to his song "Unsaid," and we can conscientiously affirm that they will not be disappointed, for both in the melody and accompaniments the composer has fully equalled, if not surpassed, many of his former successful efforts. We are glad to find that on the title-pages of all these songs the public is informed that they "may be sung without fee or licence."

The Voice of Spring. Words by Mrs. Hemans. Composed for Chorus and full Orchestra by C. Swinnerton Heap, Mus. Doc., Cantab.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE desire to perform, even in our domestic Concerts, something which may be called a "work," in preference to detached songs, duets, trios, and concerted pieces which have no connection with each other, has no doubt given rise to the flood of so-termed "Cantatas," which is increasing so rapidly that the supply seems likely to far exceed the demand. Many of these, which have recently come before us, are extremely good; and the use of those written for female voices will be found highly useful in schools; but commonplace vocal pieces are no less commonplace because they form a portion of a Cantata; and we shall be glad, therefore, to have a short respite from the duty of reviewing such works until composers see the necessity of throwing into them sufficient dramatic feeling to justify their title. Meanwhile, as a healthy protest against these conventional drawing-room compositions, we cordially welcome Mr. Swinnerton Heap's well written and effective chorus, which is not only a melodious and scholarly musical work, but thoroughly sympathetic with the refined poetry of Mrs. Hemans. Commencing with an instrumental introduction in excellent keeping with the feeling of the composition, the chorus begins with a flowing theme, gracefully and appropriately accompanied. The varied character of the words is faithfully reflected in the music throughout; and, did our space permit, we could cite many points of interest which prove that the composer has well thought out his design, and in no part sacrificed the simplicity of the work for the display of his musical acquirements. The pianoforte part is well written, yet we have no doubt that the effect of the composition with full orchestral accompaniments—which are published—can be but faintly realised by its performance with the support only of our household instrument.

A Tambourine Dance. For the Pianoforte. By Frank Austin. [Ashdown and Parry.]

THIS is a cleverly written and effective characteristic dance, easy to play, and yet brilliant and showy enough to remove it from the répertoire of simple pieces which very young performers too often imagine that they have grown out of. For the cultivation of a rhythmical feeling dance music is valuable to juvenile pianists; and in the composition before us the melodiousness of the themes and the constant changes of key cannot fail to interest the pupil, whilst for touch it may be recommended as an excellent lesson.

The Fan Series. Favourite Pianoforte Pieces. By classical and modern authors. Carefully revised and fingered. [Lamborn Cock.]

FOUR only of this series of pieces are at present published—Handel's Fantasia in C, Rubinstein's Romance and Melody in F, the Presto and Finale from Dussek's Sonata (Op. 9, No. 3), and J. S. Bach's Gavotte and Courante in G. All are excellently engraved and fingered wherever necessary. We do not know how many compositions are to be included in the collection; but upon the "Fan" which ornaments the outside cover the numbers are printed up to 12.

Sächsisches Lied, für Piano. Von Ignatz Gibsone.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.]

PIANISTS who can sing this song with the fingers, and avoid breaking the melody where it is divided between the hands, will assuredly give much pleasure even to a critical drawing-room audience, for the piece is elegantly written throughout, and sufficiently brief to prevent any feeling of weariness from the monotonous character of the composition. The "Lied ohne Worte" is perhaps a little overdone in the present day; but this style of music is excellent practice for the acquirement of varied shades of touch, and when we find so refined a specimen as the one before us we are glad to draw attention to it.

FOREIGN NOTES.

ALTHOUGH we are giving, in another part of our present issue, a detailed account of the first performance at Bayreuth of Richard Wagner's latest music-drama "Parsifal," a brief reference to the accounts of the work rendered in such of the more important Continental music-journals as have so far come under our notice may not be uninteresting to our readers.

Whereas the Paris Le Ménestrel—a journal generally disposed to do justice to the poet-composer—has so far abstained from furnishing a special notice of the event, its contemporary of well-known anti-Wagnerian tendencies, L'Art Musical, contains in its recent numbers some detailed and appreciative articles on the performance in question from the pen of M. Ernest Chausson. "All the fanatics of Paris," ironically remarks the journal quoted, in its issue of July 27, "have departed for the holy city, barefooted, clad in sackcloth, travelling staff in hand; and we shall presently read in the papers devoted to the cause a series of most glowing articles. For our part, we shall likewise have an account furnished to us, which, though it may not prove as mystically enthusiastic, will at least be written with perfect candour, calmness of judgment, and impartiality." In the following numbers the account referred to is rendered, containing in its opening paragraphs the following significant passage: "In my opinion this is one of the most astounding creations of modern genius. The splendour of the music, the noblesse of the subject, the variety of the dramatic situations—alternately of a religious, terrible, voluptuous, or sublime character—the picturesqueness of the decorations and of the mise-en-scène—all these combine so perfectly in absorbing the mind of the spectator by affording simultaneous enjoyment to the intellect, to the ear, and to the eye, that one feels captivated by this 'ardent and despotic inspiration' (to use an expression of Baudelaire), and carried beyond oneself by this artistic all-powerfulness." Surely this is "most glowing," and a great deal more so than, to judge by its previous remarks, L'Art Musical could have anticipated. The fact, however, of these articles (written, we may add, with a thorough knowledge of the subject, and with much artistic feeling) having been inserted in a journal which never allows an opportunity to pass of showing its dislike for everything Wagnerian, undoubtedly redounds greatly to its credit.—La Musique Populaire (edited by M. A. Pougin) shows itself far less enthusiastic about the "Bühnenweihfestspiel" than its contemporary. To begin with, it is somewhat ominous when we are told that the writer (who signs himself with the initials M. D.) has watched the performance "montre en main," and we are thereby prepared for his subsequent remark that the length of the work "renders it somewhat hard to digest for a French stomach." The critic, in his evident anxiety to keep to the juste milieu of criticism, makes frequent use of such guarded expressions as: "Whatever we may think of the system and the theories of Wagner, it ('Parsifal') is evidently a very powerful and very bold work, fatiguing and difficult to understand though it be." Nevertheless the writer is generally disposed to regard the new work favourably, and at the conclusion of his report assures his readers that, having assisted at two performances, he "does not consider that he has wasted his time." Though this may be somewhat backhanded praise, we take it to be intended for praise. The same journal also presents its readers with a sketch of the enchanted garden of Klingsor and its Flower Maidens, as represented in the second act of the drama.

Turning now from the French to the German musical press, we meet in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, of Leipzig, with some articles on the "Parsifal" performances from the pen of Wilhelm Tappert, the late editor of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, one of the ablest among the thorough-going Wagnerians, and the compiler—oddly enough—of a "lexicon" containing a copious selection of slanderous and invidious remarks passed upon the reformer in the course of his career. Herr Tappert, it must be admitted, is not very happy in some of his preliminary observations, marked as they are throughout by a genuine enthusiasm which should protect him, at all events, against a wilful misinterpretation of his meaning. Thus, the writer says, inter alia, "It is necessary to feel and think as a German and a Christian in order to appreciate fully and entirely the beauties of 'Parsifal.'" The suggestion may be, and probably is, perfectly correct from a Wagnerian standpoint, but its logical inference is, that all those who cannot lay claim to the above essential combination of personal qualifications are placed very much in the same position as the "pure fool" Parsifal himself, when, after gazing with apparent lack of sympathy at the mysteries of the Grail (in the first act), he is ignominiously dismissed from the hall of the "Gralsburg," and, according to the stage directions, "the door is violently closed upon him." Non-German or Non-Christian visitors to the Bayreuth "Festspiel" then, will have to grope their way in relative darkness as best they can. There are some good points made, however, in Herr Tappert's subsequent remarks, whose verdict, as regards the musical portion of the drama, may be summed up in the following sentence: "All the achievements in the entire range of harmony and instrumentation have been deposited in this score as in some archives; 'Parsifal,' indeed, is a complete treasury, the contents of which will only be fully ascertained, and properly estimated at a future time."—In the Berlin Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, Herr Otto Lessmann, successor to Herr Tappert in the editorship of that journal, and, like the latter, an ardent disciple of the Bayreuth master, renders an equally enthusiastic, interesting, and exhaustive account of the event in question. Herr Lessmann prefaces his remarks with one of those half-oracular, half-epigrammatical utterances of Franz Liszt, in which the veteran maestro delights. "During and after yesterday's (the first) performance of 'Parsifal,'" said the pianist-composer, "the general impression was that nothing can be said about this wondrous work. Those whom it has touched thus deeply may well be rendered silent by it; its lofty pendulum swings from the sublime to the sublimest." In these words the keynote has been struck to Herr Lessmann's subsequent exposition, the sympathetic warmth of which is positively contagious, and the more so since there is nothing in his remarks which could offend the susceptibilities of the less biased reader, as is, unfortunately for their cause, so frequently the case in the utterances of the Wagner admirers par excellence. Herr Lessmann is, we think, strongest in his criticism of the performers, although, for obvious reasons, we must refrain from quoting his able strictures in this respect, while strongly recommending to our readers the perusal of the original articles. The critic, having witnessed no less than five representations of the work, is enabled to give his opinion as regards the relative merits of the various representatives of the principal characters. The Kundry of Fräulein Brandt he considers in every way equal, though differing in conception, to that of Frau Materna; the assumption of the same part by Fräulein Malten being, in his opinion, inferior to both. Herr Jäger, who subsequently assumed the part of Parsifal, in alternation with Herren Winkelmann and Gudehus has proved, we are told, a more intellectual exponent of the character of the hero of the Grail than his two rivals, although, as Herr Lessmann proudly and admiringly adds, there exists no rivalry, in the ordinary sense, among the artists assembled at Bayreuth, whose only desire seems to be to render fullest justice to the latest creation of their revered master and to their own unquestioned abilities. The two German authorities whose opinions we have just quoted (in each case professional musicians) having personally witnessed the now historical first performances of the Bayreuth "Festspiel," we have justly given them the precedence in this partial résumé of continental opinion—so far as German commentators are concerned. We may now, in conclusion, cite a few observations made in the Wiener Signale on the part of a critic who, like the writer of these "Notes," has followed the progress of these interesting representations at a distance. Herr Eduard Kulke, in addition to the special report furnished in the same paper from the pen of the able Viennese critic, Dr. Theodor Helm, divides the critical pilgrims to the "Mecca of Music," as Bayreuth has been called, into five classes. The first comprises the fanatic admirers of the work who go into raptures over the "Christian mysticism" displayed in it, and whose enthusiasm does more harm than good to the cause of their idol. The second includes the more sober adherents of the Wagnerian doctrine, who dwell chiefly upon the "symbolic significance" of the drama and its more cosmopolitan character. In the third category the writer places those worthy people who object, on religious grounds, to the Christian element as represented in "Parsifal," wherein they profess to see a "profanation" of Christianity—Karl Frenzel, of the Berlin National Zeitung, being included in their number. The fourth party comprises those who decline, à priori, to enter upon the religious tendency introduced into the work, regarding it solely from an artistic standpoint—Eduard Hanslick, the eminent Viennese critic, being one of its chief representatives. Another attitude taken up by Bayreuth critics—the fifth in the enumeration of our observer—is that caused by the impression that the poet-composer has in his new work made use of means which are not "purely artistic," and which, in a measure, place it upon a level with the "Passion Plays" of Oberammergau. We, of course, quote these remarks of a casual observer for what they may be worth, and merely add that a work which, as regards its subject-matter alone, can give rise to such widely divergent views must surely be at least a remarkable one.

It is stated that an aggregate number of 44,000 words (representing many languages) was despatched at the Bayreuth telegraph office from six o'clock till near midnight on the evening of the first representation of "Parsifal," the local staff of telegraphists of the small provincial town having, of course, been considerably reinforced for the occasion.

The widely circulated rumour, to the effect that Richard Wagner is at present engaged upon a new music-drama founded upon Indian mythology, has been most positively denied by the master himself.

At a General Meeting of the German Stage Society, to be held this month at Munich, under the presidency of Herr von Hülsen (the director of the Berlin Opera), a proposal will be made, among others, that a special commission be elected for the purpose of procuring a new translation of the libretto of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" for the uniform use of the German operatic stage. The existing German translations of the work, as is well known, do not in any way satisfactorily represent the Italian original.

The Royal Opera of Berlin recommenced its performances on the 20th ult. with Beethoven's "Fidelio." A new opera, entitled "Gudrun," by August Klughardt, will be amongst the novelties to be produced during the season.

Herr Wachtel, the phenomenal and apparently indefatigable tenor, is just now appearing in a series of his favourite rôles at the Kroll'sche Theater of Berlin. The veteran singer is in his sixtieth year. Dr. Emil Krauss, well remembered by London amateurs as one of the prominent members of the late German Opera Company at Drury Lane, is likewise giving a series of most successful impersonations at the same establishment.

A season of Italian opera was inaugurated on the 15th ult. at the Berlin Philharmonie (formerly Central Skating Rink) with Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera."

The Leipzig Stadt-Theater commenced a fresh season of performances, on the 1st ult., under its new director, Herr Max Stagemann; Lessing's "Minna von Barnhelm" having been selected for the opening night, and Mozart's "Zauberflöte" for the succeeding one. The season is likely to be marked by special activity, definite promises having already been given as to the production of several interesting novelties.

A new concert-hall is at present in course of erection at Leipzig, and will be known in future as the "Neues Gewandhaus."

The marriage is announced in German papers of Dr. Hans von Bülow with Fräulein Marie Schanzer, of the Meiningen Hoftheater, who will remain an active member of that institution for the present.

M. Lamoureux, the Paris chef d'orchestre, proposes to include in his concerts during the coming winter selections from a series of operas, both classical and modern, which have never been represented on the French lyrical stage.

M. Michaelis, the Paris publisher, who is issuing a most interesting series of "Chefs-d'œuvre classiques de l'Opéra français," has just added to their number the opera "Isis," by Lully (edited by Th. de Lajarte), and "Céphale et Procris," by Grétry (edited by M. Gevaert). Three other works are now in course of publication, viz., "Roland," by Piccini; "Ernelinde," by Philidor; and "Les Bayadères," by Catel.

Madame Judith Gautier has just published, at Paris, a volume entitled "Richard Wagner et son œuvre poétique depuis 'Rienzi' jusqu'à 'Parsifal,'" containing a detailed analysis of the music-dramas of the Bayreuth reformer, and deriving a special significance from the fact of its emanating from a French source. Madame Gautier, we may add, has been for some years on intimate terms with the family of the composer.

M. Pasdeloup, the Director of the Paris Concerts Populaires, is just now giving a series of Symphony-Concerts, with the greater part of the members of his famous orchestra, at the Grand-Théâtre of Bordeaux.

Two performances of Wagner's tetralogy "Der Ring des Nibelungen" are announced to take place in October next at the Alhambra Theatre of Brussels, under the direction of Herr Angelo Neumann.

M. Léo Délibes' opera, "Jean de Nivelle," is in course of preparation at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, and will be produced there under the composer's direction during the coming autumn.

Madame Christine Nilsson has, according to Le Ménestrel, accepted an engagement for a concert-tour in the United States and Canada, and will start for Boston (Mass.) in October next.

Under the title of "Musique et Musiciens au XVIII<sup>e</sup> Siècle," an interesting volume has just been published at Leyden, under the joint authorship of MM. Jonckbloet and Land.

The new operatic season at Copenhagen is to be opened with the performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin." Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon" will be the second work in the répertoire.

Signor Sgambati, the eminent Italian pianist-composer, will shortly proceed on a concert-tour in America.

At the International Music Festival recently held at Geneva, the municipal band of Turin gained the first prize for band-playing, and the Società Corale degli Artisti of the same town (consisting of male voices only) likewise obtained the first distinction for reading at sight and the second for execution.

A monument erected to the memory of Bellini, the composer of "Norma," "La Sonnambula," and "I Puritani," is to be unveiled this month at Catania, in Sicily, his native town.

At Rome died, on July 29, Nicola Alberini, Professor at the Royal Academy of Sta. Cecilia, and composer of sacred music as well as of an opera, "Don Saverio," which was successfully performed in 1875 at the Politeama.

François Wartel, the eminent professor of singing, died at Paris on August 12, at the age of seventy-six. Among his most distinguished pupils were Mesdames Nilsson and Trebelli.

We have also to announce the death of M. Léonard Terry, professor of singing at the Conservatoire of Liège, and corresponding member of the Belgian Académie des Beaux Arts. M. Terry was the possessor of a most complete and valuable musical library, which, it is hoped, will be secured by the authorities of the Brussels Conservatoire.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Sondershausen.—Lohconcert (July 30): Overtures, "Wallenstein's Tod" (A. Schultze) and "Mignon" (A. Thomas); Symphony, manuscript (Markull); Flute concerto (Manns); Symphony, C major (Mozart). Lohconcert (August 6): Festival Overture (Lassen); Violin Concerto (Bruch); Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" (Wagner); Fragment from "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz); and Symphony, with the motto, "Gelebt, gestrebt—Gestritten, gelitten—Gestorben, umworden" (Joachim Raff).

Dieppe.—Classical Concert (July 29): Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); Trio for two oboes and violoncello (Beethoven); Scherzo (Lefebvre); Prelude to "Le Déluge" (Saint-Saëns); Scènes Pittoresques (Massenet).

CORRESPONDENCE.

LISZT'S "DANTE" SYMPHONY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to an article in your paper of August 1, on "The London Musical Season," by Mr. Henry C. Lunn, in which that gentleman makes the following misstatement, namely, "that the Philharmonic Society had boldly brought forward Liszt's 'Dante' Symphony, for the first time in this country." This is not the case, as this work was first produced by me at my Orchestral Concert on April 22, and repeated on May 20. I inclose the programmes of both concerts. By inserting this letter in your next issue you will oblige,

Yours faithfully,

126, Harley Street,
August 24, 1882.

WILHELM GANZ.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERGAVENNY.—There was a very large gathering at the recent Musical Eisteddfod in the Market Hall. Nine choirs, and a much larger number of glee parties, making a total of nearly 3,000 persons, competed, exclusive of the legion of soloists and pianoforte-playing competitors. The Eisteddfod commenced at eleven o'clock, the adjudicators being Mr. Brinley Richards, Mr. R. Bartholomew, of Ludlow, and Mr. Emlyn Evans; Accompanists, Mr. Harrell Tomkins and Mr. George Howells; Conductor, the Rev. Theophilus Rees, Penttyrch. The following was the programme: For the best performance of the glee, "With sighs, sweet rose" (Callcott), £4. Eighteen parties entered, and nearly all competed. Felix and friends, and four friends, Blaenavon; Tom Felix and party, Pontypridd. For the best performance of the madrigal, "Sweete floweres, ye were too faire," by a choir of not less than thirty voices, £10, with a silver medal for the conductor. Awarded to the Gwent Glee Party, Rhymney. Best performance on the cornet (with pianoforte accompaniment) of the cavatina, "Robert! toi que j'aime" (Meyerbeer), £2. Mr. Brinley Richards, who adjudicated upon the three competitors (J. Livsey, Cathays, Cardiff; J. Davies, Ebbw Vale; and J. Francis, Neath), said that Davies's performance was exceedingly good, and awarded him the prize. Mr. Davies is the bandmaster of the noted 2nd Breconshire Volunteer band. For the best performance on the pianoforte of Haydn's "Gipsy Rondo," candidates not to exceed seventeen years of age, £2. There were several competitors, Miss Walker, of Grawen Terrace, Merthyr; Miss Polly Williams, Blaenavon, eight years of age; and Miss Edith Bunting, London, being selected for the final competition. Mr. Brinley Richards, in giving his adjudication, said he was agreeably surprised at the great progress made in South Wales in pianoforte-playing during the last two or three years. In this competition the playing was very good, but the music was too easy. He was bound to award the prize to the best performer, and that was Miss Edith Bunting, of London, but the little girl only eight years of age (Polly Williams, Blaenavon) played in a remarkably clever manner, and the committee, on his recommendation, awarded her a second prize of £1 1s. At 3.30 the principal competition came on, being £100 for the performance of "The many rend the skies" (Handel), with pianoforte and harmonium accompaniment, for a choir of not less than 150 or over 300 voices, with a gold medal for the conductor. The hall was densely crowded with about 5,000 people during the competition, and much excitement prevailed among the members of the different choirs as to the result of the competition. Mr. Emlyn Evans first spoke in Welsh. He said this was the best choir competition that had taken place in the whole of the Principality in connection with eisteddfodau for very many years. He had never met with such a large number of good choirs before. Mr. Brinley Richards said the competitions and the good order kept by so many thousands of Welshmen was highly creditable to all, and exceedingly gratifying to himself. Indeed, he might go so far as to question whether such a scene could be found anywhere else outside the Principality. Better choral music he had seldom listened to. Three choirs had distinguished themselves above the rest in the competition, one of whom himself and colleague thought very highly of, and that was the Rhondda Philharmonic Society; then the Blaenavon choir. But the choir to which they awarded the prize was the Dowlais Harmonic Society. The result was received with general satisfaction. Best performance of the anthem, "God is gone up with a merry noise" (Croft), £25, with a gold medal for the conductor. There competed, Tredegar United, Gwent Moriah (Dowlais), and Morlais (Dowlais) choirs. Mr. Brinley Richards thought this competition was a better test of vocalisation than the last. If there was a second prize he would award it to the Tredegar choir; but as there was not, himself and coadjutors gave the prize to the Morlais Choral Society—Conductor, Simpson George. Best soprano air, "Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets" £2. Awarded to Eos Ddu. The glee, "Winds, gently whisper," £3: Dan Price and party, Dowlais. There competed for the band contest, Neath, Brynmawr, Bridgend, Risca, and 1st Glamorgan (Artillery) bands. The prize was £20, and the competition took place in the Castle grounds after the Eisteddfod.

BRECON.—The Archidiaconal Choral Union held a Festival in the fine old Priory Church of St. John's, on Tuesday morning, the 15th ult., at 11.45 a.m. Choirs of the Archdeaconry, numbering about 520 voices, attended. The service commenced with the hymn, "Come forth, O Christian brothers." Five of the South Wales Borderers formed the band, which headed the procession and accompanied, in the place of the organ, in all the hymns. The Venite, chanted to a Gregorian 5th tone and ending, was very fairly sung. The Te Deum was chanted to three chants, and the Benedictus to a chant by Dr. Stainer; the Special Psalms were sung to Gregorian chants. The anthem was "I was glad" (Sir John Goss), the organ accompaniment being finely played by the Organist of the Church, Mr. Rees T. Heins. A very appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. Archer Thompson Gurney, M.A. The "Hallelujah" Chorus was performed on the organ at the conclusion of the service. The Conductor was Mr. Thomas Davies, A. Mus. T.C.L., the trainer of choirs to the Union. Much of the success of the Festival was due to the Hon. Secretary, the Rev. J. Price, Llanfagan Rectory.

BUDLEIGH-SALTERTON.—An evening Concert was given at the Public Rooms on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., by Mr. Barré D. Bagly, assisted by several amateurs. The programme was well selected and most efficiently rendered. Mr. Bagly was highly effective in De Beriot's "Scène de Ballet," and also in the duet with Mrs. Squire, on "William Tell" (De Beriot and Osborne). A marked success was obtained by Master Squire, a violoncello virtuoso only eleven years of age. Master Squire, who obtained a Senior Honours Certificate from the Royal Academy of Music, plays like an accomplished musician, his tone, style, and execution being of a very high order. Mrs. Squire presided at the pianoforte throughout the Concert.

DEMERRARA.—Mr. Colbeck's Concert, in aid of the funds of the proposed College of Music, was given in the Philharmonic Hall on Tuesday, July 18. The programme, which was miscellaneous, included the "Toy Symphony" and a selection from The Pirates of Penzance. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Webb, Mrs. Wieting, and Messrs. Veacock, Hughes and Gilderdale. Miss Thompson and Mr. Miller contributed a duet for pianoforte and violin, and Mr. Brotero's cornet solo was much appreciated. The Concert was well attended and highly successful.

DOVER.—The end of the College Summer term was signalled by a public Concert and the opening of the splendid new organ presented by Dr. Astley, and built by A. Gern, of London. The programme of the concert included Anderton's Cantata The Wreck of the Hesperus, which was given with orchestral accompaniments, and the excellence with which it was rendered elicited much applause from the large audience assembled, and effectively demonstrated the care and pains bestowed upon the youthful performers by their energetic Conductor, Mr. Stevens. The playing of the school orchestra was also an attractive feature in the concert. The new organ in the School Chapel was formally opened at a Special Service the next day, Canon Scott-Robertson preaching the sermon, and Mr. A. H. Stevens, B.A., the newly appointed Organist and Succesor, presiding at the instrument. The Service was well and effectively given by the College choir to a large congregation of boys and friends. The new organ is unique in many respects, being worked entirely by tubular pneumatics passing under the chancel floor from the manuals on the south to the organ on the north. There are eight stops in the swell, six in the great, and two in the pedal, and the tone is very fine, the pipes being of spotted metal throughout, except the front, which are of pure burnished tin. Recitals were given on the following day, in the afternoon by Mr. Edwin Barnes, of London, and in the evening by Mr. Stevens.

FOVEY.—The second Festival of the St. Austell Deanery Choir Association was held in the Parish Church on Wednesday, the 16th ult. The choirs of eight parishes were represented, the voices numbering upwards of 200. The service was choral throughout and most creditably rendered. The Rev. C. R. Sowell, St. Gorran, was precentor; Mr. C. E. Zuleff (Organist of Holy Trinity Church, St. Austell) conducted during the service, and Mr. G. H. Bate presided at the organ. The church was filled in every part.

GREAT MALVERN.—At the Priory Church, on Friday, the 25th ult., an Organ Recital was given by Dr. C. J. Frost, of London, whose fine performance of a selection from the works of Guilman, Merkel, Freyer, Rheinberger, Chipp, C. E. Stephens, Widor, and Boyton Smith gave great satisfaction to the numerous congregation assembled.

GWENNAF.—Three Concerts were given on the 1st and 2nd ult., in a large room in Trevice House (kindly lent by E. B. Beauchamp, Esq.) in aid of the Gwennap Church Organ Fund. A number of ladies and gentleman assisted. A Bazaar and Open-air Fête was held in the grounds of Trevice on the same days, in aid of the same object. The Concerts were largely attended.

HERNE BAY.—Mr. E. A. Cruttenden, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his annual Concert in the Town Hall on the 10th ult. The soloists were Miss Maude Kelly, Miss Falkenberg, Mr. Frank Peach, and Master A. S. Iggulden, all of whom were highly successful. Two pianoforte duets, performed by Miss Edith Kelly and Mr. Cruttenden, were much appreciated.

KINVER.—A successful entertainment consisting of Recitations and Music, instrumental and vocal, was given on the 8th ult. Scenes from the Midsummer Night's Dream were effectively rendered by Mr. Moseley, and Miss Henden Warde received well-merited encores for her songs; Miss Moseley's pianoforte-playing being also highly appreciated. The Rev. G. Wharton acted as accompanist and Conductor.

LEEDS.—Dr. Spark, the borough Organist, assisted by the Yorkshire St. Cecilia Quartet, gave his last free Organ Recital for the present season, in the Town Hall, on Saturday, July 29. Dr. Spark's programme was well selected, both to please his hearers and to show the capabilities of the magnificent organ of which he has so long been the able custodian. The vocal part of the entertainment was admirably rendered. The Rev. Canon Ormsby proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Spark for the musical treats he has from time to time provided.

LEWES.—On Wednesday, July 26, being St. Anne's Day, a dedication festival was held at St. Anne's Church. There was a full choral evensong at 8 p.m., when the church was crowded. The choir, augmented for the occasion by members of St. John's, sang with much effect Macfarren's anthem, "A day in Thy courts." A collection was made in aid of the choir funds, during which a hymn was sung, and also Gadsby's Te Deum, in E flat, as a special act of praise and thanksgiving. Mr. Percy J. Starnes, the organist, played, for the introductory voluntary, one of his own works, Andante con moto, which reflected much credit on the young composer.

LIVERPOOL.—A new organ, built expressly for Mr. William Lea's Music establishment, Church Street, was opened on Saturday afternoon, the 12th ult., by Mr. W. H. Jude. The instrument has been erected by Wadsworth Brothers, of Manchester, and is especially adapted for solo performance, several of the stops being particularly fine. It is Mr. Lea's intention to continue the Recitals every Saturday until the musical season commences.—A Choral Concert was given on Saturday evening, the 19th ult., at Hengler's Cirque, by the Cambrian Choral Society and the Liverpool Vocalists' Union. The programme included the competitive pieces to be sung at the Denbigh National Eisteddfod, some part-songs, and Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," all of which were well rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. T. C. Jones. The solo vocalists were Madame Billine Porter and Mr. George Barton, who were highly successful. Miss Maggie Evans contributed a pianoforte solo, and accompanied throughout the evening.

NEWPORT.—An Organ Recital was given at St. Mark's Church on Thursday evening, the 24th ult., by Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon., in aid of the funds for the building of new schools for the parish. Notwithstanding the inclement weather a large congregation assembled. The Recital comprised selections from the works of Smart, Hesse, Weber, Sterndale Bennett, Warwick Jordan, Spohr, and Bach. The result was a satisfactory addition to the funds for which the Recital was given.

NEWTON.—The new Organ built by Messrs. Hele, of Plymouth, for St. Mary's Church, was opened on Saturday, the 5th ult. After the Service a Recital was given by Mr. J. Hele, when an excellent programme was performed in a masterly manner, exhibiting the powers of the instrument to the greatest advantage.

NORTH BERWICK.—An Organ Recital was given on Wednesday, the 16th ult., in St. Baldred's Church, by Mr. Frank Bates, Mus. Bac., which was highly successful. Mr. Bates is the newly appointed organist of St. John's Church, Edinburgh.

OLDHAM.—The Glee Union met on the 16th ult., and, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Greaves, gave an excellent Concert. On Sunday, the 20th ult., a Floral Service was given in the Memorial Church, which was well attended. The whole of the music was most effectively rendered.

OTLEY.—The sixteenth Annual Festival of the Choral Union was celebrated in the ancient Parish Church, on Saturday, July 29. The service was full choral. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. H. J. Wilkinson. The psalms were sung to double-chants by Soper and Goss; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Dr. Stainer's arrangement of the Parisian tone; and the anthem was "Send out Thy light" (Gounod). The Processional, "Glorious things of thee are spoken," was sung to music by J. Schop. The music was excellently rendered. Mr. A. Longfield presided at the organ, and Mr. Stables, of Kirkstall, conducted.

PIETERMARITZBURG, NATAL.—The first Philharmonic Concert of the present (second) season took place on Friday, June 29. The programme consisted of Sterndale Bennett's May Queen and a miscellaneous selection, the performance being the most successful the Society has yet given. The chorus and orchestra numbered about seventy performers. The rendering of the choruses was exceedingly praiseworthy, and the soloists (all amateurs) acquitted themselves with fair success. The orchestra, which was the best ever heard in Maritzburg, was especially good in the miscellaneous portion, which included the overture to "Stradella" and portions of the "Surprise" Symphony. The Conductor of the Society is Mr. R. Sweeney, lately bandmaster of the 3rd Buffs.

SHREWSBURY.—The annual School Concert and formal opening of the new schools took place on July 28. The first part of the programme, which was sacred, commenced with Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, played by Mr. Edward Green, and included "By Babylon's wave," with orchestra (Ch. Gounod). The second part was miscellaneous. The choruses and part-songs were very well rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. W. B. Kay, who conducted.

TEIGNMOUTH.—Miss C. L. Linter gave a Concert at the Assembly Rooms on the 8th ult., which was well attended. Amongst those who assisted were Fräulein von Schwedler, who was highly successful, eliciting several encores, and Miss Meynell, who was formerly a pupil of Miss Linter, and recently held a scholarship at the National Training School for Music. This young lady possesses a fine voice, and her solos were highly appreciated.

TWYKESBURY.—On Tuesday evening, the 22nd ult., a large congregation assembled in the Abbey Church, to hear an Organ Recital by Dr. C. J. Frost, of London. The programme comprised works by E. H. Thorne, C. M. Widor, Handel, W. T. Best, Boyton Smith, A. Freyer, and Meyerbeer.

VICTORIA.—The Report of the Musical Association for the year 1881-82 shows that the Society's financial condition is in the highest degree satisfactory. Monthly meetings have been held at Glen's Rooms, and latterly at Gunsler's Café, at which performances of compositions by the best masters have been given. Several works of interest have been added to the library since the last report, and it is suggested by the Committee that at the monthly General Meetings papers on musical subjects should be read.

SECTION V.—"VERY DIFFICULT."

SPECIAL NOTICE FOR THE NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

FORSYTH BROTHERS have great pleasure in drawing attention to the New and Enlarged Edition of Charles Hallé's "Practical Pianoforte School." A great desire having been expressed that Mr. Hallé should make Sections 1 and 2 more extended, he has added sixteen New Numbers, consisting of Airs and Melodies arranged by himself, three Pieces written expressly at his request by Stephen Heller and Ferdinand Hiller, and other favourite works. He has also enlarged and re-arranged the Pianoforte Tutor, making it the best and most useful Tutor ever published. The first three Sections have been re-engraved in the same improved style as Sections 4 and 5, making the whole work uniform, and as complete as the best engraving, printing, and paper can make it.

PREFACE TO THE NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

THE great success of the "Practical Pianoforte School" having made it necessary to engrave new Plates, I have taken the advantage of it to correct the few misprints which, in spite of the utmost care, had crept into the former Edition; and, in compliance with the suggestions received from many eminent Teachers, have considerably enlarged the First and Second Sections, earnestly wishing that the usefulness of the work may thereby be still further increased.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of
LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON's Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

J. & J. HOPKINSON

Invite attention to the following Testimonials:—

I have had occasion to test HOPKINSON'S Pianos in London and in Paris; and I am bound to declare that with regard to power, evenness of tone, and equality of touch, I have found them of rare excellence.

They are Instruments that all Pianists ought to appreciate, for they allow them to give expression to their feelings, and to play with the most delicate nuances.

PARIS, July 23, 1878. (Signed) CH. GOUNOD.

I have played at the Paris Exhibition on Messrs. HOPKINSON'S Pianos, and I say with pleasure that the quality of sound has completely satisfied me, as well as the elasticity of touch, which leaves nothing to be desired.

(Signed) ANTOINE DE KONTSKI.

July 30, 1878.

I have had the opportunity of trying the excellent Pianos of Messrs. HOPKINSON, whose instruments have the qualities I esteem in a Piano; "they have a soul," which permits the performer to communicate the poetic feeling in his heart, and in the spirit necessary to forget himself in his performances.

(Signed) D. MAGNUS.

PARIS, July 30, 1878.

The Grand Pianos of HOPKINSON, London, are very remarkable. They are equal to those of the best Houses already known. All the qualities which can be demanded by an experienced virtuoso—vigour of attack, openness of sound, possibility to give the necessary shade to the music, and to produce effects of extreme delicacy—are found in HOPKINSON'S Pianofortes. They possess also a sonority of a crystalline nature, which gives them a certain charm, and characterises their own personality.

(Signed) NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,

Director of the Conservatoire of Moscow.

PARIS, August 3, 1878.

I state with pleasure that the Grand Pianos of Messrs. J. and J. HOPKINSON of London, which I have had the opportunity of hearing and of trying myself, are remarkable for their fabrication, and that they rival those of the best Houses of Paris and London for their wonderful power and elasticity of touch.

I should wish no other for my personal use, and to accompany me in my concerts.

(Signed) CH. NILSSON.

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

This Action is manufactured solely of mahogany, and in its working is perfectly noiseless, and as weights and springs are not used it is warranted never to get out of order, and will last as long as the Pianoforte. The Inventor, being an Organist, can most confidently recommend his invention to those wishing for real good pedal practice at home.

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

OCTOBER 1, 1882.

THE FEMININE IN MUSIC.

WHEN noticing the production of Mrs. Meadows White's Cantata, "The Passions," at Hereford, the correspondent of a daily contemporary touched upon an interesting question, which it may be worth while to discuss more fully. The writer clearly indicated an opinion that masculine genius has by no means exhausted the capacity of music, and never can do so, because what remains calls for feminine perception and expression. The assumption here is that, while music is the language of emotion, the emotion of woman is distinct, if not in degree, at least in character from that of man—that in the region of sentiment she perceives and feels things which elude him, or recognises them in a peculiar light emanating from her own individuality. About this there is nothing that can be called purely speculative. All art work is personal to the worker, and, as no two artists see with the same eyes, the general result presents infinite points of difference. Sometimes those points are far asunder. Thus we have long been familiar with the classification which assigns to the music of certain composers a masculine character, and to that of others an approximation towards feminine traits. For this reason Porpora was called the "wife of Haydn," and Schubert is sometimes spoken of as a feminine Beethoven. Such phraseology, however, must be considered as figurative merely. Under no circumstances can the most womanish of men approximate save remotely to the individualism of the opposite sex, least of all within the domain of feeling. In this respect the man and the woman are as distinct as their physical organisation makes them. There is no confounding the two. A recognition of the wide differences obtaining amongst men becomes, nevertheless, important to the present argument, because if such variations exist under conditions fundamentally the same, we may reasonably infer that much greater ones are discoverable on the other side of the gulf dividing the sexes. The curious thing is that, with regard to music, we neither know the extent nor the nature of those variations. Listen as we will, no sound crosses the gulf save faint echoes. Woman, as a creative musician, can hardly be said to exist.

This brings us face to face with one of the most remarkable phenomena connected with the psychology of art. In not a few vocations demanding the exercise of fancy, sentiment, and delicate expression, woman has gained the laurels due to successful creative effort. Mrs. Hemans and Mrs. Browning among poets; Angelica Kaufmann and Rosa Bonheur among painters; George Eliot, George Sand, and Charlotte Brontë among writers of fiction, to mention no others, hold a rank equal to that attained by all save the greatest men. Yet in the field of music these distinguished ladies can hardly be said to have colleagues. There woman does not originate, she only interprets or reproduces. The full extent of the truth of this appears, without the writer intending it, in a brochure entitled "Woman as a Musician," the work of Mrs. Fanny Raymond Ritter. So long as the American authoress deals with performers she has a right to pride in woman's achievements. She can speak of Catalani, Malibran, Devrient, Sontag, Patti, Lind, Nilsson, Néruda, Clara Schumann, Viardot-Garcia, and a host of others whose genius has shed lustre upon their sex and adorned their art. Beyond the range of executive work Mrs. Ritter's position as the champion of musical woman becomes quite pathetic in its hopelessness. She is driven to all manner of assumptions and inferences, more or less unsupported, in order to obtain even a moderate show of facts upon which to base a conclusion. We are asked, for example, to accept as an impossibility that woman passed through certain periods in the development of civilisation without giving voice to her emotions; while "as national and peasant folk-songs are traditionally said to have been nearly always composed by the persons who first sang them, and as women have always been their most zealous performers, it is only fair to suppose that they have also had something to do with their composition as well as with their poetry." Mrs. Ritter continues in the same vein: "It would be unnatural to think that the beautiful lullabies and cradle-songs, of which hundreds exist in different languages and nationalities, were composed by martial barons, rough serving men or rougher peasants, and not by their wives or daughters. . . . And the melancholy life of the serf, watching her flocks on the green hills, or gathering wood for her hearth amid the implacable brambles, and the lonely lady of the castle, spinning or embroidering her cunning tapestries while she waited, sometimes for years, the return of father, husband, brother, lover—and then the anxious women of the fisher people—did they indeed endure their sorrows voicelessly? I cannot believe it; I have no doubt but that many of those simple, touching, heart-breaking melodies and poems were of women's creation." All this may be interesting speculation, but it is worthless in an inquiry after hard facts; nor has Mrs. Ritter much more firm ground to go upon when she emerges from the region of inference into that of record. She tells of the half-mythical Saint Cecilia and of Miriam, the prophetess, on whose behalf we are dared to say that her song of triumph was not her own composition. After this, with a mighty leap, the enthusiastic advocate brings us down to Josephine Lang, Fanny Hensel, Virginia Gabriel and Elise Polko—of Mrs. Meadows White and Mrs. Bartholomew she does not seem to know anything. Having heard all that can be said by Mrs. Ritter, there is no need to discuss further the question of woman's musical barrenness. A few gifted members of the sex have been more or less fortunate in their emulation of men, and that is all. Not a single great work can be traced to a feminine pen.

The reason why half the human race—and that half the one most susceptible to the impressions from which music springs and to which it gives birth—should be thus non-productive offers a very interesting subject for investigation. Pursuing it, we first ask, "Is woman incapable of taking high rank as a composer?" To reply in the affirmative demands more boldness and less regard for the force of analogical reasoning than we pretend to possess. The position of woman as an executant of the highest class—a position which distinctly implies a measure of independent creative power—her actual achievements in composition, as far as they go, and her prominence in connection with arts of a kindred nature, all forbid the belief that her natural musical endowments can carry their possessor no farther than she has gone. How, then, is the unused capacity to be developed? If there be in woman's nature a stored force upon which no demand has yet been made, how can we reach it and turn it to account? Mrs. Ritter, unable to deny the raison d'être of the question, answers it thus: "But women have only lately realised the depth and strength of the science of music, and what long years of severe mental discipline and scientific training are necessary in order to master the art of composition. . . . Mathematics, acoustics, psychology, languages, as well as general literary acquirements, the practice and technicalities of several instruments, and the science of music, must all be mastered by the aspirant in composition, and gradually, through the application and assimilation of long years of study, become the 'second nature' of his mind. . . . And why should not women of sufficient intellectual and especial ability to warrant the possibility of their attaining honourable distinction make an effort, and, discarding the absurd idea that composition is an affair of instinct, study to compose for immortality also? There is surely a feminine side of composition, as of every other art. And I would suggest the adoption of the science of composition as an elective, if not obligatory, branch of the higher course of study in ladies' colleges."

Mrs. Ritter clearly holds the opinion that composers, unlike poets, are made, not born; but it will prove unfortunate for woman's aspirations after higher musical honours if the advice of the American authoress be taken. Admitting that great composers are the outcome of long years of study devoted to mathematics, acoustics, psychology, and all the rest of it, then the "weaker sex" have little chance against men. Happily the facts are not as Mrs. Ritter puts them. A man, or woman, may be a great composer without crossing the pons asinorum, or making the smallest acquaintance with the "ologies." All knowledge is good, truly, and worthy to be desired; but the greatest masters of music contrived to do with singularly little, outside the range of their own art. Wherefore, let the pernicious theory that ladies' colleges can manufacture lady composers be put aside once and for all. The musical instinct—apart from which musical studies are no more useful than clothes on a skeleton—comes as a gift of God. It is a fire no man can kindle; and the function of the teacher with regard to it is simply that of direction and control.

Curiously enough, one short sentence in the extract from Mrs. Ritter's pamphlet, given above, touches the root of the matter, though the writer does not seem to have perceived it. "There is surely a feminine side of composition, as of every other art." Thus our authoress exclaims, and we agree with her; further, we strongly incline to believe that woman has failed as a creative musician because she has approached composition from the masculine side. Taught by men, looking at models fashioned by men, and always emulous of the art-work which men have produced, there is more than a possibility that her energies have been misdirected. In the analogous art of poetry the case is different. Poetic utterance is more spontaneous, less elaborate, and nothing like so heavily weighted with scientific incumbrance. Here the master with his rules and the classic with its commanding influence have less scope, the result being that feminine poetry has a distinct existence. There are passages in it which no man would think of writing, and could not write if he would. Take, as example, Mrs. Browning's description of a sleeping infant, in which occur these lines:—

There he lay upon his back,
The yearling creature, warm and moist with life
To the bottom of his dimples—to the ends
Of the lovely tumbled curls about his face;
For since he had been covered overmuch,
To keep him from the light-glare, both his cheeks
Were hot, and scarlet as the first live rose
The Shepherd's heart-blood ebb'd away into
The faster for his love. And love was here.
An instant, and the pretty baby mouth
Shut close, as if for dreaming that it suck'd;
The little naked feet, drawn up the way
Of nestling birdlings: everything so soft
And tender—to the little hold-fast hands,
Which, closing on a finger into sleep,
Had kept the mould of 't.

This exquisite sketch is true feminine poetry, only possible to a woman. Surely female musicians might attain a corresponding distinctiveness by approaching their art as women and not as men. "The distinctions," says M. Scudo, in his essay on Teresa Milanollo, "which nature has established between the two sexes should display themselves in works of art, which are but the manifestation of the harmonies of creation. A woman who, when taking a pencil, pen, or music-sheet, forgets what are the character and the obligations of her sex is a monster who excites disgust and repulsion. For one or two who succeed in gaining a masculine celebrity which robs them of the mystery of grace and enchantment that forms their appanage, there are thousands who remain mutilated and become objects of general scoffing. They are neither men nor women, but something which has no name and no part in life. . . . No one debars the woman from enlightening her spirit and purifying her heart by solid instruction and by the culture of arts which open up infinite horizons, provided she remains within the limits God has imposed upon her. . . . A singer, an actress, a painter, a pianiste ought to carry into the art they profess the distinctive qualities of their sex. Forgetfulness of this fundamental rule not only wounds decency, which is their prestige, but troubles the economy of God's work. In the human duality, the woman expresses the eternal sentiments of the soul, and her heart is a fountain full of tenderness and poetry. If she abandon the sweet empire of grace to look to other destinies . . . she disturbs the equilibrium of life, and her fall is inevitable." Underlying these vehement and, no doubt, exaggerated utterances is much pertinent truth, which may be summed up in the axiom—The woman artist should always regard her art from a woman's point of view. Were this done distinctiveness would follow. The result may not compare with the works of men for strength and comprehensiveness, but that is neither necessary nor desired. What we regard as both necessary and desirable is the emancipation of woman within her own musical domain. It goes beyond reason to imagine that she has nothing to say there, and no power of speech. A witty French writer once remarked that whenever he climbed a difficult hill, he always found a woman on the summit before him, but she could never tell how she got up. The only thing certain was that had she started with him in his fashion, he would have left her far behind. It will be of good augury for the sex and for music when some pioneer woman arises, who, having mastered the power of musical expression, consults her own nature and not the productions of men, when determining what to say and how to speak.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XII.—ROSSINI (continued from page 479).

WITH the production of "Sigismonde," Rossini's wandering life among the minor theatres of Italy came to an end. Here, then, is a fitting opportunity for reciting the conditions, wholly strange to us, under which he had hitherto laboured. It is the more requisite to know them, because we may reasonably assume that they, rather than his own preferences, determined the character of his early works. If there be any disposition to charge our master with a careless levity of life that accepts the circumstances nearest to hand and has no aims beyond the day, let it be remembered that the duty of supporting his parents was recognised by him as a sacred obligation. For them he wrought at what his hands found to do on the instant, and because of them he preferred the real, however poor and mean, to the visionary, however magnificent.

Stendhal, who spoke of what he well knew, has drawn the curtain from before the inner life of an Italian minor theatre in the days when Rossini was young, and his authority we follow in supposing that among the patrician inhabitants of a little town—say Reggio—is one who determines upon a season of opera with himself as impresario. He has, of course, an object in view, but hardly that of making money. There may be precedent for the expectation of gain: he remembers none for the attainment of it. Perhaps the impresario really loves art; but more often the pleasure he promises himself is of a different kind, and the town divines it accurately by speculating whether or no he will publicly give his arm to the prima donna. Concerning business details he does not much trouble himself. A deputy acts in his place, and presently, through the medium of an agent at Bologna or Milan, a troupe is got together—that is to say, a prima donna, tenor, basso cantante, basso buffo, second woman, and second buffo. These engaged, some unfortunate abbé belonging to the class of hangers-on at great houses writes a libretto for sixty or eighty francs. Then the composer—say Rossini—appears on the scene, to be made much of for fifteen or twenty days, during which time he looks at the poem and rates the poet. Rossini delighted in rating the poet, and mostly had good cause. "You have given me verses, but not situations!" he would exclaim; whereupon, after many excuses, the humbled rhymester would go away and indite a sonnet "to the glory of the greatest master of Italy and the world." Dining and dissipation over, Rossini summons the artists to the piano and studies their voices, since, in this case, the material is made for the tools, and not the tools for the material. Knowing what he has to deal with, and the first performance being due in three weeks or so, the master begins to compose, but not in the solitude of his study. Friends gather round and chat as he writes; they attend him to dinner and supper: and only in the dead of night can he be alone to jot down inspirations for development next day amid the noise of renewed conversation. Presently, rehearsals at the piano begin, and the idiosyncracies of the artists have to be considered as best they may. Some are inconceivably droll. It is said of Crivelli, for example, that he would never sing his opening air unless the words "felice ognora" were introduced, as upon them he executed his most successful roulades; while Marchesi, the famous soprano, would always make his entry on horseback or on the top of a scenic hill. All such matters having been arranged by the composer, after due discussion by the entire town, the important night arrives. The theatre is of course crowded, for visitors have arrived from all the country round about, and some, the inns being full, will sleep in their calèches, ranked along the middle of the street. Nothing is thought of but the new opera. The population gathers itself round the theatre with vehement interest. Doubly vehement are the demonstrations within, whether of pleasure or disgust. The audience shout and gesticulate after each number like madmen, till at last, perhaps, unanimous feeling finds expression in shouts of "Bravo, maestro." Then Rossini rises from his place at the piano, makes three formal bows, reseats himself and goes on to the next piece. Having conducted for three nights—if the opera runs so long—the master receives his 800 francs, eats a farewell dinner, packs his portmanteau, and starts for the next town, to begin the comedy again.

After the manner here detailed did Rossini spend the early part of his career, but the more ignoble drudgery ended for him when he received a visit at Bologna from Barbaja, director of the Neapolitan theatres San Carlo and Del Fondo. Barbaja was a shrewd man in his generation, and some say that he was unscrupulous, but the assertion may arise from envy at the fortune which made a millionaire of one who began life as an hotel waiter. Rossini's fame had, of course, reached Naples, and Barbaja had faith in it, despite the risk of introducing a stranger to the city which affected in musical matters the utmost self-sufficiency. On this point the Neapolitans were sensitive beyond common. Was not Paisiello still living amongst them? Did not Zingarelli preside over their Conservatorium? Had they not young men of talent rising up in their midst? What need, then, to take any notice of the favourite of the North? Barbaja was too great a man for such querulous conceit to turn aside. He went to Bologna, as we have seen, and engaged Rossini without a word being said as to terms. The master felt that he had to do with a Plutus, in whose eyes a few ducats more or less were as nothing, while Barbaja knew that an offer from him would be accepted in blind faith. Terms were settled later, and by these the composer bound himself to direct the music of both theatres and to write two operas per year, receiving in return 200 ducats (about £36) per month and a share, amounting to some £176 per year, in the profits of Barbaja's gaming-table.

On his arrival in Naples the master soon found that the envy of rivals had to be overcome, as well as the prejudices of a self-sufficient public. The attitude of Zingarelli was one of uncompromising hostility, an order being issued placing Rossini's scores in the Index expurgatoris of the Conservatorium. Paisiello took less decided ground, but used all his private influence against the stranger, who, on the other hand, set himself the task of overcoming his opponents, not by intrigue, but by fairly conquering their admiration. In this spirit he wrote his "Elisabetta Regina d'Inghilterra," after a careful study of the means placed by Barbaja at his disposal. His plans were well laid in view of the end sought. The libretto, adapted from a French melodrama, abounded in dramatic situations; but the master treated them less with a view to propriety of expression than to dazzling effect. He knew his public and his interpreters, and took care to please both, even at the expense of the subject, where that course seemed needful. In the matter of artists he was excellently well served. A better representative of the English queen could not have been found than Mdle. Colbrand, whose imposing person and grand style just suited the part. For the rest, Manuel Garcia impersonated Norfolk, Nozzani appeared as Leicester, and Mdle. Dardanelli enacted Mathilde, Leicester's innamorata, and the precursor of Scott's Amy Robsart. Rossini's precaution, and the good luck which gave him such artists, secured a magnificent success. Neapolitan prejudice was overcome at a stroke. Even the overture—that to "Aureliano" more heavily scored; the same, by the way, which afterwards served for "Il Barbiere"—turned aside their distrust of the Northerner, and as the work went on they became, to use Stendhal's forcible words, "drunk with happiness." Rossini was now master of the position, with his foot on the necks of his enemies. Paisiello held his peace; and Zingarelli was commanded by the king to remove the interdict placed upon the interloper's scores.

Before dismissing the subject of Rossini's triumphant début upon the greatest Italian stage, reference should be made to the further steps of reform which "Elisabetta" signalled. We have already witnessed daring innovations on the part of the young master, who sought to invest the serious dramatic stage with more life and charm. His Neapolitan opera carried on this work by finally discarding the violoncello or pianoforte accompaniment to recitative, and substituting for those instruments the string quartet. He retained the old form for opera buffa, but his fine taste led him instinctively to perceive that something more dignified and musically expressive was required for opera seria. It is worthy of note also that "Elisabetta" was the first opera in which he wrote his own vocal ornaments at full length. The master, we may easily suppose, had suffered much from the incapacity of singers to make their own roulades effective, and he here resolved to rid them once and for all of a liberty often abused. At the same time he did not draw a hard and fast line. Competent artists were permitted to wander from the text if it suited them to do so, and on one occasion Rossini called on Mdlle. Sontag expressly to praise her original embellishment of an air in "Matilda di Shabron."

Having secured his position at Naples, the master accepted an engagement at the Teatro Valle, Rome, for the Carnival of 1816; the season beginning on December 26, 1815, when was produced "Torvaldo e Dorliska," a semi-serious opera, libretto by Feretti. This work did not add to Rossini's fame, owing in some measure to the silliness of the book; nevertheless, one fragment lives, and will ever live, as the letter duet in "Otello." Our composer never scrupled thus to use a second time the best numbers of his dead operas, and he has told us frankly that he thought he had a right to do so. When his complete works were issued, the master observed to a friend, "I am furious about that publication, which puts under the public eye all my operas together. The same pieces will be found there several times, for I thought myself entitled to take from my condemned works the numbers which appeared to me the best, and to save them from shipwreck by placing them in new ones. An opera hissed I considered quite dead, and now there is a general resurrection." Some remarkable personages took part in the performance of "Torvaldo e Dorliska," among them being Donzelli, the famous tenor; Galli and Remorino, the bassi, who were then at the height of their renown; and Madame Sala. No less a person than M. Panzeron, the well-known author of Solfeggi, tolled the bell behind the scenes, "and," says M. Azevedo, with quiet humour, "acquitted himself of that delicate function with the most perfect precision." All this excellence on one side of lamps was not balanced by corresponding merit on the other. The orchestra of the Valle was so poorly paid that its members were compelled to eke out a living by working at various handicrafts. Thus the contrabassist was a saddler, and of him a good story is told. During one of the last rehearsals of "Torvaldo," Pietro's ponderous instrument was heard emitting some not very pertinent sounds during a vocal cadence which should have been unaccompanied. On remonstrance being made, the saddler answered with dignity, "I execute my part as it is written"; and so he did, the only possible objection being that he was playing, without knowing it, from a copy of the overture. Another anecdote on the same subject is worth recounting. A barber had waited on Rossini for some days after his arrival in Rome, and discharged his office with all respect. But when taking leave on the morning of the day appointed for a first orchestral rehearsal, the man held out his hand, saying, "Till our next meeting." "What!" exclaimed the astonished composer, and was coolly answered, "Yes; we shall see each other soon at the theatre. I am first clarinet." It is said that however furiously Rossini stormed and raved at his Roman instrumentalists, he treated the first clarinet delicately, and told him of his faults in private, with angelic sweetness. He did not care to offend the man who had a razor at his throat every morning.

His work at the Teatro Valle accomplished, Rossini entered upon the memorable engagement to which the world owes his undying comic masterpiece, "Il Barbiere di Siviglia." The Nobile Teatro di Torre Argentino was this time the scene of his operations, and it may be worth while to give a translation of the contract made with the director of that establishment, the more because it shows the footing upon which composers stood in those days. The document, we ought in fairness to state, was first published in "Rossini, sa vie et ses œuvres," by the Brothers Escudier.

"By the present act, privately made, but not less binding on that account, and according to the conditions agreed between the contracting parties, it has been stipulated as follows:—

"The Signor Puca Sforza Cesarini, entrepreneur of the above-named theatre, engages the Signor Maestro Gioacchino Rossini for the Carnival season of the year 1816. The said Rossini promises and binds himself to compose and to put upon the stage the second drama buffo which will be represented in the above-mentioned season at the theatre named, using the libretto which will be given him by the said entrepreneur, whether it be old or new. The Maestro Rossini engages to deliver his score in the middle of the month of January, and to adapt it to the voices of the singers. He undertakes further to make any changes that may be necessary, either for the good execution of the music or for the convenience and exigencies of the singers.

"The Maestro Rossini equally promises and binds himself to be in Rome for the discharge of this engagement not later than the end of December in the current year, and to deliver to the copyist the first act of his opera, perfectly complete, on January 20, 1816, so that the partial and general rehearsals may be promptly made, and the piece brought out on the day which the director shall determine; the first representation being, at this moment, fixed to take place on or about February 5. Also, the Maestro Rossini shall deliver to the copyist, when desired, his second act, so that there shall be time to prepare and go before the public on the evening named above. In default the Maestro Rossini will expose himself to all damages.

"The Maestro Rossini further undertakes to conduct his opera, according to custom, and personally to assist at rehearsals of voices and orchestra as often as the director may desire, either in the theatre or elsewhere. He also agrees to assist at the first three representations which will be consecutively given, and to direct the performance at the piano. In recompense for his fatigues, the director undertakes to pay to the Maestro Rossini the sum of four hundred Roman scudi, as soon as the first three performances which he will direct at the piano are ended.

"It is further agreed that, in the case of interdiction or the closing of the theatre, be it through an act of authority, or for any other cause, the habitual practice in the theatres of Rome and of all countries under such circumstances will be observed. Moreover, the above-named director grants lodging to the Maestro Rossini during the term of his contract in the house assigned to Signor Luigi Zamboni."

We commend the perusal of this astonishing document to all who would make themselves acquainted with the conditions under which Italian composers laboured. How could there be satisfactory progress when the creative musician was the slave even of his interpreters' caprices, and looked upon as a mere machine constructed to do certain work when and how the controlling hand should please? Nevertheless, it was under the conditions above set forth that Rossini gave his chef-d'œuvre to the world.

The subject of "Il Barbiere" was determined upon under peculiar circumstances. For some time the director of the Argentino had endeavoured to satisfy the Roman censor with a libretto, but all in vain. The officials detected "allusions" and condemned piece after piece. At length, as a kind of grim joke, Cesarini proposed the book of an opera which Paisiello had already set to music. This was accepted—perhaps to the astonishment of the director, and certainly to the extreme embarrassment of Rossini, who felt by no means disposed to commit an impertinence where the venerable Neapolitan master was concerned. But the terms of the engagement bound him, and in this strait—if Stendhal may be credited—he wrote to Paisiello, explaining the whole matter, receiving, in reply, a polite letter which approved the discretion of the papal police and seemed to favour the entire arrangement.

But if Rossini did not actually address Paisiello on the subject he took care to set himself right with the world by inditing an eulogatory address, studiously modest in tone, and calculated, one would suppose, to disarm hostility. Here is a translation of it:—

"The comedy of Beaumarchais, entitled 'Le Barbier de Seville,' is presented at Rome in the form of a comic drama, under the name of 'Almaviva, o' sia l' inutile Precauzione,' in order fully to convince the public of the sentiments of respect and veneration which animate the author of the music to the present drama in regard of the celebrated Paisiello, who has already treated this subject under its original title.

"Called himself to undertake this difficult task, the Maestro Gioacchino Rossini, in order to avoid the reproach of daring rivalry with the immortal author who has preceded him, has expressly required that the 'Barbier de Seville' should be entirely reversed, and that new situations should be added for the musical pieces, adapted to modern theatrical tastes, entirely changed since the time when the renowned Paisiello wrote his music.

"Certain other differences between the contexture of the present drama and that of the French comedy already named were caused by the necessity of introducing choruses, either to conform to modern usages or because they were indispensable to musical effect in so large a theatre. The courteous public are forewarned of this in order that they might excuse the author of the present drama, who, but for such impious circumstances, would never have dared to introduce the least change into the French work consecrated by applause in all the theatres of Europe."

How completely this very proper address relieves Rossini from suspicion of arrogance in setting to music a theme already treated by a distinguished and venerable contemporary, no reader can avoid seeing. Something like the hand of fate appears in the whole matter. Firstly, the censor refused subject after subject till time ran short. Secondly, he accepted "Le Barbier" after it had been proposed more in jest than earnest. Thirdly, Rossini, by the terms of his engagement, was bound to work upon any book offered him, whether old or new. Out of such curious conditions sprang the immortal masterpiece of its author and its age.

Cesarini lost no time in setting our master to work. Indeed, there was no time to lose, and nobody felt this more keenly than Rossini himself. It is said that when Sterbini, the author of "Torwaldo," was introduced to him as his literary colleague in this instance also, he asked, "Are you the man to come to my house and work without break or repose till the opera is completely finished?" The answer was "Yes," and forthwith the pair took their coats off to the task. Thirteen days later the task was over and done. The thing seems incredible, but no historical fact rests on better foundation; and for wonderfulness it ranks with, if it do not stand before, the composition of the "Messiah" and of the overtures to "Don Giovanni" and "Ruy Blas." Making every allowance for the spontaneity of Rossini's genius, we cannot look upon that thirteen days' toil without amazement, the greater because here was no pièce d'occasion written to serve a purpose and be forgotten, but a work which will endure as long as a taste for good music exists. Rossini was no doubt fortunate in his librettist, who had more than an average of Italian fluency in verse-making, and was, withal, of a most accommodating disposition, doing whatever the composer wished, and when Rossini ran ahead of him, as was sometimes the case, even adapting words to the music already written. Hereupon Mr. Sutherland Edwards pertinently observes in a recent biographical sketch: "The admirable unity of the 'Barber,' in which a person without information on the subject could scarcely say whether the words were written for the music or the music for the words, may doubtless in a great measure be accounted for by the fact that poet and musician were always together during the composition of the opera, ready mutually to suggest and to profit by suggestions." In this connection the fact should not be overlooked that Rossini resisted all temptation to avoid the labour imposed by his own tastes. He might—without offending the Roman public, who were used to it—have treated the dialogue in ordinary recitative, but though oppressed with the magnitude of his task, he preferred to accompany it with the delicious orchestral passages that play around the words so gracefully and with such continuous charm. We should remember this when the master is accused of artistic frivolity and of making music a mere minister to his vanity or his pleasures. During the whole of the thirteen days Rossini never left the house, having taken a characteristic precaution against inducements to do so by letting his beard grow. "If I had been shaved," he once said, "I should have gone out; and if I had gone out, I should have returned too late." Thus did he buckle sternly to his wonderful task. Meanwhile his enemies were no less strenuously preparing a warm reception for the new opera.

"ELIJAH"

A COMPARISON OF THE ORIGINAL AND REVISED SCORES*

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

NOTHING is more interesting than to trace the steps by which a great work of art has been perfected. The process not only gratifies a natural and laudable curiosity, but is in the highest degree instructive. It admits us, so to speak, into the laboratory of genius, where, if we may not learn how to go and do likewise, because wanting that which is incommunicable, we may at least know how to appreciate the patient toil with which a noble artistic thing is finished. Mendelssohn was emphatically a patient toiler, who touched and retouched as long as anything seemed wanting to his stern self-criticism. Of this his oratorio "Elijah" affords a prominent example. Amid the plaudits which followed the performance of that masterpiece at Birmingham in 1846—such plaudits as might well have satisfied the composer that his MS. was ready for the printer—Mendelssohn never lost sight of possible improvements. In scores of places his keen eye and critical judgment discovered reasons for dissatisfaction, and history tells how promptly he set to work, taking away here, adding there, and, in some instances, rewriting whole numbers. It is our present object to show precisely what was done by the master to his work between the Birmingham performance in 1846 and that at Exeter Hall in 1847, the year of his lamented death. This we shall do by comparing the original with the revised version, using a MS. copy written in Germany and brought over by Mendelssohn to England. This interesting volume, now in the possession of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., seems to have been bound after the performance took place, and also, unfortunately, after a few of the sheets had been lost. Among the missing portions is that containing the duet form of the present trio, "Lift thine eyes," a copy of which, however, made from the separate parts by Mr. Bartholomew, very well stops the gap. The MS. contains directions for the organist "writ large" by Mendelssohn himself (which leads us to assume that it was used by the organist at Birmingham); and various notes, signed "F. M. B.," give added value to its pages.

We shall take for granted throughout that the reader is familiar with the printed version of "Elijah," or has it at hand for reference and comparison.

INTRODUCTION.—Recitative, "As God the Lord." A difference appears in the first bar; the bass trombone, instead of sustaining the tonic, descending to the subdominant, so that the passage introducing the voice stands thus:—

At bar 4. the accompaniment shows another variation—and at bar 9 no horns sustain the tonic, while the cadence corresponds exactly with the opening phrase, the bass descending to the subdominant of A.

OVERTURE.—There is no overture in the MS., nor did Mendelssohn intend, at the outset, to write one. This appears from the fact that the chorus, "Help, Lord," is marked No. 2, and still more clearly from an examination of the original band-parts now in the possession of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. These band-parts were copied in Germany, and there proved, as Mendelssohn remarks in one of his letters, that trouble might be saved the English professors at rehearsal. It was after this that the composer resolved upon adding an overture, a new first leaf being stitched into the parts, while the recitative, "As God the Lord," immediately preceding "Help, Lord," is pasted over. The similarity in the opening of "Elijah" and Handel's "Israel"—both beginning with a recitative—has often been pointed out, even as the first-named work now stands. How much greater is the resemblance in the original version, where the recitative leads directly to a chorus of complaint and supplication.

No. 1.—Chorus, "Help, Lord." Instead of the exciting passage which now connects the overture with the chorus, the voices are introduced by violins alone, in unison, as thus:—

Other variations of a still more important character are noticeable. Between bar 26 (reckoning from the entrance of the voices) and the passage, "Will then the Lord," the MS. has three bars less than the printed score, while the whole of the music within the limits named is different. In its original form this part of the chorus was as subjoined:—

At bar 40 we have the following:—

In bar 42 there is no phrase for the bass voices, as now; while between bar 48, which in the printed score is immediately followed by the magnificent burst on B flat, and bar 52, the MS. contains a long passage afterwards excised or changed:—

har-vest now is,

Help, Lord,

Help, Lord,

In the choral recitative with which this number ends the alto phrase, "The suckling's tongue," &c., stands thus—clea - veth for thirst to his mouth, while that for soprano, "And there is no one," &c., breaks, at the cadence, into three-part harmony:—

Soprani.

giv - eth it un - to them.

No. 2—Duet and Chorus, "Lord, bow Thine ear." No variation.

No. 3—Recitave, "Ye people, rend your hearts." Mendelssohn rewrote this number from beginning to end, making it far less important and considerably shorter. It runs thus in the MS.:—

Ye peo - ple rend your Andante.

Recit.

Lento.

Segue Aria.

No. 4—Air, "If with all your hearts." Only one unimportant variation appears in this air, at bars 25 and 26, where the original melody is:—

O that I knew

No. 5—Chorus, "Yet doth the Lord." From the beginning of this number to the end of the chorale, flutes, clarinets, horns, and ophicleide are absent. Those instruments are added, however, at the change into C major on the words "His mercies on thousands fall." In the printed score the chorale, "For He is the Lord our God," is accompanied by oboes and bassoons as well as strings—a feature wanting to the MS. Another difference appears at the cadence of the chorale, which, instead of passing to the tonic from the subdominant, does so from the dominant seventh, as thus:— hate . . him.

No. 6—Recit., "Elijah, get thee hence." This recitative, like its predecessor, was wholly rewritten subsequent to the Birmingham performance. In the MS. it is accompanied by trumpets and four horns, Mendelssohn's original idea, afterwards improved upon, being to invest the angel messenger with the ordinary attributes of state and dignity. The number, in its first form, is subjoined:—

E - li - jah, get thee hence,

Strings only.

Wind added.

Strings only. Segue Double Quartet.

No. 7—Double Quartet "For He shall give His angels." At bar 51 the MS. presents a slight variation from the printed score—and again at bar 56 et seq.—

all the ways thou goest, they shall pro - tect . . thee.

At bar 70 the printed score has a cadence (bars 71, 72, ending in 73) not found in the MS. The beautiful passage for violoncello immediately following is also absent, and the remaining bars of the voice parts differ so much that their quotation becomes necessary. They stand thus in the MS. :—

shall pro - tect thee, they shall pro - tect thee, p

The brief ritornello is a bar longer in the MS. than in the printed score—the final chord being to that extent continued.

No. — "Now Cherith's brook." This recitative shared the fate of its two immediate predecessors, and was entirely rewritten, important changes being made also in the words. The original form is subjoined—accompaniments for strings only :—

p E - li - jah, now Cherith's brook is dri - ed up, a - rise and de - part, and get thee to

Za - rephath; thi - ther a - bid. Be - hold, p I have com-

- mand - ed a wi - dow woman there to sus - tain thee; and thou shalt want no - thing, nor she and her house, through the Word of God.

We cannot but think that it would be a great boon to the purchasers of instrumental music if the title-pages definitely expressed the nature of the pieces. Some short time ago we were desirous of procuring an arrangement of a well-known operatic chorus; and although outside the works shown to us it was said to be merely "arranged," the inside disclosed sometimes elaborate contrapuntal variations, sometimes arpeggios with the air swimming at the top, and very often extraneous matter, with brilliant passages to gratify the ambition of the executant. These are, however, by no means unusual instances; for, hearing that Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor had been "encored" at a recent concert, we were anxious to see the copy the pianist played from, and found it to be a piece made up of scraps from the work, with "Mendelssohn's Concerto in G Minor" printed on the title-page. We may mention also that there are many Fantasias in which various themes by a certain composer are introduced, although the piece is professedly based only upon one of his operas, as an instance of which may be cited "Favarger's "Oberon," as it is called, which contains a portion of "Der Freischütz," and the March from the "Concertstück." Perhaps, however, the most glaring of these deceptive compositions are those named "Transcriptions," for, in the majority of cases, instead of being "Transcriptions," they are distortions of the originals. Latterly, too, we find that this term has been used in a sense for which no justification can be pleaded. Assuredly a "Transcription" of a pianoforte piece for the pianoforte should strike us as being exceedingly like an arrangement of a song for the voice; but that this extraordinary manufacture is not only published, but played, is proved by a "Transcription" of Weber's "Invitation à la valse" appearing in the programme of a pianoforte Recital during the last season. It may be exceedingly gratifying to the vanity of a composer to show us what he thinks another composer ought to have written; but we confess to a preference for Weber, with all his weakness.

THOSE who only know the banjo in connection with "nigger minstrels" will be surprised to learn that a periodical called the Banjo and Guitar Journal is published in Philadelphia every month, and in the number forwarded to us the editor says, "There is no doubt that our winter circulation will reach ten thousand copies." To prove, too, that the proprietor of this journal is thoroughly in earnest, we are told that "there is no part of the world where the English language is spoken" that the paper will not penetrate. When we read such paragraphs as "Charles Schofield sells lots of banjos for Stewart. He has a company on the road playing 'Flashes';" and "Harry Shirley is with Billy Emerson's party," we may begin to doubt whether the instrument really holds the rank claimed for it; but as it is also stated that "Mr. D. C. Everest is forming a large class of ten ladies and ten gentlemen for a banjo orchestra, to begin operations next fall;" and that "in London and other parts of England the banjo is coming into general favour," we cannot but feel that we have a right to suspend our judgment and wait for results. The owner of the journal in question is also a publisher of music for the banjo; and in issuing publications of a higher grade for the instrument he boldly announces that he "will not waver until the highest pinnacle of the art is reached." Of course he is pestered with questions by those who are anxious to reach "the highest pinnacle" at once; but he is equal to the occasion, and answers his correspondents thus: "Give us time! Rome was not built in a day. Solomon was a wise man, and Job was a patient one, but they were not in the banjo business." All this shows a vigour and firmness of character most essential in one who caters for the public, and we wish him every success. The "world-famed March for the Banjo, called 'The Roarer,'" which he advertises, we have not yet heard of; but London is slow in receiving new compositions.

THAT "cheerful musical society" which we so often see in advertisements offering board and lodging, has always been with us an exceedingly difficult item to realise in the catalogue of attractions. Music in the evening—and indeed in the morning too—is a very important element in our daily life; but even the most ardent lover of the art would scarcely, we think, like to be made a listener at a concert whenever and wherever the executants please. In proof, however, that so sympathetic and sincere a friend as music can be converted into a tyrannical and overbearing enemy, we may cite not only the "happy homes" already mentioned, where in spite of your desire to read or converse, you are compelled to bear with the performance of some mediocre amateurs; but the hotels, in the coffee-room of which some evil-disposed person has persuaded the landlord to place a pianoforte, and where consequently many visitors think that they are contributing to the pleasure of those present by playing all the scraps from their répertoire of pieces that they can possibly recollect. An example of this has recently occurred in our own travels; and although it is true that the performer turned occasionally to those in the coffee-room, who were either poring over the evening papers, or anxious for a little quiet after their day's exertion, and trusted that "the music was not an annoyance," a courteous "by no means" in reply might be tolerably well assured. Of course it may be said that this is representative of the "cheerful musical society" already alluded to; but then it appears to us that in many cases the "cheerfulness" is all on one side. Suppose, for instance, some persons who imagined themselves gifted with powers of recitation were to exercise these powers in a room full of strangers unasked by those around them. It would most assuredly prevent everybody from doing anything else but listen—yet either in a private house or the coffee-room of an hotel, where similar musical inflictions are tolerated, it would only be passing the evening in "cheerful oratorical society."

IN perusing country newspapers we constantly meet with scraps of musical information so thoroughly untrue that we cannot but wonder how they can possibly have originated. As a companion to our collection of strange criticisms, of which we have already spoken, it is possible that we may make a selection of the most striking of these pieces of manufactured news and issue them some day in one volume, under the comprehensive title of "Curious Cuttings." But, much as we have been surprised at these paragraphs in English papers, it is unquestionably in the American journals that we have seen the most startling announcements respecting art and artists in England. Many of these we have, from time to time, given specimens of, with an expression of astonishment at the source from which they could have sprung. Absurd, however, as these assertions are, no difficulty can be found in understanding them; but we have now to present to our readers a clipping from a paper published in the United States, which assuredly must puzzle everybody to comprehend: "Mr. Mann, the manager of the Crystal Palace Concerts, has at last received his long-talked-of benefit; Macfarren's Festival Overtures opened the program of Beethoven's Choral (9th) Symphony. The lady soloists were Mme. Perchka-Leutner, of Boston; Jubilee Days, Mrs. Hutchinson, and Miss Hope Glenn. Addresses were made by Prof. Macfarren, and Mr. George Grove, author of the popular Dictionary. A floral testimonial was presented to Mr. Mann by the ladies, on behalf of the choir." American readers may certainly gather from this extraordinary haze of words that a presentation of some kind has been made to the director of the Crystal Palace Concerts; but how the "program of Beethoven's Choral Symphony" could have been opened by "Macfarren's Festival Overtures" must, we fear, remain a mystery only to be unravelled either by the author or the printer of the paragraph.

IF, as we often hear it stated, compositions of high merit make their way but slowly through the world of music, assuredly M. Gounod's new Oratorio, "The Redemption," is an exception to the rule. Its great success at Birmingham only dates a few weeks back, and yet we already find the work announced for performance in London, at the Albert Hall, on the 1st November (conducted by the composer); at the Bristol Festival (also probably conducted by the composer); at the Crystal Palace, November 18; and at the following places: Brighton, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Wolverhampton, Manchester, Liverpool, Reading, and Toronto (Canada). Negotiations are likewise pending with Paris, Vienna, Brussels, Hamburg, Antwerp, Geneva, Rotterdam, and other Continental cities; also with New York and various places in the United States. As the personal influence of the composer was so sensibly felt by all the executants on the production of the work, it is gratifying to find that M. Gounod will conduct it when first heard by a London audience, and we trust that he may also be induced to direct its performance at some of the most important cities on the Continent.

MUCH as we have always felt gratified at the success of Mr. Carl Rosa's Operas in English, we could not help regretting that English Opera has hitherto had but a comparatively small place in the scheme. During the coming season, however, it is announced that a new opera composed by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie entitled "Colomba," and founded upon Prosper Mérimée's tale of that name, by Mr. F. Hueffer, is to be produced. This is indeed welcome news, for the antecedents of this young composer lead us to expect a work which will honourably represent English art. Besides the now well-known Cantata "The Bride," written for, and performed at, the Worcester Festival last year, Mr. Mackenzie is the composer of a pianoforte quartet, which was performed with much success at the Monday Popular Concerts, the "Burns" Symphony, played at the Crystal Palace, and also at many places in Germany, and spoken highly of by Liszt; and the new Cantata "Jason," which will be produced at the Bristol Festival during the present month.

THE BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

It has been often said that difficult as it is to gain a reputation, the difficulty of maintaining one when gained is infinitely greater. Never has this truth been more keenly felt than by those who have from time to time had the direction of the Musical Festivals at Birmingham; for the fame of the meetings having been firmly established, not only at home but abroad, the Festival Committee has gradually assumed the importance of a representative national body, the composers selected to supply new works for performance being presumably only those who had most fairly earned an honour so universally recognised. It is unnecessary here to say more than that a recent change in the management has been the cause of more vigorous counsels in the preliminary deliberations upon the arrangements for the present meeting; and we need only point to the results in proof that the time has arrived when success can only be secured if thoroughly well deserved. The circumstances which led to the production of M. Gounod's Oratorio, the "Redemption," at this Festival, and the exceptionally large sum paid to secure it, have already been mentioned in THE MUSICAL TIMES; but not until its publication has the precise design of the composer been declared. The following Commentary by the author, printed at the commencement of the Oratorio, will, we are certain, therefore be read with interest: "This work is a lyrical setting forth of the three great facts on which depends the existence of the Christian Church. These facts are: 1. The Passion and the Death of the Saviour. 2. His glorious life on earth, from His Resurrection to His Ascension. 3. The spread of Christianity in the world through the mission of the Apostles. These three parts of the present Trilogy are preceded by a Prologue on the Creation, the Fall of our first parents, and the promise of a Redeemer." In accordance with the spirit of this announcement, the composer, as will be seen, calls his work a "Sacred Trilogy," but there can be little doubt that, from its importance and dimensions, it will be more often termed an "Oratorio." In justice to M. Gounod, too, it would be well to remove an impression which we have found to exist, that, because the composer has most emphatically declared the "Redemption" to be "the work of his life," he employed the whole of his artistic life in writing it. The best reply to this will be again to quote the words of the author in a note appended to the printed copy of the Oratorio: "It was during the autumn of the year 1867 that I first thought of composing a musical work on the Redemption. I wrote the words at Rome, where I passed two months of the winter 1867-8 with my friend Hébert, the celebrated painter, at that time Director of the Academy of France. Of the music, I then composed only two fragments: 1. The March to Calvary, in its entirety; 2. The opening of the first division of the third part—the Pentecost. Twelve years after, I finished this work, which had so long been interrupted, with a view to its being performed at the Festival at Birmingham in 1882." The truth is that the Oratorio sprang originally from the desire of a deeply religious man to colour with a musician's art the solemn events upon which Christianity is based; and that although, no doubt—as a painter frequently observes in nature materials which he afterwards moulds into a definite form—M. Gounod had often previously reflected upon these sacred scenes with the mind of a musician, it is only within the last twelve years that they have assumed the tangible shape submitted at this Festival to a critical Birmingham audience. As might be anticipated from the antecedents of the composer, the work, which was conducted by M. Gounod himself, has attracted enormously—the demand for tickets at each representation, indeed, being so much in excess of the supply as fully to justify even a third performance—and although its permanent place in the estimation of the public is now assured, it will not be forgotten by art-lovers that, as with Mendelssohn's "Elijah," it is to this important Midland Festival that they owe the first revelation of its beauties.

Gade's Cantata, "Psyche," has also proved the wisdom of the committee in obtaining a work by one who in his "Crusaders" and "Zion" has evidenced both his dramatic power and command over orchestral resources. His presence as Director of his new composition was—as in the case of M. Gounod—an important element in its success; and it should here be mentioned as a distinguishing feature in the negotiations for original works at these Festivals, that the composers of them are usually secured to conduct their first performance. Sir Julius Benedict's "Graziella"—originally intended for the last Norwich Festival—was likewise an interesting novelty. The name of this composer is too famous to allow of a new work of his to wait for a hearing, and the Festival Committee felt assured that any fresh appeal from his pen would be cordially welcomed. Mr. Gaul had yet to be tried in a work of great importance, but his former compositions inspired confidence in his powers; and as the fostering of talent, as well as the recognition of it when fully acknowledged, has always been one of the guiding principles in the counsels of the Festival Committee, the choice was indeed well justified. The "Orchestral Serenade" of Mr. Villiers Stanford, and the new Symphony of Mr. Hubert Parry—both composers already well known to the public—complete the list of important new works contributed to a programme assuredly hitherto unrivalled in novelty and interest at any Musical Festival in the world.

We are glad to find that neither the production of so many novelties nor the alleged "advanced" taste of the day prevented "Elijah" from occupying its accustomed place in the programme. At this great Festival, indeed, Mendelssohn's Oratorio is invariably looked forward to with the keenest interest as the inaugural work; for although familiar, not only to the executants but to the audiences of the town where this immortal composition was first heard, it is only with such an unrivalled body of artists, vocal and instrumental, as we find assembled at these meetings that a truly worthy tribute can be offered to the memory of the composer on the very spot which thirty-six years ago he so ennobled by his music. The permanent triennial celebration of this event should be looked upon as a sacred trust by all who have authority in the arrangements for the Festival; for "Elijah," it must be remembered, was written for Birmingham, and Birmingham should ever take a pride in showing its appreciation of the honour.

The Festival commenced on Tuesday, August 29, the entrance of Sir Michael Costa into the orchestra being the signal for a burst of applause, expressive alike of the public estimation of his talent, and of gratification at his perfect restoration to health. After the singing of the National Anthem—which was given first by the sopranos in unison, afterwards by the altos, and then by the full choir and orchestra—the well-known Recitative of Mr. Santley announced the opening of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The overture was extremely well played, and the pathetic chorus in which the people appeal for mercy under their sufferings at once proved the exceptionally fine powers of the choir, the Choral Recitatives which follow being also given, not only with perfect intonation, but with a tenderness of expression which evidenced the result of excellent training. The duet with chorus, "Zion spreadeth her hands,"—too often but imperfectly rendered—found able exponents in Miss Anna Williams and Madame Trebelli. We have seldom heard Mr. Lloyd sing the solo "If with all your hearts," with more feeling; yet although the long pause upon the A flat undoubtedly shows his perfect command of the upper notes of his register, it accords not with the placid character of the words. In other respects his reading of the song was faultless. The double quartet—the principal vocalists being assisted by Miss Eleanor Farnol, Messrs. Woodhall, Horrex and Campion—was most carefully sung throughout; and in the great duet between the Widow and the Prophet Miss Anna Williams threw such dramatic feeling into the exquisite phrases with which Mendelssohn has coloured this scene as to appeal most powerfully to the listeners, and even to cause a murmur of satisfaction amongst an otherwise reverent audience. The singing of Mr. Santley throughout the declamatory portions of the first part was of the highest order, his taunts to the Baal priests being delivered with even more than his accustomed energy; and mention must also be made of the excellent manner in which the contralto music in this part was rendered by Madame Trebelli, who although scarcely perhaps heard at her best in Oratorio, is always artistic in everything she attempts. The Baal choruses were given with wonderful effect, and the culminating point of the first division of the Oratorio, "Thanks be to God," was sung so perfectly as effectually to disarm criticism. In the second part the great features were the fine rendering of the air, "Hear ye, Israel," by Madame Albani, the singing of Madame Patey in the Jezebel music and also in the air, "O, rest in the Lord"—which, for the due preservation of the continuity of the Oratorio, we are glad to say was not encored—the perfect rendering of the Trio, "Lift thine eyes," by Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli and Madame Patey, and the two solos, "It is enough," by Mr. Santley, and "Then shall the righteous," by Mr. Lloyd; the chorus-singing throughout being remarkably good, even for the world-famous Birmingham choir. In so fine a performance of this work—where, indeed, its essentially dramatic character was so fully revealed—we could not help again feeling that the true intention of the composer was destroyed by giving the music of the Youth to the vocalist who represents the Widow, and that of the consoling angel to the singer who declaims the impassioned part of Jezebel. Certain reasons may—and indeed do—exist why such an arrangement may be convenient; but art is inexorable in its demands and cannot grant a licence to infringe its laws for the mere sake of "convenience."

The evening Concert commenced with Sir Julius Benedict's Cantata, "Graziella," conducted by the composer. As at the rehearsal in Birmingham on the preceding Saturday Sir Julius was seized with a fainting fit which brought the proceedings to an abrupt termination, it need scarcely be said that his appearance on the platform to conduct his work was greeted with a storm of applause which must have convinced him how heartfelt was the sympathy with his temporary illness. "Graziella" is a dramatic Cantata in three scenes—so dramatic, indeed, that it is treated in the printed book of words almost as an Opera, the scenery and action being indicated throughout. The libretto is written by Mr. Henry Hersee and modelled somewhat upon the style of the poetry of the late Mr. Bunn. The plot may be briefly explained as follows: Graziella is beloved by Renzo, but does not return his passion, declaring that her heart is, and ever will be, free. Gennaro, Graziella's father, is shipwrecked during a violent storm, and Graziella promises her hand to any one who will save him. Renzo, at the risk of his own life, puts out to sea, and is successful in bringing Gennaro safely to land, claiming her hand as his reward. Alonzo, a Venetian noble, supposed to be a poor artist-student, is also in love with Graziella and presses his suit, when she reluctantly confesses her engagement to Renzo, made through gratitude, not love. Renzo overhears this, releases her from her vow and enlists. Alonzo, having to gain the consent of his mother to his marriage, sails to Venice accompanied by Renzo. This consent is refused, Renzo is killed in battle, and Graziella, finding that she has lost a true lover, in despair takes the veil, just as Alonzo, all obstacles being removed, returns to claim her as his bride. The scene of the Cantata is laid at a fishing village on the cliff at Procida, and the work opens at sunset, when the fishermen and villagers are preparing for a dance, with a brief instrumental introduction in A minor, leading to the tonic major, in which key a joyous chorus of simple construction commences, the voice parts being surrounded by appropriate melodic figures in the accompaniment. Especially effective is the Tarantella figure in 6-8, which is alternated with passages in 2-4 time, the movement concluding with much animation. The entrance of Graziella, preceded by a few short phrases, shows that we are to expect some florid music in the Italian school, her first short solo, unaccompanied, being a conventional solfeggio, running up to C in alt. Her song, "Lovers' vows," is exceedingly popular in character, the two cadences preceding the change of tempo affording ample opportunity for vocal display. The short instrumental movement, during which the storm rises, and the scene descriptive of the ship striking on the rock contain some good dramatic writing, and the action is well carried on in the following aria, at the beginning of which the Miserere, sung by the chorus, is woven in with Graziella's solo, the scene ending with a quartet and chorus. The animation and bustle of this number are well sustained; but we scarcely understand why a gong should be substituted for the bell, for which there is a direction in the score. Alonzo's song, "When first this lonely shore I sought," preceded by a recitative, is in the commonplace ballad form; but better music follows, especially in the trio, "Think of me sometimes"—in our opinion the gem of the whole work: indeed, did our space permit, we could mention many points in this trio not only good as abstract music, but as specimens of that sympathetic setting of words which, although a matter often disregarded by composers, never fails to make itself felt with an audience. The following scene, in which Renzo cancels Graziella's vow, has many dramatic and effective phrases. We care not much for Renzo's ballad,

"The shipwrecked heart" (although it was encored); but the quartet in which the lovers take leave of Graziella and the Sailors' Chorus may be cited as good and thoughtful numbers, the orchestration often colouring with much effect the varied dramatic situations of the scene. Graziella's Scena, which commences the next scene, has some good declamatory passages, the last of which, commencing in E flat, and passing into C major, in which key the number dies off, is extremely effective. In the Recitative and Aria for the Abbess, beginning with a brief organ prelude, the consolatory words of the text are set with appropriate simplicity and earnestness. This was well sung by Madame Patey, and encored. After this, however, the music seems somewhat hurriedly put together; but the placid chorus of Nuns, which immediately precedes the finale—ending upon the keynote, prolonged for five bars in the soprano part, with a chromatic descending progression for the altos—is happily expressive of the words. The part of Graziella, assigned to Madame Marie Roze, received a rendering throughout which must have delighted the composer as assuredly it did the audience. The difficult passages constantly ascending to the extreme notes of the register were thrown off with the utmost ease; and in the expression of the words the vocalist almost made the audience forget that she was a foreigner. In the small part of the Abbess, Madame Patey was highly effective. Mr. Lloyd sang with much earnestness throughout, being especially successful in the dramatic portions of the work, and Mr. F. King was everything that could be desired in the music assigned him. The Cantata was received with much favour, and the composer was overwhelmed with applause on quitting the orchestra. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, a decided feature in the instrumental portion being Cowen's Suite de Ballet "The Language of the Flowers" (conducted by the composer), one of the most charming works of this rising artist. All these pieces are remarkably fanciful, but the grace and delicacy of No. 3, the "Fern," and No. 5, the "Yellow Jasmine," elicited a storm of applause, the last named being enthusiastically encored. The vocal pieces included "Ah, quel giorno," by Madame Trebelli; "Ocean, thou mighty monster," by Miss Anna Williams; "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her angels," by Mr. Maas; and the quartet, "Mezza notte," from "Marta," by Miss Williams, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli. The part commenced with Costa's March from "Eli," and concluded with Berlioz' fine Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," which seems now fast obtaining the recognition due to its merits.

On Wednesday—the "Redemption" morning," as it was generally called—the approaches to the Town Hall were so thronged that it was with the utmost difficulty any person not going to the Festival could make his way through the crowd. Indeed, within our memory of these meetings we can recall no such excitement in the town, and in the building itself there was not even standing-room, many visitors who had come from a distance, as we were informed, and were unsuccessful in the ballot for admission, preferring rather to secure tickets with a knowledge that no seat could be provided for them than to return without hearing the work. The rule forbidding applause during the sacred performances did not prevent M. Gounod from receiving an ovation on entering the orchestra to conduct his Oratorio; but this cordial demonstration to a well-tried artist was hushed, as if by magic, when the first notes of the work were heard, and the eager audience became at once transformed into a reverential congregation.

It is a proof of the earnestness with which M. Gounod has worked at this Oratorio, that instead of satisfying himself with a libretto prepared to his hand he decided to compile it for himself, thus moulding the subject into the form which he conceived would be best suited for musical illustration. That he has thrown it into a dramatic shape is, we think, one reason why the interest is never for an instant lessened; the vividness of the events being so heightened by the personality of those who take part in them as materially to deepen their solemn import upon the listeners. One distinguishing feature in the composition is that, although the incidents are related by two Narrators—a tenor and bass—their music, instead of being used as a mere link between the several important pieces occurring in the work, is intimately connected with the most melodious and sympathetic orchestral figures, so that the narrative is carried forward equally by the voice and instruments. The work is divided into three parts—the Passion, the Resurrection and Ascension, and the Pentecost—preceded by a short Prologue, representing the Creation, the Fall, and the Promise of Redemption. That the composer has approached his theme with an earnest feeling for its sacred character is manifest throughout the composition—which, as we have already said, has occupied his mind for twelve years—and in no respect is this more shown than in the fact of his purposely abstaining in his choral movements from any display of contrapuntal knowledge beyond that which seemed naturally demanded for the due musical illustration of the scenes and incidents of the religious drama. The exquisite theme which, in the fashion of the day, may be termed the leit-motif, expressive of the Redemption, appears first in the Prologue, and runs, like a thread of gold, through those portions of the work where the mission of our Saviour is dwelt upon, reflecting on the hearers a sense of that holy calmness and serenity with which He, in the divinity of His nature, met the scorn and persecution of His enemies. Apart from this, the melodious beauty, not only of the narrative portions already alluded to, which are incidentally woven in with the various scenes—for there are but few detached solos—but of the rich orchestral accompaniments which form so integral a portion of the work, appeal most powerfully to every ear, and will no doubt materially help to place the Oratorio as high in popular as it will unquestionably be in artistic favour. It must also be said that, in accordance with the design, which the composer has steadily adhered to, of preserving the continuity of his Oratorio, the choruses never assume the form of set compositions which would be equally as effective if transferred to another work, but grow up naturally from the progress of the incidents; and so thoroughly has the endeavour to faithfully realise the situations in which his choral movements occur been carried out, that, especially in those for the celestial choir, he has indicated exactly the number of voices to each part—a precaution which is productive of the happiest result.

We have already said that the Oratorio commences with a Prologue, and this, although brief, effectively prepares the listeners for the events which follow. An instrumental movement in C major, beginning upon a tonic pedal, pianissimo, leads to a creeping, ascending chromatic passage commenced by the violas, and joined by the other strings in contrary motion, and this is succeeded by a passage of chords, the many chromatic progressions thus early indicating a feature prevalent throughout the work. The tenor narration chiefly upon B, the dominant of the key, at the beginning, is afterwards woven in with a melody for the orchestra; and at the words describing man's revolt, the bass continues the narrative, accompanied by a sequence of augmented triads in their first inversion, an unusual, but by no means ineffective, progression. The tenor narration is then resumed; and here for the first time a portion of the "Redemption" theme is heard as a violin solo, soaring above the notes of the voice with charming effect. The Choral, the "Promise of Redemption," is preceded by the theme, now fully developed, and dies off at its conclusion, upon a pedal bass. This Choral is sung by the Celestial Choir, accompanied by the organ, and the excessive delicacy with which it was given fully proved the importance of assigning only a definite number of voices to each part. Part I. begins with a narration by the bass of the Persecution and Condemnation of Christ, with an appeal from the Saviour to His enemies—pathetic indeed in its simplicity—and a second bass narration accompanied with a choral-like theme on a tonic pedal. The March to Calvary, for orchestra, soli, and chorus, is unquestionably one of the most finished and deeply considered pieces in the work. To comprehend thoroughly this dramatic and characteristic March, it must be understood that the persecutors are here active, and the persecuted passive. The brutality of the pagan force, and not the calm resignation of the Saviour, has to be represented, and that this is most successfully done seemed tacitly admitted by the many who after its fine performance seemed inclined to break the rules of the Festival, and applaud it with vigour. The March, in A minor, is succeeded by a Choral in E minor, "Forth the Royal Banners go" (the "Vexilla Regis prodeunt" of the Catholic Liturgy), accompanied throughout with an orchestral figure for the strings, which forms a pathetic commentary upon the mournful procession as it passes, the March being afterwards resumed. The bass then narrates how the women who followed "wept and bewailed Him," and that Jesus, hearing their words, turned and spake. The baritone solo which follows is, like all the music given to Christ, dignified, solemn, and replete with a tenderness of feeling which makes it stand apart from the rest, as in a great religious picture the figure of the Saviour makes itself felt, whatever may be the interest or importance of the surroundings. After this solo the March again occurs, but this time woven in with the Choral, in A minor, which is sung by the full choir. The effect of this fine scene was perceptible with the audience, although any audible manifestation of such effect was strictly forbidden: indeed a constant attendance at the sacred performances of these Festivals confirms our belief in the eloquence of silence; for we have often seen less real enthusiasm when a concert-room is ringing with applause than we witnessed on this occasion in the Town Hall. The Crucifixion commences with a tenor narration, sympathetically accompanied, the Redemption theme again breaking in with touching effect on the words "He, though His eyes are dim." The bass takes up the narration describing how "they blaspheme Him," and then, after an ascending chromatic passage, an orchestral figure occurs evidently intended to be identified with the events of the Crucifixion, as we find it afterwards, in another key, introduce the scene of the Two Thieves. Then comes a Chorus of mockers, the vividness of the incidents being admirably represented by the varied colouring of the orchestration as well as by the taunting character of the voice parts, the effect being increased by the recurrence of the Redemption figure ingeniously inverted. After the derivative Chorus of Priests, in D minor, and a brief tenor narration, the prayer of the Saviour, "Pardon their sin, My Father," comes with a pathos the intensity of which is heightened by the Redemption theme, which streams forth from the strings throughout. The "Reproaches" in which the Saviour addresses the erring people is set as a chorus in D minor, the accompaniment being appropriately subdued, with occasional brief melodious passages. The scene, "Mary at the foot of the Cross," contains some of the most deeply religious music in the work. The Quartet and Chorus, "Beside the Cross remaining," preceded by a tenor narration, commences with a placid melody for the tenor, which is answered in the dominant by the alto, a second subject is then introduced, the original theme being afterwards sung in harmony by the quartet, and then by the full choir in octaves. The solo for Mary, "While my watch I am keeping," which follows, is a lovely flowing theme ingeniously engrafted upon the "Stabat Mater" melody in the Catholic Liturgy, which is sustained by the orchestra throughout. At the repetition of this by the full choir, the "Stabat Mater" subject is assigned to the organ, the orchestra having a sympathetic independent accompaniment. The sensation created by this truly sacred piece was again obvious, and there can be little doubt that it would have been redemanded, had such concessions to popular taste been allowed. The words of the Impenitent Thief, preceded by the passage already alluded to as identified with the Crucifixion, are twice interrupted by a portion of the Redemption theme inverted; and those of the Penitent Thief, followed by the consoling assurance of the Saviour, are so excellently contrasted in colour as to place the scene with all its pathetic details most vividly before the audience, the Choral, accompanied by the organ, well expressing the feeling of faith and hope inspired by the solemn tragedy enacted. The narrative of the Death of Jesus, commenced by the bass, is followed by a graphic instrumental movement representing the Darkness; the narration is then continued—interrupted by the appealing words of Jesus from the Cross—by the tenor and bass, who unite during the representation of the Earthquake, the orchestration of which is masterly in the extreme throughout. After the incident of the conversion of the Centurion, a beautiful Choral, in the bright key of E major, fitly brings to an end the first part of the work, the impression upon the listeners, in spite of the injunction to the contrary in the printed books, finding vent in a spontaneous burst of applause, which was duly acknowledged by the composer.

The second part opens with a jubilant chorus, the orchestral effect of which is increased by the placing of four trumpets at the highest part of the orchestra. The real sublimity of this fine chorus is scarcely to be realised by description, the persistent reiteration of the tonic and dominant, by the trumpets, against the varied harmonies in the vocal part being thoroughly suggestive, in the highest sense, of the great event intended to be musically illustrated. The scene of the Holy Women at the Sepulchre is one which has evidently engaged the deep thought of the composer, and, although the utmost attention of the audience is necessary to follow the minute details of this piece, the broad effect of the music appeals to all with irresistible force. With muted strings, after a brief narration, the instrumental Introduction commences upon a double pedal, the music, of a distinctly pastoral character, being full of a melancholy beauty which happily describes the feelings of the pilgrims upon their journey. The trio, for three female voices, at the tomb is followed by a tenor narration, which leads to an effective solo from the Angel who appears to the Holy Women. This piece, accompanied by the harp, culminates in a point of much importance, the music gradually ascending until, as the composer tells us, "at the words 'He is risen' the melody and the bass suddenly move by the interval of a third, thus expressing that Christ, by His divine power, has triumphed over the grave and over subjection to death." Commencing with the theme of the introduction to this scene, for the first time in a major key, and still on a double pedal, after a narration by the tenor, Jesus appears to the Holy Women, His solo being partially accompanied with the Redemption theme. The tenor then narrates how the Holy Women fell at the feet of the Saviour, and the number ends with a repetition of the introductory theme. The incidents of the Sanhedrim are then carried forward by the tenor and bass Narrators, the choruses which follow being remarkably dramatic; the fright of the Soldiers at finding the tomb empty, and the alarm of the Priests when informed of the miracle, being admirably depicted. The concluding chorus, in C minor, contains some fine harmonic as well as unisonal effects, and worthily terminates the scene. The two Narrators then unite, and in the Trio of the Holy Women, which follows, apart from the excellent manner in which the words "The Lord He is risen again," are set, a noticeable feature is the introduction of the Redemption theme for the first time in triple rhythm, a point not mentioned by the composer in his prefatory analysis of the work. The incredulity of the Disciples is well shown in a short chorus for tenors and basses, and this is followed by a lovely soprano solo, with arpeggio accompaniment by the orchestra, and afterwards combined with the choir, the effect of which comes like a ray of sunshine after a scene so exciting in the variety of its incidents. The tenor and bass then respectively narrate the appearance of the Saviour to the Apostles, in which once more occurs the Redemption theme, this time given to the violoncellos, and this is followed by one of the grandest choruses in the work, "Unfold ye portals." In every respect this great choral piece is a marvellous specimen of vocal and orchestral writing. In the breadth and simplicity of the harmonies we are occasionally reminded of Handel; but a special effect is gained by the alternation of the vocal phrases between the two choirs, the celestial choir, for sopranos in unison, being always accompanied by arpeggios pianissimo, and the terrestrial choir replying with solid and bold harmonies, supported by the strength of the orchestra. Afterwards the choirs are united, and the Chorus concludes with the Redemption theme, upon a tonic pedal, played by the whole orchestra and supported by the organ. Again at the termination of this part the applause was loud and general, a compliment which the composer was compelled to respond to.

The Pentecost begins with a melodious Choral, commenced by the sopranos and answered by the altos, the effect of the theme being heightened by a syncopated accompaniment. This is succeeded by a lovely soprano solo, most happily expressive of the peaceful character of the text, the opening theme being afterwards repeated by the full choir in octaves, and a brief coda. A tenor narration precedes an instrumental movement, representing the Apostles in Prayer, the principal phrase of which, on a tonic pedal, is extremely happy, and harmonised with the well-known skill of the composer. The Descent of the Holy Ghost is related by the Narrators, with varied figures in the orchestration, the scene concluding with a brief soprano solo—A Voice from Heaven—with an appropriate harp accompaniment. The "Hymn of the Apostles," which ends the Oratorio, has seven distinct numbers—the first where the Apostles proclaim the three great doctrines of the Incarnation of the Word; the second a quartet and chorus, "By faith salvation comes"; the third a quartet, "O come to Me"; the fifth a semi-chorus, the Beatitudes, the sixth a repetition of the theme of No. 1, with choir, orchestra and great organ, and the seventh a final coda. All these divisions have a specially distinctive character, and prove that the composer has fully retained that energy and earnestness at the termination of his work with which in 1867 he commenced it. The broad and striking subject in unison commencing the first chorus, which is afterwards repeated by the full choir, is intended, as the composer tells us, to recall the form and rhythm of the chants called "Proses" in the Catholic Liturgy. The following quartet and chorus is extremely happy, not only in the music, but in its applicability to the words; the Beatitudes, given to a semi-chorus, is a charming piece of placid harmony, and the final chorus, in which a fugal passage appears for the first time, closes the Oratorio most effectively and with due solemnity. Of the performance of this work it is impossible to speak too highly. The great choral points and gorgeous instrumentation received a rendering which must assuredly have even exceeded the expectations of the composer, whose intelligent and decisive conducting was an important element in the general success. Finer chorus-singing we have indeed never heard; for not only were the massive effects overpoweringly grand, but the delicate, minute details of the colouring were so accurately observed that it seemed as if each member of the choir were inspired with a resolution to prove that in Birmingham alone can new works of the highest character receive an interpretation worthy of their merits. The singing of Madame Albani, especially in the air with chorus, "From Thy love as a Father," was especially good; her whole heart indeed evidently being in the music allotted to her, although there was but small opportunity for individual display. Madame Patey sang with a true artistic appreciation of the deeply pathetic character of her solos, and lent valuable aid in the concerted pieces, as did also Madame Marie Roze, who deserves much credit for such important co-operation. The narrations of Mr. Lloyd and Signor Poli showed the result of a zealous study of the music throughout; for although it is easy enough perhaps to sing the notes of a recitative, it is by no means a simple matter to make the audience feel them as the author intends. In the solos of the Saviour Mr. Santley was truly impressive, especially in the scene of the Crucifixion, where every phrase went to the heart of the listeners. Mr. W. H. Cummings, too, gave with much effect the solos of the Penitent Thief, and in those for the Impenitent Thief Mr. F. King was thoroughly satisfactory, his services being also enlisted in some of the quartets. Indeed the triumphant success of the "Redemption" should be a matter of sincere congratulation, not only to the composer, but to the many who have so zealously worked to ensure such result.

Mr. Gaul's new work, written for the Festival, called "The Holy City," comprised the first part of the Concert in the evening, and proved decidedly successful. The Cantata, being rather reflective than dramatic, gives much opportunity for that sympathetic colouring of the sacred words, the absence of which can in no degree be compensated for by a display of a profundity of learning; and we cannot but appreciate the modesty of an author who tells us in the preface to his Cantata that he has purposely avoided setting passages which have "already been treated in so masterly a manner by the great German composer, Louis Spohr, in his Oratorio 'The Last Judgment.'" The instrumental Introduction, "Contemplation," commences with a phrase which prevails, according to the custom of the day, throughout the Cantata, and this appropriately placid movement is followed by a chorus, tenor solo, and quartet, introduced by an organ solo. In this piece but little is attempted, the brief subject of the opening chorus, interrupted by a tenor solo, being repeated as a quartet unaccompanied, and then as a chorus with a moving bass, and a few additional bars at the conclusion. The tenor solo, "My soul is athirst for God," is effectively led up to by an enharmonic modulation from A flat to E major; and this is succeeded by an unaccompanied trio for three female voices, "At eventide it shall be light," modelled—perhaps somewhat too much—upon Mendelssohn's "Lift thine eyes." The pastoral chorus which follows, "They that sow in tears," is an exceedingly effective number, the flowing subject in 6-8 time, being followed by a well-contrasted unaccompanied choral movement in common time, happily expressive of the words "For God so loved the world." The theme already mentioned, which commences the introduction of the Cantata, now precedes a melodious mezzo-soprano solo—the voice part opening with a reminiscence of this subject in another time—and the first Part concludes with two choruses, the second of which, "Thine is the kingdom," contains a fugue which, although not developed to any great extent, is well written and appropriate to the words. Part II. commences with an instrumental movement, "Adoration," which has an attractive subject, the effect of which is aided by a figure in the accompaniment which prevails almost throughout. The movement, however, is somewhat too long, and becomes slightly monotonous in consequence. The bass solo, "Thus saith the Lord," one of the most important movements in the Cantata, derives much of its effect from the introduction of a Choral Sanctus, sung by a small choir to the typical theme of the work. The temporary interruptions of the solo by this choral phrase, and the conclusion of the piece by the Sanctus for the bass voice alone, the movement dying off with arpeggios for the harp, may be cited in proof of the care with which the composer has worked to colour his subject with a fidelity which shall display rather an innate religious feeling than an acquired technical knowledge. That power is ready when required is evidenced by the following chorus for a double choir, "Let the Heavens rejoice," which contains some good solid writing, although signs of labour are occasionally apparent. Of the contralto and soprano solos which follow, we prefer the former, but both are melodious and thoroughly vocal. A duet for soprano and mezzo-soprano is followed by a quartet and chorus for female voices, leading to a bass solo, which is afterwards combined effectively with the chorus, a soprano solo at the conclusion, in which a long-sustained A flat is a prominent feature, adding much to the interest of the movement. The last chorus forms an effective finale to the work, a point worthy of commendation being the introduction of the solo voices at intervals unaccompanied, the "Sanctus" again being sung to the theme so often heard in the course of the composition. The applause was very general throughout the work, and the solo, "Eye hath not seen," sung by Madame Trebelli, was encored. Especially effective, too, was the Choral Sanctus, which was well sung and received with much favour. The other principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Messrs. Maas and F. King, Miss Emilie Harris lending her aid in a quartet. All these singers worked zealously to secure the success of the work, as did also Mr. Stockley who conducted, and the composer, being called for at the conclusion, bowed to the audience from the gallery.

Mr. Villiers Stanford's Orchestral Serenade which commenced the second part, was another novelty. The work, as might be expected from the antecedents of this composer, is decidedly symphonic in treatment, and, both from the inventive power and command over the orchestra, should take high rank amongst his numerous compositions. The first movement, in G major, has a well-marked subject, with which the second theme in the dominant is effectively contrasted. The development of these motives, although amply proving scholastic knowledge, is never dry; and especially in the concluding portion, where reminiscences of themes are used, the writing is free and effective. A Scherzo which follows, prestissimo, is fanciful and has some excellent points, especially in the trio, the theme of which is extremely melodious. The slow movement, a Notturmo in E flat, has a charming cantabile subject, instrumented with much skill, a poco più mosso, in which excellent use is made of the horns sustained, giving much variety to the movement, which is assuredly destined to be the most popular in the work. An Intermezzo in C major is a Presto for the violins, with some effective contrapuntal writing against the restless principal theme, clever throughout and showing much knowledge of contrasted instrumental effects. This movement was encored. In the Finale the composer has thrown all his strength. The first theme, in G, is excellently scored, and materially aided by a fanciful accompaniment; the second subject, in the somewhat unexpected key of F, being afterwards used, slightly altered, in a lullaby Adagio in G, which forms a coda, upon a tonic pedal, and appropriately concludes the Serenade. The composer, who conducted his work, was warmly and deservedly applauded at its conclusion by a highly appreciative audience. The rest of the part was miscellaneous; the principal vocalists being Madame Marie Roze, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Maas, Mr. Cummings, Mr. F. King, and Signor Foli; Rossini's Overture to the "Siege of Corinth" terminating an unduly long concert.

On Thursday morning the "Messiah" attracted, as usual, a large audience, for Handel's masterpiece, with a Festival orchestra and chorus, and conducted by Sir Michael Costa, appeals with undiminished power not only to music-lovers, but to all who feel the influence of sacred art as an aid to religion. The rendering of the work on this occasion was unusually good, the choruses being given with even more than the precision and effect to which we are accustomed at these meetings. A great feature in the performance was the singing of the whole of the soprano music by Madame Albani, who it is almost needless to say gave with fine effect the well-known solos, many of which would doubtless have been encored in a secular concert-room. The contralto parts were divided between Madame Trebelli and Madame Patey, Mr. Maas singing the tenor, and Signor Foli the bass solos. The orchestra was excellent throughout, and the obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound," well sung by Signor Foli, was played by Mr. Harper with his usual skill.

The first part of the Concert on Thursday evening was devoted to Gade's new Cantata "Psyche," conducted by the composer, who received quite an ovation on entering the orchestra. The subject of the work is one which lends itself readily to musical treatment, and especially to such treatment as we might reasonably expect from the charming works of the Danish composer already so popular in this country. Although the poem of Lobedanz, upon which the libretto is founded, departs from the well-known classic narrative of "Cupid and Psyche," it is doubtless better suited for a dramatic Cantata, and every praise is due to the Rev. J. Troutbeck, who has performed his difficult task of adapting the Danish original to English words with much skill. The wrath of Venus on finding that Psyche, in the purity of her soul, had brought her no offering; the banishment of the maiden by the enraged Goddess to a rocky height, where she is to be delivered up to a demon lover; her release from this fearful spot by Zephyr and the Genii; her espousal to Eros on condition that she seeks not to know whom she has wedded; the separation consequent upon her desire to penetrate the secret, and instant passage to a lower world; her meeting with Proserpine and return to earth, and her reunion with Eros in an immortal life—are told in a series of scenes so full of poetical feeling as to present a charming outline for the genius of a composer to work upon; and that Gade, in the setting of this Cantata, has added one more to his many triumphs the warm applause of the Birmingham audience, for whom the work was especially written, has decisively proved. In a highly dramatic chorus, preceded by a short instrumental Prelude, which forms the introduction to the Cantata, the story is told of Psyche's presumed slight to Venus, and of the Goddess's revenge; the music illustrative of the happy and innocent life of the maiden in the "country of sunlight and gladness," where she was bred, being admirably contrasted with that of the scene of gloom and desolation on the rocky height to which she is banished. A point of much interest is the decree of the Goddess—an ascending chromatic phrase sung chiefly in unison, and accompanied with a tremolo in the orchestra—and this may perhaps be said to be a leit-motif, as it afterwards occurs whenever this dread sentence is referred to. The return to the major key after this, with a shadow of the opening phrase of the chorus, is extremely beautiful, and the repetition of the mournful words "Till her wailing is low" at the conclusion shows how much pains the composer has bestowed upon what may be termed the Prologue to the work. Part I. opens with an aria for Psyche, commencing with a wailing cry of anguish and an appealing phrase, on the dominant harmony of E minor, the solo which follows, happily reflective of her varied feelings, ending with a prolonged cry of horror at the prospect of her threatened punishment. The following trio for Zephyr and Genii, in the relative major, forms a charming relief to the preceding scene, the placid and simple melody, with a flowing triplet accompaniment, depicting with much truthfulness the consolatory words of the text. The reply of the Invisible Chorus to Psyche's anxious inquiries is appropriately refined and melodious, and this leads to a duet between Psyche and Eros, the writing of which is masterly throughout; the voice parts at first in dialogue, and afterwards united, being surrounded by rich and varied orchestration, which effectively sustains the interest to the conclusion. The first part terminates with an Invisible Chorus (in six parts), of blessing on the lovers, the contrapuntal effects in which are not only clear and well considered, but thoroughly in sympathy with the words throughout. The commencement of the second part reflects the happiness of Psyche and Eros in a charmingly melodious instrumental Scherzo, followed by a Trio and Chorus (encored), the Trio, especially, for Zephyr and Genii, having a theme of extreme beauty. In the succeeding number Psyche, refusing to be consoled by the Genii for the absence of Eros, in an impassioned solo—twice interrupted by the phrase descriptive of the sentence of the Goddess—gives vent to her long pent-up feelings of doubt, and, in a burst of frenzy, demands to know the fatal secret. This powerfully descriptive scene depends chiefly upon the vocal writing, the orchestra being judiciously employed to enforce the effect of the voice parts. Many of the choral portions of this number are extremely beautiful, and in the final solo for Psyche, in which she seals her fate, the gradual rise to the B flat in alt has a thrilling effect, the choral phrase, "Woe to thee," concluding calmly and sorrowfully one of the most dramatic numbers in the work. In the piece which follows, Eros bids farewell to Psyche, who pleads for forgiveness; and this is succeeded by an air for Eros who makes an appeal to Zeus for help, the part concluding with a bold and energetic chorus, "Thou art mighty, O Eros," well and effectively written, and including some excellent points of imitation. This chorus was redemanded. The third Part, "In the Lower World," contains but one number—"Shadows hover, sad and mournful"—consisting of soli and chorus. Commencing with a highly dramatic subject for the basses, which in altered forms pervades the movement, the writing evidences both the knowledge and imagination of the composer to the utmost advantage. The solos for Proserpine, who bids Psyche drink oblivion in Lethe's waters, the brief reflective choral passages, the touching pleadings of Psyche, and her final release, by permission of Proserpine, form a scene of the utmost dramatic interest, the colouring being so admirably contrasted, and so thoroughly consonant with the action as to rivet the attention of the listeners throughout. The air for Eros, "Still rests the morning twilight," with which the fourth part opens, has a melodious subject in 6-4 rhythm, the accompaniment singing the vocal theme, with unaffected but most appropriate harmonies. Two duets between Psyche and Eros follow, the second having some charming orchestral effects, at the termination of which the earthly regions are for ever left, and the Cantata concludes with a fine Chorus of greeting to the heavenly abode, with occasional soli for the principal characters, the concluding bars, in which Psyche in an ecstatic burst of joy soars upwards to the C in alt, in combination with the chorus, having a thrilling effect. We have endeavoured to draw attention to the salient points of Gade's work, but the charm of the instrumentation and effect of the vocal writing can be but faintly shadowed forth in words. Purer music was never written: there is not a bar throughout which seems the result of labour; and, although we are occasionally reminded of Mendelssohn, more especially in the treatment of the voice parts, the style is Gade's own. Upon the rendering of his Cantata the composer has every right to congratulate himself. Madame Marie Roze, in the part of Psyche, was thoroughly artistic, not only her voice, but her dramatic feeling being most advantageously displayed throughout the work. Madame Trebelli was excellent as Proserpine, Miss Eleanor Farnol lent valuable aid in the trios, and Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley gave the utmost effect to the music with which they were intrusted. The composer was overwhelmed with applause at the conclusion of the work, and its success was indeed as decided as it was well deserved.

The second part of the Concert began with Mr. C. Hubert Parry's new Symphony, conducted by the composer. This work, although undoubtedly reflective of the modern school of writing, differs not in its construction from the established models. Opening with a well-marked theme in G major, carefully and appropriately harmonised, an effectively contrasted subject, commenced by the wind instruments, appears in due course, the development of these movements proving that, although the composer has reverently studied in the good school of writing, he has dared to think for himself. The Andante in E flat has an attractive theme, with a well-contrasted second subject, the dialogue passages for strings and wind being an especial feature in the movement, which, although amply worked out, wearies not by its length. The Scherzo contains much clever writing. By the introduction of two Trios it is, perhaps, somewhat unduly prolonged; but the themes are interesting, and the continuity of thought is unbroken throughout. The Finale is an elaborate movement, requiring for the due comprehension of all its details more than a single hearing; but it may be mentioned that the introduction of the principal subject of the first movement has the effect of establishing a link which much enhances the interest of the work. Every movement of the Symphony was warmly received, and the composer was loudly applauded on his retirement from the orchestra. M. Gounod's new song, written for the Festival and called "The golden thread," which followed, is a charmingly pure and melodious piece of writing both for voice and orchestra—the instrumentation, indeed, being as much a feature as the vocal portion—and its exceptionally good rendering by Madame Patey contributed materially to gain for it the success it so thoroughly deserved. The same composer's "Nuptial March," dedicated to H.R.H. the Duke of Albany, was also performed for the first time, and secured a reception due to its exceptional merits and to the fine manner in which it was interpreted. Like all M. Gounod's works, it is thoroughly original in thought, and its success is therefore more gratifying to the composer, since it is utterly unlike the conventional Wedding Marches of the day. Scored for the organ and band, with that consummate knowledge of effect which alone can make this combination attractive, the National Anthem steals unexpectedly upon the ear, treated as a Canto fermo with elaborate counterpoint, the repetition of the theme a fifth above having an extremely fine effect. The March elicited the most enthusiastic applause, for which M. Gounod, who conducted both his new compositions, bowed his acknowledgments. The remainder of the programme calls for no special notice, save that Miss Williams gave a fine rendering of Beethoven's "Ah perfido," and that one of the best performances of the Overture to "William Tell" ever heard was given by the band.

On Friday morning the programme commenced with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, which was magnificently played, and the last movement encored. Brahms's "Triumphlied" was then given, and received a rendering so perfect as to ensure a cordial recognition, even from those who could not appreciate its more recondite beauties. The double choruses of this work were sung with remarkable precision, the tone of the choir being as fine in every respect as at the commencement of the Festival. Mr. F. King was the solo vocalist. Cherubini's Fourth Mass began the second part, the soloists being Madame Albani, Miss Williams, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, Mr. Cummings, Mr. F. King, and Signor Foli. Especially in the solo "Laudate Dominum," with chorus, and the duet, "O Salutaris," with Mr. Maas, Madame Albani's superb singing was a conspicuous feature, the other vocalists also rendering the music which fell to their share not only with artistic finish, but with a deep religious feeling which materially contributed to the effect of the work upon the audience. Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," which terminated the programme for the morning, formed a fitting climax to what may be termed the "Selection day" of the Festival. The principal parts were sung by Miss Williams—who won golden opinions by her pure style of vocalisation—Mr. Maas, and Mr. F. King. The dramatic choruses of the work were most effectively sung, "We here shall surely find Him" creating a special impression.

A second hearing of M. Gounod's "Redemption," on Friday evening, confirmed us in all our impressions of the work at its first performance. The "March to Calvary," the scene of the "Holy Women at the Sepulchre," the impressive incidents of the Crucifixion, the sublime choruses, "Saviour of men," and "Unfold ye portals," produced an effect almost indescribable upon the vast audience assembled; and it is needless to say that all the solo parts were given with the intensity of expression which seemed to evidence that the vocalists had their heart in the work before them. In every respect the success of the Oratorio was triumphant, and we believe that had a third performance been practicable the Town Hall would again have been filled to overflowing. There was no applause during the performance, except after Madame Albani's solo, "From Thy love as a Father"; but between the parts, and especially at the conclusion, M. Gounod was cordially greeted, his retirement from the orchestra producing an overpowering demonstration. The National Anthem, conducted by Sir Michael Costa, gave the audience an opportunity of proving their loyalty to an artist who has sufficiently proved his loyalty to them; and after a splendid rendering of this piece the listeners gradually left the Hall, to reflect, we trust, upon the grand works which have been during the week submitted to them.

We cannot close our remarks upon this exceptionally attractive Festival without a sincere expression of admiration at the energy with which the preliminary arrangements were planned, and the highly successful manner in which they were carried out. The band, led with his accustomed ability by M. Sainton, has been thoroughly worthy of the occasion; and the choir, throughout a most arduous week, has fully sustained its world-wide reputation, and evidenced once more the excellent training of the indefatigable chorus-master, Mr. Stockley. All the new works have been conducted by their composers, with the exception of that by Mr. Gaul; and that Sir Michael Costa was not only enabled to take his accustomed place at the Festival, but to conduct with his usual unerring judgment, was, both with the members of the orchestra and the audience, a matter of the sincerest congratulation. With a passing word of commendation to the organist, Mr. Stimpson, who invariably uses his instrument not only with skill but with discretion, and warm recognition of the valuable services of the stewards—whose ready courtesy on every occasion forms one of the many agreeable reminiscences of the meeting—we take our leave of a Festival which, with a distinct recollection of several former triumphs, we consider one of the most memorable in the annals of these important art-gatherings.

We cannot yet state the exact sum which will be handed over to the General Hospital; but it is announced that the total amount realised is £15,011, showing an increase of £3,306 12s. 8d. over the receipts of 1879.

THE HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

If there were any danger of the Birmingham Festival at any time overshadowing the meeting of the Three Choirs, assuredly the Hereford Festival, which followed so soon afterwards, would have more than ever felt its influence. Cathedral performances of the great works in sacred art, however, have a special attraction which can in no respect be diminished whilst a high standard of efficiency in their rendering is maintained; and now that, by a few judicious mutual concessions, all opposition to their continuance is removed, the Three Choir Festivals may be confidently relied on, not only as a permanent agent for the cultivation of a healthy musical taste, but as an important contributor to the funds of the excellent Charity for the benefit of which the meetings were originally established. Whether from fear that the great demonstration at Birmingham might draw away some of the usual supporters of their Festival, or merely to show an increasing loyalty to the cause, the citizens of Hereford determined to make this year memorable in the history of the meetings by decorating their principal streets so plentifully with evergreens, flowers, flags, and various appropriate devices that the visitors on arriving made their way through triumphal floral arches, had a "Welcome" waving over their heads in the main thoroughfares, and entered their hotels through a bower of green leaves. This is as it should be; for if the inhabitants of the three Cathedral cities show that they regard these triennial celebrations with the apathy which we have seen exhibited on some occasions, it can scarcely be expected that much enthusiasm will be felt by those strangers whose powerful sympathy with the Festivals it should be their desire to enlist.

On Tuesday morning, the 12th ult., as usual on the opening day of the Festival, the chief magistrate and the members of the Corporation of Hereford, accompanied by several representatives of the magisterial body, attended the Cathedral at the full Choral Service at half-past nine. The Canticles were sung to Wesley in E; and the anthem was Dr. Walmisley's "The Lord shall comfort Zion," the solos in which were excellently rendered by the Rev. J. H. Lambert and Master Tebbutt, one of Mr. Stedman's choir in London. Mr. C. H. Lloyd presided at the organ. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Sir George H. Cornewall, Bart., who took for his text John xiii. 34: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another: as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." This discourse, eloquent throughout in praise of music, especially dealt with the important subject of the presentation of Oratorios in Cathedrals. "It is idle," said the preacher, "to attempt to deny that there are difficulties connected with the production of sacred Oratorio in our Cathedrals, of which those who most actively support these Festivals are only too keenly conscious—the orchestra which recalls our secular concert-rooms, the reserving of seats by money payment, the difficulty of securing due reverence on the part of those engaged. We contend in a distinct act of worship these difficulties must be acknowledged; but if, on the other hand, these masterpieces of music are to be presented in a complete form, one in which both voices and instruments unite to form one harmonious whole, and none can be spared, in which only the most eminent singers in devoting their heaven-born gifts to the praise of God can adequately interpret these divine compositions—if this be the aim before us, may we not fairly claim a certain tenderness as regards those difficulties with which we have to contend?" This is precisely the spirit in which the subject should be met by the clergy; and we are glad to find that the Three Choir Festivals have so able a champion.

The first Cathedral performance—according to a custom which we hope to see long preserved—was Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah," which was attended by a larger audience than that of 1879, a practical proof of its increasing attraction which needs no comment. Throughout the work the tone and precision of the choir were displayed to the utmost advantage; and had not some of the choruses been unduly hurried by Mr. Langdon Colborne, the Conductor, the choral performance would have been almost without a flaw. The solo vocalists were Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, efficient aid being afforded in the subordinate parts by Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Lily Parratt, Messrs. Fredericks, F. Boyle, F. King, and Stanley Smith. With the exception of Miss Hilda Wilson, all the principal artists appeared in the same characters at Birmingham; and it remains therefore only to say that in the music assigned to her, especially in the air "Woe unto them," Miss Wilson sang with a refinement and intelligence deserving of high praise.

The programme at the Evening Concert in the Shire Hall commenced with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont"—the playing of which deserved more appreciation than it received—and this was followed by the only work especially written for the Festival, a setting of Collins's "Ode to the Passions," by Mrs. Meadows White. The composer, better known to the public as Alice Mary Smith, is no novice in the art of writing for voices and instruments in combination, having already produced a Cantata written to Kingsley's "Ode to the North-East Wind," which was performed with much success at a concert of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, under the direction of Mr. Ebenezer Prout. In the present work she has essayed a somewhat higher flight, for the varied feelings necessary to be musically reflected in the libretto she has chosen demand something more than graceful and even characteristic writing. Let us at once say that throwing aside all attempt to enrol herself amongst the composers of a more "advanced" school, she has modestly taken Handel as her model, and throughout her arduous task kept strictly within the bounds of her own legitimate powers. The result is—as it ever must be under such circumstances—a good honest piece of workmanship, of which the worker ought to feel proud. We cannot, of course, assert that the music strikes by its originality; but there is throughout much contrast of style, and we might even say that the portions demanding force and vigour are superior to those where melodious tenderness is required. In parts the orchestration is unduly heavy; but, as a rule, it is sufficiently sympathetic with the voices to inspire us with hope that the composer is not beyond profiting by a hearing of her own work: a lavish use of orchestral force is comparatively easy, even to the student, but reticence comes only by experience.

Mrs. White commences her work with a short instrumental Introduction in C major, leading to a chorus and tenor solo "Fear, Anger, Despair," beginning with a figure in the accompaniment carried on from the Introduction. At the change to the tonic minor, the choir sings a well-marked subject in octaves, with a flowing semiquaver accompaniment; and this is followed by a theme given out by the tenors, and answered in fugal fashion by the other voices. A tenor solo, "Anger," then occurs, and the number ends with a chorus commencing with a stately choral-like subject, well expressing the feeling of the words, "With woeful measures, wan despair," and concluding with a noisy choral movement, in which the cymbals are used somewhat too freely. The soprano solo, "Hope," has an appropriately placid subject in 9-8 rhythm, the accompaniment simply supporting the melody, save where on the holding key-note the first two bars of the symphony occur, to be carried on by the voice to the final close. Certainly little is attempted in this solo, yet the melodiousness of the theme—aided by the charming singing of Miss Anna Williams—made its way with the audience, and it was warmly applauded. An agitated symphony in A minor introduces the baritone solo descriptive of "Revenge," an effective point being the change into the relative major where the "war-denouncing trumpet," and the "doubling drum" are dwelt upon. The strain representing "Pity," which interrupts these energetic passages, and the return to the original feeling when "Revenge" again asserts his right, offer sufficient contrast in style, many portions of the orchestration, too, being worthy of commendation. It was exceedingly well sung by Mr. F. King. "Jealousy" is set as a simple chorus in G minor, with a triplet accompaniment throughout; but the following Trio with Chorus, "Melancholy," in the tonic major, is extremely beautiful and contains some points of imitation which give much life to the words. The succeeding chorus, "Cheerfulness," has a bold theme, the persistent tonic and dominant harmonies, however, becoming decidedly monotonous towards the conclusion of the movement, where a figure in the accompaniment is continued for fourteen bars. Introduced by a brief Recitative, the tenor air, "Joy," comes as an agreeable relief after the three choral pieces already named. This is an exceedingly melodious solo, and in good sympathy with the feeling of the text; but the accentuation of the words occasionally mars the flow of the music, as, for example, where the last syllable of "ecstatic" is written to the second triplet of quavers in 6-8 rhythm. After a short Recitative, an effective Duet for soprano and tenor, "Love and Mirth," occurs, the tunefulness and thoroughly vocal passages in which must have gratified the singers, as they evidently did the audience. This is succeeded by the final Chorus which commences in F minor, with a reminiscence in the accompaniment of the figure in the Introduction and opening Chorus. Passing into C major, in which key the work ends, we have some bold choral writing, well supported by the orchestra, the figure already mentioned running uninterruptedly to the conclusion. Every justice was done to the work by the vocalists named, Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. F. Boyle; and the choir throughout gave ample evidence of having been well drilled not only in the notes, but in the feeling to be expressed by them. At the conclusion of the Ode the applause was warm and enthusiastic, and the composer was compelled to respond personally to the congratulations of the audience. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and comprised Cherubini's Overture "Les Deux Journées," and a violin solo, finely played by Mr. Carrodus, with vocal selections by the singers who had appeared in the first part, and an excellent rendering of Walter Macfarren's Part-song "You stole my love" by the Bradford Choir.

A selection from Handel's Oratorio "Judas Macabæus" commenced the performances in the Cathedral on Wednesday morning, the well-known choral numbers of this martial work affording excellent opportunity for the exhibition of the highest powers of the exceptionally fine choir assembled. The choruses which created the most effect were obviously "We come," "Fall'n is the foe," "We never will bow down," and the final "Hallelujah," all of which were sung with much steadiness and precision. The principal vocalists were Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. Santley, subordinate parts being satisfactorily sustained by Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Fredericks, and Mr. F. King. We cannot dwell upon the excellent singing of the many celebrated solos in the work; but mention must be made of "Pious Orgies" and "From mighty kings," by Madame Albani; "Sound an alarm," by Mr. E. Lloyd; and "The Lord worketh wonders," by Mr. Santley. The second part opened with Beethoven's Symphony, No. 4, in B flat—which, considering the inordinate length of the programme, should have been transferred to the secular concerts—Goetz's 137th Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon"—a composition too well known to demand criticism—and Bach's Magnificat in D. In the first-named work the solos were exceedingly well sung by Miss Anna Williams, and in the second by Miss Williams, Miss Marian Fenna, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Fredericks, and Mr. Santley. Goetz's Psalm was perhaps a little too severe for the majority of the audience; but Bach's Magnificat made itself felt by all, and if to Mr. Langdon Colborne we owe the selection of this work, we tender him our best thanks.

The evening performances in the Cathedral, originated in Hereford by the late Mr. Townshend Smith, have now grown to be a feature in the Three Choir Festivals; and we are glad to find that for the Wednesday evening Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was selected. Truly sacred as this work is, whenever and wherever it is heard, never does its religious character assert itself so powerfully as when performed in a cathedral, the surroundings of which are so thoroughly in consonance with Mendelssohn's divine music. On this occasion its fine rendering created a marked impression upon the audience, the choruses—in spite of the arduous morning's work—being given with remarkable freshness and effect, and the solo parts being admirably rendered by Miss Anna Williams (who has materially advanced her already high reputation during this Festival), Madame Patey, Mr. F. King, Mr. Stanley Smith, and Mr. Santley; Mr. Boyle—to whom the exacting tenor music was entrusted—singing throughout with more artistic feeling and less effort than on his appearance at the Shire Hall.

Dr. Garrett's Cantata, "The Shunammite," which commenced the Cathedral performances on Thursday morning, had already been heard in Cambridge, at a concert by the University Choral Society, in June last. The composer has compiled the libretto of his own work; and he must not be surprised, therefore, if, having thrown it into a thoroughly dramatic shape, disappointment is felt at finding it a collection of anthem-like choral pieces, with a few carefully written but often uninteresting solos. Let us at once say that as abstract Church music not a fault can be found with it. Scholastic knowledge, both in form and treatment, is amply displayed throughout the Cantata; and we cannot therefore but regret that Dr. Garrett has chosen a subject in the setting of which such acquirements, unallied with an innate dramatic power, are positively useless. Unfortunately, too, the scenes with Elisha and the Shunammite Woman remind us so strongly of those in Mendelssohn's "Elijah" that comparisons are forced upon us; and we cannot therefore even do that justice to the composer which his well-written and carefully considered music deserves. The characters in the Cantata are the Shunammite Woman, Gehazi, and Elisha, the narrative being given in recitative by a contralto. The composer adheres to the modern system of prefacing his work with an instrumental Introduction in lieu of an Overture; and this short movement, in B flat major, ending upon the dominant harmony, leads to a chorus, "Praised be the Lord daily," beginning with a lengthy subject for the tenors, which is answered in the dominant by the altos, and effectively worked throughout the chorus. The contralto then commences the narration, and this is followed by a chorus, which really appears to have nothing whatever to do with the action of the work, and therefore must, we presume, be called "reflective." The recitatives for Gehazi, the Shunammite Woman, and Elisha give good opportunity for dramatic treatment; but nothing arrests the attention until we come to the chorus "Children are an heritage," which starts with a bold fugue in G major, passes through G minor, and ends in the original key—the movement, although showing more acquired than natural power, being decidedly effective. The words of the succeeding solo for the Shunammite Woman, "My soul shall be joyful," are unaffectedly expressed, and the song, merely supported by simple and appropriate harmonies, gains by contrast with the severe choral pieces which precede it. In the chorus ending the first part, "The voice of joy and health," there is a somewhat awkward change at the Allegretto, which slightly marred the effect of an otherwise well-written movement. An instrumental movement of some importance commences the second part (the principal subject of which is of a tranquil, pastoral character), and leads well to a chorus of simple construction, a theme harmonised in three parts, being given first to the trebles, then to the tenors and basses, and afterwards to the full choir. The death of the child is then narrated by the contralto, the brief chorus "Call for the mourning women," in E minor, for tenors and basses alone, and the following choral piece, "Death is come up into our windows," fairly realising the grief and desolation of the scene. Recitatives by Gehazi, the Shunammite Woman, and Elisha lead to a chorus of women, "Wait on the Lord," in B major, after which the story is continued and the chorus repeated, this time with the full choir and in C major, in which key the second part ends. The third part commences with a short instrumental introduction, followed by a narration by the contralto, and then a long piece occurs in which Elisha prays for the restoration of the child to life, brief choruses again being introduced, which, although well written, interrupt the interest of the narrative and utterly break the devotional feeling of Elisha's prayer. A contralto narration precedes the solo of the Shunammite Woman, which, beginning in G minor, has a most effective change into the relative major, on the words "The Lord hath given me my heart's desire," and, indeed, expresses with much sympathetic feeling the gratitude of the mother. The brief choral piece "Praised be the Lord," which ends the Cantata, impresses us with the feeling that the composer became weary of his task, for it is but a repetition of the opening of the first chorus with a few bars of coda. Assuredly some reservation of resources would have been advisable for the conclusion of a work in which choruses so predominate; and we cannot but think that it would be well, before the Cantata is repeated, for the composer to reconsider this important matter. The chorus-singing throughout was excellent. Miss Anna Williams, as the Shunammite Woman, was thoroughly efficient; Miss Hilda Wilson gave the narrations with good feeling and emphasis; Mr. King, as Gehazi, did everything that could be done for the part; and Mr. Boyle, in the arduous character of Elisha, showed signs of improvement in the management of his voice which may lead to good results. The Cantata was conducted with care and judgment by the composer. Of Beethoven's Mass in C, which opened the second part of the programme, little need be said. The music evidently made its way to the hearts of the listeners, and Miss Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley gave the solos with fine effect throughout. A selection from Molique's little-known Oratorio, "Abraham," closed the morning's performance, and, even after the quantity of music which had preceded it, came with astonishing freshness upon the audience. Originally produced at the Norwich Festival of 1860, it has been but little heard since. Its performance upon the present occasion will, however, doubtless bring it again into that notice which its merits demand, and Hereford has indeed a right to be proud of having rescued so fine a composition from comparative neglect. The music of the Oratorio shows the composer to the utmost advantage, for we have not only beauty of melody, symmetry of construction, and judicious development of contrapuntal power, but every number displays the earnest desire of a conscientious artist to intensify the sacred incidents he has chosen for illustration, rather than to draw attention to the technical means by which this is effected. Although based to some extent upon the style of Mendelssohn, the work bears only the impress of being written by one who speaks in the best idiom of the day; for not only the choruses but the solos are spontaneous and unfettered both in thought and treatment. The text, compiled, we believe, by the composer himself, is almost entirely taken from the Holy Scriptures, and, including the departure of Abraham from his country, the birth of Isaac, the casting out of Hagar and Ishmael, and the sacrifice on Mount Moriah, the incidents are sufficiently varied and interesting for musical setting. From such a mine of wealth it is impossible to do more than draw attention to a few of the gems, but we may mention the choral movements, "O how great is Thy goodness," the contrapuntal writing of which is masterly throughout; the grand chorus "Great is our Lord," and the finale, "Great and marvellous," the last-named piece an excellent specimen of skill and inventive power. For charmingly melodious writing the quartet "Go in peace, for the Lord is thy way" and the trio "Let all those rejoice" must be especially named; and in the duet between Abraham and Sarah, "Cast out this bondswoman and her son," and many other pieces much variety is shown in the music assigned to the various characters. The only purely instrumental movement in the Oratorio, the March—which, although in the first part, was on this occasion introduced at the commencement of the second part—was well played and received with evident, though silent, satisfaction by the listeners. The rendering of all the choral pieces chosen reflected the utmost credit upon the choir; and the principal solos, sung by Miss Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley and Mr. F. King, with some subordinate parts intrusted to Misses Fenna and H. Wilson, left nothing to be desired.

At the evening Concert in the Shire Hall the fine singing of Madame Albani was a special attraction; and her first song being enthusiastically encored, she substituted a Scotch ballad, which, it need scarcely be said, created an extraordinary sensation. An interesting item in the programme was the Choral Fantasia of Beethoven, in which the pianoforte part was played by Mr. James Taylor, Mus. Bac., with an accuracy of touch and a perfect command of the passages which created a highly favourable impression upon the audience, and elicited well-deserved marks of approbation. A miscellaneous vocal selection was also given by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. F. King; the Bradford Choir gave Dr. Garrett's capital Part-song "O my love's like the red, red rose" (encored) and Ravenscroft's Madrigal "In the merry Springtime"; and the orchestra played the Overtures "Zauberflöte" and "Oberon," both of which were admirably rendered.

The performance of the "Messiah" in the Cathedral on Friday morning attracted an enormous audience as usual. In the rendering of this work we have only to mention that Mr. Boyle, who had been singing unequally during the Festival, gave the recitative "Comfort ye" and the air "Every valley" with excellent feeling and unexaggerated expression. The other vocalists were Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Santley, the success of whose efforts it is needless to record. The choruses were sung throughout with unflagging energy, the "Hallelujah," especially, being remarkable for precision and quality of tone.

A Chamber Concert at the Shire Hall in the evening concluded the Festival, the programme of which contained, besides two quartets, a selection of vocal solos, some madrigals by the Bradford Choir, and a violin solo by Mr. Carrodus. All these were well rendered, and listened to by an audience more appreciative than might have been anticipated after the stirring music of the week.

Much has been said respecting the performance of compositions written expressly for the Three Choir Festivals; but in advocating the production of new works it must not be forgotten that numerous compositions of the standard writers have remained for years almost unacknowledged. True it is that most of these are known to musicians; but the Festivals appeal to the general public, and if all the resources at command on these occasions can be employed upon the rendering of great works which, although old, come upon the majority of listeners with all the charm of novelty, not only will the Charity but the art be benefited. Those who were present at the last Worcester Festival must remember the effect created by Cherubini's Mass in D minor; and yet there were not wanting dissenters from the worship of this sublime music who thought that the time occupied in its performance would have been better devoted to "something new." At the present Festival Bach's Magnificat in D, Molique's "Abraham," and Goetz's 137th Psalm have been made known to hundreds who perhaps had never heard a note of any one of them before; and we venture to say that the first impression of these works will create in very many persons a longing for a more intimate acquaintance with their merits. We by no means assert that new aspirants for public favour are not to be granted a hearing at these Festivals, but we do most emphatically say that, in endeavouring to discover latent musical genius, we must not neglect to acknowledge that mature genius the many evidences of which lie silently around us.

Considering that the attendance at this Festival has been larger than that of 1879, and the collections have been smaller, it seems to us—as opposed to some statements which have appeared—that it is the love of charity, and not the love of art, which is on the decline. The sum received at the doors of the Cathedral—which alone benefits the Charity—amounts this year to £806 10s. 3d., which has been since increased by donations to £841 19s. 2d. The list of contributions will be kept open until the 15th inst.

Of the excellent singing of the choir we have already spoken; but an equal meed of praise is due to the orchestra, which, under the efficient leadership of Mr. Carrodus, was in every respect thoroughly satisfactory. Our record of the Festival would be incomplete without a kindly word to the Conductor, Mr. Langdon Colborne, whose earnest and painstaking efforts during the week showed that his heart was in his work; to Mr. Done, who presided at the organ; to Mr. C. H. Lloyd, whose pianoforte accompaniments to the secular Concerts were a conspicuous feature; and to those whose arduous official duties were, as usual, tempered with kindness and forethought to all around them.

FESTIVALS in aid of this Society were held in Sheffield and York on the 19th and 20th ult. At the former town a Special Choral Service took place in the Parish Church, which was attended by a crowded congregation, many having to be refused admittance. An exceptionally powerful choir, consisting of eighty voices selected from the Chapels Royal, Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's, Eton College, St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Manchester Cathedral, York Minster, Leeds and Sheffield Parish Churches, gave a rendering of the Service and Anthems such as has not been heard before in Sheffield. METZLER & CO., 35, 36, 37, & 38, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET, LONDON, W.

Gibbons in F, and the Anthems, "I saw the Lord" (Stainer), verses by Masters Fry and Roper, Messrs. Smith, Morgan, and De Lacy; "The Wilderness" (Wesley), solos by Masters Hodsdon and Parish (the former deserving special commendation), Messrs. Frost, Kenningham, Hanson, and Winn; "O sing unto the Lord" (Purcell), verses by Master Parkinson, Messrs. J. A. Birch, Gawthrop, and Kempton; and "Why rage fiercely" (Mendelssohn), verses by Masters Lewis and Wiltshire, Messrs. Darby, Richardson, Hunt, Hanson, Christian, and Charlesworth. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Fleming. Mr. George Riseley (Organist of Bristol Cathedral) presided at the organ and played a selection of organ music during the hour preceding the Service. In the evening a Concert was given in the Albert Hall, which was unfortunately (owing partly to the miserable weather and the apathy of the wealthier classes in the neighbourhood) very thinly attended. The members of the different choirs, however, gave the greatest satisfaction in the various glees and madrigals, which were the main feature of the concert; while the soloists, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Thomas (who sang in the absence of Mr. Bell), Mr. Kenningham, Mr. Kempton, and Mr. Morgan, were plentifully rewarded with encores. A special feature in the Concert was the admirable performance of Mr. George Riseley on the fine Cavallé-Coll organ, which, although the instrument was unfamiliar to the player, and not by any means in good condition, gave complete satisfaction.

On the following day the Choirs went to York Minster, where the Service of the previous morning was repeated, the Dean of York being the preacher. A very large congregation was assembled in the nave, where the Service was held, Mr. Riseley presiding at the special organ. The Choirs afterwards returned to Sheffield, and gave a second Concert in the Albert Hall. The audience was still meagre, though much larger than on the preceding evening, and the singing of the madrigals, glees, and part-songs was received with great favour. Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. T. W. Hanson, Mr. Kenningham, Mr. De Lacy, and Mr. Gawthrop, were heartily applauded in their several solos, many encores being awarded; and Mr. Riseley again roused the enthusiasm of his auditors by his exceptionally fine playing. A notable feature in the concerts was the singing of a trio by the choirboys of Westminster Abbey and the Chapels Royal, which was encored on each occasion. The part-songs and madrigals were ably conducted by Mr. Winn. We regret to hear that, owing principally to the causes mentioned, the Festivals have not been successful financially, and it is feared the Society may be at some loss through its visit to Yorkshire.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

BRISTOL has but one musical idea at present, namely, the approaching Festival, which promises to be at least equal, if not superior, in merit to any of the preceding ones. The rehearsals are proceeding diligently under Mr. Rootham, the chorus-master, and if zeal and energy on his part can secure success there is no question but that success will be secured. The choir numbers 385, and the tone is very pure and good, that of the sopranos especially so. The frequent and long-sustained B flat in the Credo of Beethoven's Mass in D would tax the resources of most sopranos, but the Bristol ladies (many of whom are amateurs) appear to take it with ease and enjoyment. The basses also display great richness and power. But special praise is invidious where all the parts are so good. I think it is not generally known that this is a voluntary choir, and the only voluntary Festival Choir in England. Mr. Mackenzie's new Cantata, "Jason," finds great favour with the chorus, and, notwithstanding the absorbing interest of the public in the "Redemption," I am much mistaken if this work does not prove a marked feature of the Festival. It is as yet too early to particularise, but I may remark that the choruses—notably those for male voices alone—are fresh and vigorous to an unusual degree; while the whole Cantata, if not absolutely a work of genius, is much above the average in force and originality. It has been decided that the proceeds of the Festival are to be given, as proposed, towards the foundation of a Bristol Scholarship in the new Royal College of Music, the collections at the morning performances being devoted to the Bristol Royal Infirmary and the General Hospital.

The Cathedral organ has been reopened this month, after being closed many weeks for improvement and repair. During the whole of that time the services—full choral, as usual—have been conducted without any instrument save a pitch-pipe, and those who appreciate unaccompanied part-singing have had the opportunity of hearing it in perfection.

Two performances of the "Creation" have been given this month: on the 11th ult. by the People's Concert Society—soloists, Miss Julia Jones, Mr. J. Gawthrop, and Mr. Hills—and on the 16th ult. by the Bristol Musical Association. In each instance 2,000 tickets were sold at three-pence, and there was scarcely standing room either in the body of the hall or in the shilling galleries. A series of Concerts is announced by each of these Societies to take place during the winter months.

THE CONGRESSO EUROPEO DI CANTO LITURGICO AT AREZZO.

AREZZO, Sept. 16, 1882.

THE Italian committee, headed by the Rev. Guerrini Amelli, of Milan, deserves much credit for having brought together, on the occasion of the festivities in honour of Guido in his native place, an important Congress in behalf of the Gregorian chant, including several first-rate authorities and accomplished practical workers in the cause from almost every part of Europe.

The Congress, held in the fine old basilica of the eleventh century, "Santa Maria della Pieve," opened rather tamely, owing to the unhappy resolution of the committee to inaugurate it with a kind of hymn, chorus, or cantata (however it may be termed), composed "expressly" by a third or fourth rate maestro—a mere accumulation of ultra-dramatic phrases scored in the wildest manner, and in which, as a matter of course, brass instruments, nay (horresco referens), the big drum, had the most prominent part. Beside this, another drawback, namely—an absolute lack of preliminary arrangement and a most discouraging confusion of persons as well as of things, led many, and the present writer among others, to fear that the Congress might altogether prove a failure.

But at the second morning's session, when, one after the other, the members of each nationality began speaking about the actual conditions of Gregorian chant in their respective countries, and pointing out their plans as to its amelioration, the tone of the Congress was at once raised.

The principal subjects discussed from September 11 to 15 were the following: 1. The actual condition of the Gregorian chant in the various countries; 2. Its original state and subsequent phases; 3. The means for preparing and promoting its amelioration; 4. The desirability of associating with it organ accompaniment. In the discussions which took place, it was stated that there existed a great difference between the several choral books actually used in the various countries of Europe, and that the edition recommended by the Sacred Congregation of Rite was in force in the greater part of Germany, in Holland, England, Ireland, and the United States of America. In Italy, too, various editions, mostly of little value, were employed, whilst in France a great variety of uses prevailed. Concerning the methods of execution, there was a unanimous opinion that the prevailing abuse of singing all the notes as if they were of equal value and martellato should be condemned, and that the execution of the notes according to the rhythm of language ought to be highly recommended. As to the theoretical works and grammars of Gregorian chants in general circulation, the paucity of the former and the unsatisfactory and incomplete condition of the latter, a very few only excepted, were regretted. The instrumental accompaniment to the Gregorian chant was also discussed, and a general opinion prevailed that Gregorian chant is better unaccompanied, but where an accompaniment is desirable it might be permitted, provided it be in the ancient tonalities.

As the result of the discussions alluded to, the following resolutions were passed almost unanimously by the Congress: (1) That the choral books used in the churches ought to be assimilated to the ancient Gregorian tradition; (2) That the study and illustration of ancient harmonies ought to be highly recommended and indefatigably promoted; (3) That the earnest practice of Gregorian chant ought to take an important place in the education of clergy; (4) That the Gregorian chant ought to be performed no longer martellato and with notes of equal value, but rhythmically according to the accents of the text, and in a truly artistic and musical manner, as pointed out by Guido d'Arezzo in his "Micrologo"; (5) And finally it was resolved that an international society, named the "Guido d'Arezzo," should be founded with the object of promoting the study of Gregorian archæology, and that a periodical advocating these views should be published.

There were about 90 members of the Congress, of whom 50 were Italian, 25 French, 5 German, 3 Austrian, 2 Spanish, 1 Belgian, 1 Hungarian, and 1 Irish. About 15 were laymen, the rest being priests and monks, among whom were 10 Benedictines (6 French and 4 Italian), 2 Franciscans, and 1 Carmelite.

The most prominent members were the justly celebrated French Benedictine, Dom Joseph Pothier, a learned scholar and a true poet and artist, and the Rev. Dr. Haberl, Capellmeister at Regensburg and editor of Palestrina's works (Breitkopf and Härtel). Great Britain was worthily represented by the Very Rev. Canon Dr. Connelly, of Dublin, who whenever he spoke, which was but seldom, did so in the most eloquent manner, and in fluent, correct, and even elegant Italian.

On the whole, the results of the Congress may be deemed full of earnest and truly faithful promises for the future, and Italy ought to be congratulated on having initiated it.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

ON Saturday, the 23rd ult., Professor Macfarren, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, delivered an address to the students, at the Institution, on the opening of the Session. After remarking that they were now entering upon the sixty-first anniversary of the Academy, the Professor said he hoped to enhance the interest of the students in their studies by offering them a glance at the history of the art. It was curious to note that, while savage nations had all some kind of music, with the civilised people of remote times it seemed to have been more a spirit of calculation than of impulse and impressionability. Music and astronomy were regarded as kindred, the different effects of music being assimilated to astronomical phenomena. For a long time the attention of musicians was spent in the calculation of mathematical niceties of intonation, and their ideas of what we called musical beauty seem to have been little in accord with the impression entertained by persons in times dating back already several hundred years from the present moment. There was a story related of Pythagoras, which had been repeated for hundreds of years and which, impossible as it was, had gained ready credence—the story that he observed the difference of the fifth and fourth and measured their ratios in consequence of hearing smiths at an anvil beating with hammers of different weights, and thus producing the different sounds. He (Professor Macfarren), however, thought it was within the range of every one's observation that the sound produced from any resonant body, whether it were a string or a plate, depended on the intonation of that string or plate, and not the weight or the lightness of the instrument used to play on it. Curiously, not only had this story been repeated from classic to mediæval and thence to our own times, but it had even been plagiarised in a story of more recent origin—that Handel, while living at Stanmore, listened to smiths working at their anvil, and from the effects of their different productions of notes by the weight of their hammers observed a melody upon which he constructed a variation and named it "The Harmonious Blacksmith." Handel, however, did nothing of the kind, and could have done nothing of the kind. It was remarkable that we could not determine where the ancient Greek system of music ceased and where modern music began. Doubtless there must have been an overlapping of one and the other, and both must, to some extent, have been practised at once, as was the case with the heathen religion and the Christian. In many particulars music advanced in England earlier than it did in other regions. At the end of the twelfth century a Fleming who founded the first musical academy that had been known—the Conservatoire in Naples, writing of the new art of counterpoint, said, "This is practised in England with greater success than elsewhere." Again, in the early days of the thirteenth century, they found counterpointed compositions in this country of an elaborate nature, and there were also persons to practise them when other countries had not yet so far advanced. It seemed to have been at the beginning of the sixteenth century, from 1500 onwards, that musical erudition was turned to secular subjects. Hitherto music had been practised among the people without tuition or known principles. All learning on this, as on other subjects, had been confined to the Church, and as Italy was the centre of the Christian Church of the period, so music was drawn towards Rome. At the beginning of the sixteenth century musical scholarship began to be applied to secular uses, and in the madrigals, which were then first written, exemplifications were found of the same rules which previously had been applied only to sacred works. Much was credited to the Roman school of musical composition, but it was very remarkable that this Roman school rose from the tuition given by Flemings in Rome to persons who went thither for the sake of their instruction. What might be said to have been the means of converting the ancient into the modern of music, or changing the strict of the former use into the free of the present practice, was the first employment of the chord of the dominant seventh. The first person to whom as yet any trace could be made as to this chord, in the free manner in which it was now employed, was a Fleming, Jean Mouton, who, he believed, was born in 1475. It had been customary to ascribe the invention to Claudio Monteverde, who lived 100 years later. It was at the verge of 1600 that some noblemen in Florence surmised that the music, the extraordinary effects of which were described by persons who had witnessed them in Greece, and whose writings had then become patent to all modern Europe, must be capable of reproduction. Opera had its first home in Italy, was introduced into France by an Italian, and in course of time came the employment of opera in England. We were too much aware of the general notion that this country was incapable of musical excellence; that we could pay for, and perhaps enjoy, music, or affect to do so, but that we could not perform or produce it. There was, however, nothing in our soil, or our climate, or our physical construction which prevented Englishmen from rising to the highest in the attainment of this art. After observing that, in opposition to many, he held that science and art supplemented each other, he commented on the relation of these two pursuits to music, and urged them to think of the power the musician had to give to poetry a higher meaning than the words seemed to convey, and still further, apart from all words, to produce a deeper effect on the feelings, by instrumental music, than written words could ever express. Then they would have a just right to believe in the high vocation they followed.

A HOLIDAY term of study for student-teachers has just been concluded at the Tonic Sol-fa College. It was attended by young musicians from England and Scotland, nearly all of whom are acting teachers, and desirous of improving themselves. The lectures and model lessons were directed especially to the teaching of music in day schools, congregations, church choirs, popular choral unions, &c. A class of children attended each day and received lessons in the presence of the students. The session lasted a month, and the teachers included Messrs. J. S. Curwen, A.R.A.M.; J. Proudman; W. G. McNaught, A.R.A.M.; L. C. Venables, Conductor of the South London Choral Association; J. Evans, Music Instructor to the London School Board; W. C. Harris; F. T. Harris, B.Sc.; A. Kestin (Elocution); and G. Oakey, Mus. Bac. During last year the College granted 11,881 musical certificates, or 644 more than in the previous year.

THE second Oswestry Triennial Festival was held in the Powis Hall on the 22nd ult., under the direction of the founder, Mr. Henry Leslie. The attendance was better than was at first anticipated, a considerable number of county families being present. Mr. Leslie was warmly greeted on taking his place at the conductor's desk; and the National Anthem having been sung to an arrangement by Mr. Leslie, the performance of Haydn's "Creation" (first and second parts) commenced. The choir was exceedingly good, the voices young and fresh, and the tone evenly balanced; the orchestra (although perhaps occasionally too loud) being on the whole highly satisfactory. Miss Anna Williams created a marked impression in the air "On mighty pens," Mr. Maas fully sustained his reputation by his rendering of "In native worth," and Mr. Henry Blower gave with much effect the music allotted to him. In the miscellaneous portion of the programme must be mentioned Sterndale Bennett's part-song "Come live with me," charmingly sung by the Festival Choir, Boccherini's Minuet for stringed instruments (encored), Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante in B minor, the pianoforte part well played by Mr. Percy Mull, and several vocal selections by Miss Williams, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Blower. In the evening a concert was given with an excellent miscellaneous selection, including several pieces sung by the Oswestry Festival Choir. On the following morning the Festival of Village Choirs took place, the adjudicator being Mr. John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia). The subject was the Trio "Lift thine eyes," from "Elijah." Four choirs competed. The first prize was awarded to the Bronygarth Choir, conducted by Mr. Hughes, and the second prize to the Guildsfield Choir, conducted by Mr. R. E. Jones. Various prizes, awarded for sight-singing and knowledge of elementary music, were presented by Mrs. Dumville Lees. The examination was conducted by Mr. Leslie, who described the competition as exceedingly good. The principal prize was awarded to Emily Morris, of Llansilin, who is only nine years of age. The chief event of the day, the competition for the Banner of Honour and a silver medal for the conductor, followed. The banner, to be held from year to year by the choir gaining the prize, was the gift and work of Mrs. Leslie, and is a very handsome one. The subject for competition was Mr. Leslie's part-song, "When the shades of eve descending." Seven village choirs took part, and the banner was given to the Lodge and Bronygarth choir, containing forty-one voices. The conductor of the successful choir (Mr. H. M. Hughes, of Oswestry) was invested amid loud cheers by Lady Harlech. At three o'clock a performance of the combined choirs and the Oswestry Volunteer Band was given. The attendance was larger than in the morning, but the hall was not filled. The soloists were Miss Wakefield, Mr. John Thomas, and Mr. Percy Mull, Principal of the School of Music. Mr. Henry Leslie again conducted. The Festival, from a musical point of view, was exceedingly satisfactory; but it is feared it will result in rather heavy pecuniary loss. The expenses amount to £400.

THE Jubilee Fête of the National Temperance League at the Crystal Palace on the 5th ult. calls for notice on account of the two Concerts by the Children's and Adults' Choir. Not so very long ago a Temperance Concert was looked upon as a harmless, although not very artistic entertainment; but progress in this as in all other matters has asserted its influence, and in intrusting its music to the hands of a painstaking and intelligent Conductor, the Temperance League has ensured a result gratifying to musical taste, while by encouraging the love of a high class of music, it has secured to its cause a most powerful ally. Three years ago, at the last Temperance Festival at the Crystal Palace, a very marked improvement in the music rendered by a choir of some 3,000, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Birch, was observable; and at the concerts under notice a still further advancement was made. The Children's Choir, numbering nearly 5,000, gave with much effect, amongst other compositions, "A Wife's Song" (Barnby), "Fairy Song" (Zimmermann), "The cuckoo sings" (Macfarren), "Mark the merry elves," and several pieces of a distinctly temperance character. In the afternoon programme by the Adult Choir upwards of 4,000 were gathered together, having been collected from seventy provincial towns, including Sheffield, Leeds, Bristol, Gloucester, and Derby. This vast choir sang to the great satisfaction of the audience, making a very marked impression in "The Heavens are telling," "Then round about the starry throne," Martini's "Tickling Trio," and a setting of Longfellow's "Beware," by Mr. J. A. Birch, with a distant echo rendered by a small section of the choir, which achieved a distinct success. Mr. C. S. Jekyll presided at the organ, and a special word of commendation is due to the Conductor, Mr. J. A. Birch, upon whom the superintendence of rehearsals at so many distant parts of the country must have entailed an infinite amount of labour.

THE following extract from a sermon preached in Worcester Cathedral, on the 10th ult., in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund by the Rev. E. V. Hall (himself known as a worthy contributor to the store of service music) affords one more proof of the growing sympathy of the clergy with the cause of sacred musical art: "The Choir Benevolent Fund is an excellent society which has been set on foot 'to secure a provision for aged and invalid members of Cathedral choirs (who join the society), to guarantee a fixed sum to their widows and children, and give their widows and children temporary assistance in the time of need.' In the course of last year two members of the society were called away by death, and in each case the sum of £100 was paid to their representatives, and a grant of ten guineas each has been made to the widows of former members. My brethren, we who love sacred music; we who delight in the services of our glorious Cathedrals; we who feel our whole souls lifted up within us when the full-voiced choir and the pealing organ wake the echoes of these venerable buildings; we who love the dear old strains of the great English composers, the glorious anthems of Gibbons and of Purcell, of Croft and of Greene—yes, of men nearer our own day—of Attwood and of Crotch, of Wesley, and Sterndale Bennett, and of others who are yet living; we who feel how much we owe to these men—let us not forget how much also we owe to those who interpret, to those who perform those grand and inspiring songs of praise. A well-sung anthem is sometimes quite as touching, quite as effective as an eloquent sermon. And our Cathedral choirs have done, and are doing, a great service to us all, in worthily interpreting the noble compositions of our great English composers. Our Cathedral choirs, subject as they are to many special dangers and temptations—temptations to irreverence, indifference, and deadness to holy things—are yet labouring, day by day and week by week, for the spiritual profit and edification of all who worship within the Cathedral."

THE pressure upon our space in the present number of THE MUSICAL TIMES prevents our doing more than make a passing allusion to the Paper read at the recent meeting of the Social Science Congress at Nottingham by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, Mus. Bac., Organist of Christ Church, Oxford. The Paper treats of the results to be anticipated from the proposed new College of Music, its influence upon the musical public of this country, and the probability of its leading to the re-establishment of a National School of Composition. Of course its influence upon the musical public will depend greatly upon the manner in which the new Institution is managed, and the staff of professors employed as teachers. But we scarcely think that Mr. Lloyd makes out his case that great composers do not arise because the means of "teaching them how to compose" do not exist. Composers may be educated, but not created, by Colleges. The Paper, however, is evidently the result of earnest thought; and we recommend its perusal to the many who are interested in the subject.

*THE members of the St. George's Glee Union held their usual monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 1st ult. The programme consisted of a well-chosen miscellaneous selection. The vocal soloists were Miss Woodhatch, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, Mr. J. W. Knott, and Mr. Adolphus Phillips. Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinkeed presided at the pianoforte. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

MR. W. KUHE'S Festival at Brighton commences on Tuesday evening, November 7, with Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," to be followed by Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, both works being conducted by their respective composers. The vocalists will be Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Messrs. E. Lloyd and F. King. On Wednesday morning a classical Concert will be given, including Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Overtures to Mozart's "Flauto Magico" and Schumann's "Genevieve," Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde," a selection from Wagner's "Meistersinger," Heller's Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor (Miss Kuhe), a violin solo by Mr. Carrodus, and Berlioz' Marche Hongroise ("Faust"). Miss Ella Lemmens will be the vocalist, and Mr. A. Manns will conduct the entire Concert. Thursday evening will be devoted to Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Madame Albani, Miss Robertson, Miss E. Dones, Madame Trebelli, Messrs. E. Lloyd, J. Robertson, Lucas Williams, and Santley as principal vocalists; Conductor, Mr. Kuhe. Friday evening's Concert will be of a popular character, the programme including Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," Weber's Concertstück (Mr. Kuhe), and a violin solo by Mr. Carrodus, the vocalists being Madame Albani, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The Festival will conclude on Saturday morning with (for the first time in Brighton) Gounod's new Oratorio, "The Redemption": solo vocalists, Madame Albani, Miss Santley, Madame Trebelli, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Lucas Williams, and Mr. Santley; Conductor, Mr. Randegger. The orchestra and Mr. Kuhe's Festival Choir will number 250 performers.

IN THE MUSICAL TIMES of December, 1880, we gave an account of the formation of the Scottish Musical Society, and we now find that at a meeting of the Society held in Glasgow on the 6th ult.—Mr. James Campbell, of Tilliechewan, Chairman of the Glasgow Committee, presiding—it was unanimously resolved to appoint Mr. Frederic H. Cowen Principal of the Scottish Academy of Music which the Society is taking steps to establish. The many compositions of Mr. Cowen—amongst which may be named the Scandinavian Symphony, the sacred Cantata "St. Ursula," written for and performed at the last Norwich Festival; the secular Cantata "The Rose Maiden," the Opera of "Pauline," and the Suite de Ballet, "The Language of the Flowers," given with such signal success at the late Birmingham Festival—sufficiently attest the justice of this appointment, and we sincerely congratulate the authorities of the Academy upon the choice they have made. The teaching terms will extend over about two-thirds of the year, and the Principal will have the co-operation of assistant masters, reserving for himself the more advanced part of the tuition. Diplomas will be granted to those who have successfully prosecuted the prescribed course of academical study. Mr. Cowen will have to reside for eight months of the year in Edinburgh, where the projected Academy is to have its headquarters.

THE annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service took place in Eccleston Square Church, Belgrave Road, on Wednesday, the 20th ult., in the presence of a large congregation. The church was decorated with fruit, flowers, &c., which were afterwards distributed amongst the neighbouring hospitals. An appropriate address was delivered by the pastor, the Rev. J. Hiles Hitchens, D.D. The musical arrangements were under the direction of the newly appointed Organist, Mr. Rowland Briant, R.A.M. The choir (augmented on this occasion) rendered in a highly creditable manner several harvest anthems, including "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), "Thanks be to God" (Mendelssohn), "I will magnify Thee" (Goss), and "Blessed be the name of the Lord" (Gadsby).

THE Preston Guild, a celebration which is held every twenty years, occurred during last month. The musical arrangements included the opening of a magnificent organ (presented to the town by Mr. J. Dewhurst), the organist being Dr. Bridge, and a series of Concerts under the direction of Mr. Hallé. The organ gave general satisfaction, and Dr. Bridge was requested to give a second Recital during the following week, at which upwards of 4,000 persons were present. Recitals have also been given by Dr. Spark and Mr. Pyne.

OUR article on the Birmingham Festival being strictly confined to the musical portion of the attractions, we had no opportunity of mentioning one important element in the appearance and comfort of the Town Hall during the evening performances. On all previous occasions the Hall had been lighted with gas; but a short time before the Festival Messrs. R. W. Winfield and Co., of Cambridge Street Works, Birmingham (who have allied themselves with Messrs. R. E. Crompton and Co., electric light engineers, of London and Chelmsford), offered at their own cost to light the Hall by means of the electric light. This offer was readily accepted, and the result was in the highest degree successful. Of the quality of the atmosphere of the hall when illuminated by the incandescent lamp it may be truly said that as there was absolutely no contamination whatever from the lamp, the light of which burns in vacuo, the room was rid of vitiated air equivalent to the respirations of 3,600 additional persons; another advantage being that the temperature was not unduly raised so as to alter perceptibly the pitch of the musical instruments.

WE regret to announce that Mr. F. Corder, whose services as Conductor of the Brighton Aquarium Concerts are too well known to need comment, has ceased his connection with the institution, in consequence of the new Board of Directors having decided to abandon high-class Concerts altogether, and to substitute what are termed "variety" entertainments. No person has of course been engaged as Conductor since Mr. Corder resigned his position, the leader of the band, Herr J. Greebe, being able to do what little conducting may be required. The lovers of classical music in Brighton will, however, be glad to hear that, the Directors having granted the use of the Conservatory to Mr. Corder for a farewell benefit, he intends giving two Concerts on the afternoon and evening of the 7th inst., the first of which will be orchestral, and include Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture, Handel's "Largo," and Mr. Corder's Overture, "Ossian," and the second of a popular character, the programme consisting of several favourite vocal and instrumental pieces.

THE prospectus of the Stratford Musical Festival, which is to be held in the spring, has just been issued. It is practically a series of public musical competitions, in which Messrs. Brinley Richards, J. F. H. Read, J.P., and W. G. McNaught, A.R.A.M., are the judges. The competitions are for choral societies, church choirs, men's and mixed quartets, soprano, contralto, tenor, bass and boys' solo-singing; pianoforte-playing for children and adults, violin performance, sight-singing for choirs and soloists, and musical composition. Competitors must be bona fide residents of Stratford, West Ham, Wanstead, Leytonstone, Woodford, Forest Gate, or Plaistow. The profits are to be given to the West Ham Dispensary, and the competitions are to be held in the Stratford Town Hall. Mr. J. S. Curwen, A.R.A.M., is the originator and honorary director of the scheme, which, it is expected, will act as a stimulus to the musical energies of the district during the coming winter. The prize-money, £40, has already been subscribed by leading residents of the district.

THE prospectus of the Belfast Philharmonic Society announces the opening Concert of the ninth season for the 17th of November, in the Ulster Hall; principal vocalists, Miss Georgina Burns, Miss Josephine Yorke, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Leslie Crotty. At the second Concert, on the 15th of December, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be performed, the solo vocalists being Miss Adelaide Mullen (her first appearance in Belfast), Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Frederic King. For the remaining Concerts the following works are in contemplation: Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, Schubert's "Miriam's Song," and Gade's "Psyche"; negotiations being pending with Madame Trebelli, Miss De Fonblanque, Mr. F. Boyle, Signor Ghiberti, M. Ovide Musin (solo violin), and Mr. Ganz (Conductor). The orchestra will be on the usual scale of efficiency, under the leadership of Mr. Henry Cohen, and the valuable services of Herr Adolf Beyschlag will be retained as Conductor. The hon. organist is John Shillington, Esq., and Herr Louis Werner, jun., is accompanist.

MR. J. S. WATSON has arranged his series of Subscription Concerts at Southport, to be given during the winter season, in Cambridge Hall. As usual, Mr. Watson gives a distinctive character to each of the four Concerts, but this year the ballad element will predominate. The principal artists are Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Madame Patey, Miss Anna Williams, Signor Runcio, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Maybrick, and Signor Foli; M. Buziau (solo violinist), the Chevalier de Kontski and Mr. Sidney Naylor (solo pianists), and Signor Bisaccia (accompanist), for the first and second Concerts, and for the third (the programme of which will be mainly composed of excerpts from operas) an engagement has been effected with Madame Trebelli and party, and M. Musin (violinist). The series will conclude with a Concert at which Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Madame Edith Wynne will appear.

MR. W. A. BARRETT, who has been unremitting in his endeavours to keep alive the memory of Balfé in the country to which his best works were contributed, has, in searching through his manuscripts, found three sacred movements—a Gratius agimus in B flat, a Sanctus in B flat minor, and an Agnus Dei in F major, and these he will edit with a view to having them incorporated in the service at the unveiling of the medallion of the composer in Westminster Abbey. Dr. Bridge, Organist of the Abbey, has given ready help to the cause; and on the 20th inst. a representative gathering will prove to Mr. Barrett that his labour has not been in vain. We may also mention that, most opportunely with this event, will be issued an essay by Mr. Barrett, entitled "Balfé: His Life and Work," which will be published by Messrs. Remington.

WE have much pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to a letter in our present number from Mr. Benson, Manager of the Brinsmead Concert Company, announcing the formation of a concert company for periodical tours, which may be joined by either vocalists or instrumentalists who can prove the possession of sufficient talent for such a position. We understand that it is intended to establish a company for a tour during the whole of next year, commencing early in January, and that probably there may be two or three companies travelling during certain periods. To many talented young artists this may prove an excellent means of earning a name before the public; and Messrs. Brinsmead deserve much credit for organising and carrying out so laudable an enterprise.

THE many subscribers to the Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead, are earnestly requested to give their votes and interest in favour of Annie Jane Phillips, aged six years, whose sad case has so enlisted the sympathies of Mrs. W. H. Monk since, more than two years ago, the family was discovered only just in time to save the lives of the little children, who were perishing for want of food and warmth. The kindly efforts of Mrs. Monk will be rendered futile unless the election of the child in November next can be secured, as this will be the fifth and last application; and we sincerely hope, therefore, that all who have the power will aid Mrs. Monk in the good work she has so generously undertaken.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association has issued its prospectus for the coming season, which promises to be of unusual interest. Foremost among the novelties announced is the whole of Mozart's music to "King Thamos," which has never yet been performed in England. The programmes will also include Cherubini's Second Mass, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," Gade's "Christmas Eve," Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and a selection from the works of living English composers. Mr. Ebenezer Prout will continue to hold the post of Conductor, and the Concerts will, as usual, be given in the Shoreditch Town Hall.

THE Brixton Choral and Orchestral Society announces four Concerts for the forthcoming season, the works to be given being Handel's "Jephtha," Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles," and Prout's new Cantata, "Alfred." The performances will take place in Gresham Hall (Angell Town Institution), and will be conducted, as before, by Mr. William Lemare.

THE Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association will take place on Thursday evening, November 2, at St. Paul's Cathedral, commencing at 7.30. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis will be the setting in D major by Mr. Berthold Tours, composed for the Association in 1879; and the Anthem Henry Smart's "Sing to the Lord," also written for and first sung by the Association some six years since. The Te Deum which gained the prize offered in June last, the composition, it may be remembered, of Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast, will also be sung, and, with the exception of the hymn-tunes, will form the only novelty of the Festival.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society, now entering on its eleventh year, and numbering more than eighty members, announces the first rehearsal of the season, 1882-83, for Tuesday, the 3rd inst., in the St. George's Church Room, Carleton Road, Tufnell Park. Two invitation Concerts will be given, the first in the week before Christmas, and the second about Easter, the works to be performed being Gade's Cantata "Psyche," Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm ("As the hart pants"), and Gounod's Oratorio "The Redemption." Mr. W. Henry Thomas, to whose indefatigable exertions the Society owes its present state of efficiency, retains his post as Conductor.

THE Report of the Rochdale Choral Society announces that the receipts of the past year have fallen below the expenditure; yet there can be little doubt that with renewed exertion on the part of the members, and of those interested in the progress of the Association, a balance on the right side may be shown at the end of next season. Two Concerts have been given, the programmes of which included Mozart's Twelfth Mass and "Acis and Galatea"; and an excellent selection of music is to be put in rehearsal for the approaching session.

A SERIES of monthly Organ Recitals, by various organists, is to be given at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, on the first Thursday in each month, upon the fine organ lately rebuilt by Messrs. Hele and Son, of Plymouth, of which we recently spoke in these columns. The first Recital took place on Thursday, the 7th ult., the performer being Mr. H. J. B. Dart, the Organist of the church; the second is to be given by Mr. F. Cambridge, of the Parish Church, Croydon, on Thursday evening next, the 5th inst., commencing at half-past eight.

THE Hampstead Choral Society, under the able direction of its founder, Mr. Willem Coenen, announces the first rehearsal for the coming season at the new Vestry Hall on Monday evening, the 2nd inst. Two Concerts will be given, the first on January 29, and the second on May 28, 1883, the works named for performance being "St. Paul" and "As the hart pants" (Mendelssohn), and "Autumn," from Haydn's "Seasons," to which, it is said, others will be added. The services of Miss Amy Gill are retained as accompanist.

A TRIAL of tenor voices, to fill a vacancy in the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral caused by the resignation, through ill-health, of Mr. Thornton, took place on Tuesday, the 19th ult. More than fifty candidates were originally forthcoming, and this number having been gradually reduced, choice was, we learn, finally made of Mr. Probert, at present one of the lay-clerks of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, whom we congratulate on his success.

THE Royal Victoria Coffee Hall has now reopened for the season. It is announced that Mondays and Thursdays will be devoted to operatic and ballad Concerts; Tuesdays and Saturdays to variety entertainments of a high class; Wednesdays to public rehearsals of the new Victoria Choir, numbering already 300 members; and Fridays to temperance entertainments and popular lectures.

THE Queen has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of M. Gounod's new Oratorio, "The Redemption," her Majesty having already allowed the work to be dedicated to her. This copy was magnificently bound, and printed on large hand-made paper direct from the engraved plates, forming an example of édition de luxe that has seldom, if ever, been seen of a musical work.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society announces three Concerts during the coming season. At the first of the series Gade's new Cantata, "Psyche," will be performed. There will be a full band and chorus of about 200, and Dr. Bridge will conduct as usual. The new Hall seats upwards of 1,000, and is one of the best concert-rooms in the suburbs of London.

A HARVEST FESTIVAL was celebrated at St. Michael's Church, Wood Green, on Sunday, the 24th ult., when full choral services were held morning and evening. Two anthems were sung, "O give thanks unto the Lord" (Sydenham) and "Blessed be Thou, Lord God" (Kent), in a very efficient manner by the choir. In the morning Tuckerman's Te Deum was sung, and in the evening Bunnett's Cantata and Deus. Collections were made in aid of the choir fund.

MR. JULIAN ADAMS's Annual Concert at Eastbourne, on the 9th ult., resulted in a great success, numbers being unable to gain admission. The orchestra was augmented, and the programme well selected, including Gounod's new "Wedding March," Wagner's Overtures to "Rienzi," "Tannhäuser," &c.

WE understand that somewhat extensive structural alterations have become necessary in St. James's Hall. These will include the construction of a more commodious entrance and a wider gallery staircase, and in consequence the small hall will be closed for a period of three months.

THE Cheltenham Musical Society, under the conductorship of Dr. A. E. Dyer, commences the practice meetings for the season with Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" and Bach's Magnificat in D, these works in all probability forming the programme of the first Subscription Concert.

DR. BRIDGE gave the opening Recital for the season at the Bow and Bromley Institute on Saturday, the 23rd ult., with much success. We understand several of our leading organists have already promised their assistance during the season.

MR. WILLIAM LEMARE announces the fifth series of Organ Recitals, to be given in Gresham Hall, Brixton, on Saturday evenings, from the 30th ult. to Christmas. Mr. E. H. Turpin was to play at the first Recital.

REVIEWS.

Die Musik-Aesthetik, in ihrer Entwicklung von Kant bis auf die Gegenwart. Von H. Ehrlich.
[Leipzig, 1882: F. E. C. Leuckart.]

THE æsthetics of music, i.e., the contemplation of the relationship of the art to the idea of beauty, may be said to have been hitherto cultivated almost exclusively in Germany. The word "æsthetics" itself is of comparatively recent introduction into English phraseology, and as applied to music it is, we venture to assert, as yet but vaguely understood by the average amateur in this country. The few English thinkers of modern days who have deemed it worth their while to contribute at all to this most interesting branch of general art-philosophy have done so almost exclusively upon physiological grounds, and it remains yet to be seen whether the boldly speculative theories set up by Spencer and Darwin as to the origin of music will have a practical bearing upon the elucidation of the subject. As music, in the modern sense (for the art-cultivation amongst the ancients will ever remain a myth to us), is the youngest of all arts, it is not surprising that the consideration of its productions from a philosophical, i.e., æsthetic, point of view should be still in its infancy. Musical history in all its branches, has, however, been making rapid strides of late years, and musical æsthetics will undoubtedly follow in its wake, and the question be eventually set at rest which at present is pending between the idealist and the materialist, the one looking upon the art as being connected with the highest ideals of life, and capable of expressing the loftiest emotions, the other denying altogether both that connection and capacity of expression, and tracing back the very origin of music to a mere animal sensation of pleasure.

In the volume before us the attempt is made, so far as we are aware for the first time, to survey historically the progress hitherto made in the æsthetic treatment of music, commencing with the period standing under the immediate influence of the metaphysical and critical writings of Kant and Lessing, and tracing its development throughout the nineteenth century to the present day. It is only during the last fifty years, however, when musicians themselves began to think and write philosophically upon their art, that the subject has attained a real artistic significance, and hence to this period by far the greater portion of the volume is devoted. "The history of the development of musical æsthetics," the author (Professor Ehrlich, of Berlin) truly remarks, "presents the curious fact that when music had reached the summit of its ethical importance, at the time of Bach and Handel, when it could be looked upon as essentially the art of religion, it was scarcely subjected at all to æsthetic considerations, and that even the highly cultivated Lessing was either unacquainted with or disregarded the sublime works of the two great Protestant masters just named. While, on the other hand, with the development of instrumental music and the popularisation of opera—which had been so long merely the amusement of courts—a very considerable revolution began to make itself felt in the art-estimation of music, producing the sudden transition from a somewhat contemptuous regard to enthusiastic admiration and praise." The fact, as here stated, can, however, scarcely be looked upon as altogether phenomenal. The proverbial "le musicien lit peu" had its full application at the time of Bach and Handel, and even of Mozart and Haydn, and, as we have already indicated, it is only since the beginning of the present century that musicians began, not only to read, but to advance speculative opinions as to the raison d'être and the ultimate objects of their art. It is this fact, indeed, which, aided by the speculations of the philosopher per se, and the researches of the physiologist, has chiefly brought about the revolution in modern art-consciousness of which our author speaks. To this direct influence, exercised by the modern musician himself upon the development of the æsthetics of his art, scarcely sufficient prominence has been given in Professor Ehrlich's work. The critical and art-reflective writings of C. M. von Weber, for instance, are not even alluded to here, whereas they undoubtedly have their place in the history of the subject, and none the less because they were amongst the earliest efforts on the part of a musician in this direction. To Richard Wagner—by far the most brilliant and constructive of the race of modern philosophising musicians—an entire chapter has, very properly, been devoted, and his relations to the metaphysical systems of Schopenhauer are subjected to a rigorous examination on the part of the author—himself by no means a thorough-going admirer of the Bayreuth reformer. Although the time has scarcely yet arrived when it will be possible to form an objective historical opinion as to the merits of the Wagner-Schopenhauer philosophy, as applied to music, it must be remembered that Wagner's most important contributions to musical æsthetics appeared some thirty years ago, and that since then he has been almost exclusively occupied in the capacity of creative artist. "Of the extraordinary impression created by the first appearance of Wagner's pamphlets," says the author, "it is hardly possible to form an idea at the present day, for since then his musical productions have become known and have commanded general attention. In the year 1850, however, 'Tannhäuser' was scarcely yet known, and had been performed only in smaller towns. . . . At the beginning of the second half of our century, it was as an author only that Wagner produced an undoubtedly great sensation." Much interesting detail is here added concerning the earlier stages of the Wagner controversy, due prominence being given to the merits of Hanslick's work, "Vom Musikalisch-Schönen," one of the most important contributions to the anti-Wagnerian literature of the period in question, and a work, moreover, of lasting value. We have, however, said enough to indicate the general tendency of this "history in outline" of musical art-consciousness in Germany during the last hundred years, to which an additional chapter is appended treating of the development of musical æsthetics in England (Spencer, Sully, Darwin), France (Beauquier, Lussy, Laprade), and Italy. Although the author is at no particular pains to conceal his personal artistic standpoint, his historical judgment has been exercised with as much impartiality as is possible in the present still fermenting condition of diametrically opposed art principles. In giving a lucid and fairly complete résumé of this youngest branch of the most recently developed of all arts, Professor Ehrlich has not only taken an important first step towards a more elaborate history of the subject, but has succeeded at the same time in producing a very readable book for musician as well as amateur.

School Canons. Selected, Reset, and Arranged in order of Difficulty. By J. Powell Metcalfe, M.A. With accompaniments by Philip Armes, Mus. Doc., Oxon.
[William Clowes and Sons].

IN the Preface to this collection of school pieces we are told that a practical difficulty in teaching little children in classes to read from printed music has been hitherto the want of simple compositions in which the notes are of sufficient size to enable them to keep the eye fixed on the symbol, while the sound represented by that symbol is in the ear. One style, and one only, the author says, is sufficiently short and concise to be contained in a broad sheet of five lines—the canon in unison: “the little musical epigram, that as long as music has been art, has been the special delight of the true musician, and which yet at the same time experience proves to be the best of all styles for the instruction of children in choral music.” In consonance with this idea, a number of little Canons are here given, to which a simple accompaniment has been written by Dr. Armes, and the teacher is directed to let each piece be sung through as a simple melody, and, when the children are enabled to sustain the air by themselves, to gradually introduce them to the harmony of the canon by commencing to sing when the class reaches the point figured 2, at first softly, and then becoming more pronounced as he finds the young vocalists can hold their own against his part. Two of these Canons are printed in gigantic notes upon a large sheet of paper, as a specimen of the manner in which Mr. Metcalfe desires that all these compositions should be set before the class. “The strictest care,” it is said, “must be taken that, whether the Canon be in learning or learnt, the singers keep their eyes upon the notes as they sing them. It is by thus training the eye to associate sound and symbol that reading is to be taught.” We heartily agree with all these observations; and, so far as we can judge, the spirit of them would be effectually carried out by the use of the music supplied, and in the method suggested.

Liberty. A Song of Ancient Rome. (Suggested by Macaulay's “Virginia.”) The words written by Somerville Gibney. Composed by Eaton Fanning.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE title of this composition by no means describes its character; and we think it would be good, therefore, for those who may casually see it advertised to be told that it is a dramatic vocal work, with soprano solo and chorus. Opening with a symphony in F minor, the basses commence the voice part with an impassioned recitative in the same key, leading to a placid and melodious soprano solo in the relative major, accompanied in the course of its progress by a chorus for first and second sopranos and altos. After a spirited call to arms by the basses, they are united with the tenors in chorus, the bold theme in F major, to the words “No more shall the tyrants reign” colouring with excellent effect the defiant verses to which it is wedded. The full four-part chorus which follows—occasionally interrupted by interjectional phrases for portions only of the choir—is extremely good, and proves not only that the composer has fully thought out his subject, but that he is thoroughly capable of grappling with a theme which demands exceptional powers to achieve a successful result. We can judge but partially of the accompaniments to this work, for we find that it is scored for the orchestra, and can imagine that with such aid its dramatic effect would be materially enhanced. As it stands, however, in the copy before us, it is unquestionably a composition which reflects much credit upon Mr. Fanning, who is evidently doing his utmost to sustain the reputation he has acquired by his “Song of the Vikings.”

The Initials. Fantasia-Sonata. By W. H. Holmes.
[Forsyth Brothers.]

THE title of this piece is suggested by the initials of Professor Macfarren's Christian names, and the Sonata commences accordingly with the notes G, A, each occupying an entire bar. Although the “Initials” are thus impressed upon the ear, they only occur at the opening and in the closing bars of the composition—effectively, however, and with sufficient significance to justify its name and to prevent its being spoken of merely as the “Sonata in B flat minor.” There is much good writing in the first movement, the second subject of which, in the relative major, is extremely melodious, and passes gracefully into B flat major, in which key the movement ends. The “Allegretto” which follows, in F sharp major, has a charming principal theme and is treated throughout with appropriate simplicity. There can be little doubt that this will be the favourite movement of the piece, as, apart from the attractiveness of the subjects, the passages make no great demands upon the executive powers of the performer. The final movement, “Allegretto Scherzando,” is musically, we think, the best of the three, but this by no means proves that it will be the most popular. The light and playful theme with which it opens derives much of its effect from the chords against the natural accent in the left hand, a figure which is kept up throughout. The appearance of fragments of this subject in various keys, and its return, after a pause upon the dominant harmony, in the original key—B flat minor—are points which cannot but interest the attentive listener. The Sonata—which has been performed by the composer at a Concert of the Musical Artists' Society—is appropriately dedicated to Madame Natalia Macfarren.

The Influence of the Organ in History. Inaugural Lecture of the Department of the Organ in the College of Music of Boston University. By Dudley Buck. [W. Reeves.]

THE author of this lecture is Professor of the Organ in the College at which the address was delivered; and, although we cannot say that it contains anything not already well known, the materials are exceedingly well put together. Apart from the clear manner in which the origin and gradual development of the instrument are shown, we have some very true observations upon its effect on the progress of music. “In spite of the disrepute,” the writer says, “into which the whole monastic system fell, there is no question but that the monks and friars were the great conservators and preservers of all the fine arts, and even mechanics, during the troubled times of the Middle Ages. As the prejudice against the employment of instrumental music in the Church services began to disappear, nothing was more natural than that the monks, having both the leisure and pecuniary means, and containing among their number the best-educated men of the day, should turn their attention to organ-building, animated by the same spirit which led them to decorate and ornament their churches and monasteries.” We may not, perhaps, agree with our author that the organ dictated counterpoint, but the regal sway of the “king of instruments” had doubtless a very powerful influence upon ears previously untuned to harmony. In conclusion, we must congratulate the Musical College of Boston upon having a professor who so ably upholds the high character of the instrument he teaches; and, although it may be a question whether his inaugural lecture was worth reprinting in this country, students of the organ will, we are certain, read it with much pleasure.

A Rhapsody (Come, Divine One). Cantilena. A Melody composed to the Etude in La Bémol of Frederic Chopin, by Charles Gounod. English words by Henry Knight.
[Music and Art Association.]

M. GOUNOD has already shown us how artistically he can construct a melody upon an instrumental movement in his charming “Ave Maria” upon Bach's Prelude in C; and he has been equally successful in the Rhapsody before us, written on Chopin's well-known Etude. We have little doubt that this composition will be eagerly sought by vocalists; the theme is extremely simple and expressive; and the accompaniment, we need scarcely say, gives much interest to the song. It was especially written for, and has been sung by, Mrs. Weldon.

Stray Leaves. An Album of Pianoforte Pieces. Twelve little Sketches for the Piano. Composed by Florian Pascal. [Joseph Williams.]

It is not to be wondered at that in a volume containing sixteen pieces, there should be much inequality of merit; but we may unhesitatingly recommend many of them to the attention of pianists, and almost regret that they should not have been published separately, so that purchasers could choose from them. From the "Pensées Celtiques" we should be inclined to select No. 2 (Berceuse); from the "Idyls" No. 1; and from the "Vignettes" Nos. 1, 4 and 6. Many of the other sketches, however, are exceedingly well written, and all lie well under the hand of a trained pianist. The "Air with Variations" displays much contrapuntal knowledge, the fugue especially being carefully considered and fairly wrought out, and the "Air Espagnol" has also many good points. "Stray Leaves" appeals to younger players, and will be found extremely useful for teaching purposes, as, although simple in construction, the pieces shadow forth the style of the classical writers. We think it rather a merit that names should not be given to each number. The listeners may supply them if they please; but it is infinitely better that a composition should rest on its own merits, if it have any—and if not, we much question whether it will acquire additional value by having some ultra-sentimental title. We particularly admire Nos. 1, 5, and 8 (which contain useful practice for the two hands), and No. 10. No. 11 is quaint, but perhaps more curious than pleasing, the pertinacious ignoring of the leading-note, especially at the conclusion, being perhaps hardly an example to set before juvenile pianists.

O Salutaris Hostia. Sacred Song.
Evening Shades. Song. Words by Fred. H. Houston.
Composed by William H. Flood.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It may be perhaps difficult to describe the difference between a sacred and a secular song, but there can be no doubt that the difference is felt, even by musically uneducated listeners. "I know that my Redeemer liveth" is one of the most purely religious vocal pieces ever written; but, as in all other songs, it may be only that the words are so sympathetically coloured by the genius of the composer as to become doubly eloquent; and when, therefore, this happy union is not effected, the result is disappointing. In both the songs before us Mr. Flood has written an agreeable, flowing melody, and the accompaniments throughout are thoroughly satisfactory; but the words of either of the two compositions might be exchanged for those of the other without anybody but the composer discovering the alteration. The "O Salutaris" is essentially a ballad—and a very pleasing one too—but, as we have said, except for the words, there is nothing to show that it is, as the title-page tells us, a "Sacred Song." "Evening Shades" is a melodious and vocal Song, and may be recommended to unambitious singers in search of novelty. The enharmonic change at page 3 begins well, but we scarcely like the manner in which the original key is returned to.

Danse Pyrrhique. For the Pianoforte. By Brownlow Baker. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

THERE is much character in this little sketch, which may be conscientiously recommended to young players who love to practise music with what they term a "decided tune" in it. The pedal point after the double bar has a good effect, and contrasts well with the principal subject. "Teaching pieces," however, should be correct, and it is kindness, therefore, to point out some errors. In the last bar but one on page 4, the G in the last chord, treble staff, should have a flat before it; in the following bar, the second crotchet in the bass should be F. In the first bar of the last line, page 5, the last crotchet in the bass should be D; there is an evident confusion in the bass of the last bar but one, and the final chord has the low D, instead of F, in the bass. No doubt practised performers would see all these things at once; but children would not, and it is of the utmost importance that they should not read inaccuracies which must afterwards be corrected.

A Children's Opera. A Fairy Wedding. Composed in Six Parts, for the Pianoforte. By Cotsford Dick.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

AN Opera for the Pianoforte is certainly a novelty; but at our holiday parties we are not disposed to be over-critical, and the juvenile performers and audiences for whom Mr. Cotsford Dick's musical contribution is expressly designed will assuredly thank him for his kindly sympathy with their requirements. The Overture is a pleasing little movement, and the "Bridegroom's Serenade" and "Bridesmaids' Chorus," have sufficient fairy-like character to justify their admission amongst the elfin revels appropriate to the occasion. The "Wedding March" is scarcely so attractive as its companion pieces, and moreover contains some few harsh effects—as, for example, in the harmony of the second bar on page 9—which we think better avoided in music written for children. "The Betrothal" (which, by the way, comes strangely after the "Wedding March") has a good subject in A minor, with an effective change into the tonic major; and the characteristic "Dance" which finishes the story is both melodious and graceful. The little book has a well-designed cover; and it is announced that the pieces can be procured separately.

The Sailor's Home. Ballad.
[Glasgow: Finlayson Brothers.]

The Last Leaf (Grandmamma's Song). Words by J. Sheridan Murphy. Music by P. Von Tugginer.
[Marriott and Williams.]

THE name of this composer is new to us, but his songs, although eccentric both in melody and harmony, have a definite character. He has an evident love for somewhat peculiar intervals—the augmented fourth, for example, being especially dwelt upon in the first song, which, however, excepting some harsh harmonies in the second bar of the symphony, has decided merit. "The Last Leaf" is clever, some rather mournful verses being well reflected in the music. The old lady of ninety-six, however, who is dramatically presumed to be the vocalist, must have well preserved her voice to be able to reach the F sharp at the conclusion of the song, especially as the composer has been cruel enough to place a pause over it.

A Fairy Tale. For the Pianoforte. By Berthold Tours.
[Weekes and Co.]

JUDGING by the specimen before us, we may assume that Mr. Tours has a special talent for the composition of characteristic pieces for the young. But it is well that "fairy tales" appeal also to children of a larger growth, for it would be indeed a pity if so elegant and musician-like a sketch as this should be heard only under the fingers of very youthful pianists, as—apart from the fact of nursery concerts being often attended by somewhat uneducated listeners—the true meaning of the composition can scarcely be revealed save by tolerably well-trained students. The principal theme is extremely melodious, and the passages lie well under the hand throughout. We conscientiously recommend this artistic trifle both to students and teachers, and shall be glad if Mr. Tours can manage to continue his labours in the same direction.

Mother, oh, sing me to rest. Song. Words by Mrs. Hemans. Composed by W. H. Harper.
[Marriott and Williams.]

It is gratifying to find that composers who devote themselves to writing songs especially intended for amateur vocalists are beginning to see the policy of selecting their poetry from the works of poets. Mr. Harper has aimed merely at producing a simple ballad, and we are bound to say has been successful; yet we cannot but think that Mrs. Hemans's verses have partially contributed to this result. Maudlin words will assuredly produce maudlin music, and the union of the two is insufferable to educated listeners; but when the composer has but little to say, and the poet says something for him, the infliction of the work upon an audience must at least be partially lessened. The song under notice is extremely melodious, and the harmonies natural and musicianlike throughout.

Deux Polonaises pour le Piano à quatre mains. Composées par Reginald Bowerman. [Exeter: D. Smith.]

THE composer of these two sketches for four hands is a stranger to us, but his graceful music makes us long for his better acquaintance. Little, indeed, is attempted, but that little is well done. The first Polonaise, in E major, has a light, pleasing theme, the hands of both players are employed to a purpose throughout, and some little passages of imitation materially increase the effect of the piece. No. 2, in D minor, is perhaps the better of the two, and in this again we have figures woven in with the subjects, which proves that the composer does not rely upon mere prettiness. Both pieces present no remarkable difficulties, but a free and elastic finger will be required to do them the justice they deserve.

Voices. Song. Words by H. J. Trueman. Music by Ernest Birch. [Enoch and Sons.]

THERE is much musical feeling in this little Ballad; but Mr. Birch must be warned from falling into a restless style of accompaniment by attempting to do more than the unpretending character of his vocal part will legitimately bear. We know that it is difficult to be simple, but it is what a student should aim at; and perhaps when the composer of the song before us hears an accompanist labouring to play the melody (which is divided between the two hands) and distressing the singer with the staccato chords in the last eight bars of each verse, he may wish that he had been less ambitious.

Poo Teñ Loh, or The World's Delight. The Chinese National Air. Arranged for the Pianoforte by Sir Julius Benedict. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THIS national air, supplied by his Excellency the Marquis Tsêng, Minister of China to the Court of St. James's, is built upon what is known as the "pentatonic scale," and certainly possesses very decided character. How far the harmonies written by so excellent a musician as Sir Julius Benedict might satisfy Chinese ears it is impossible to say, but it is evident that the arrangement of it has been a labour of love; and as, from the source whence it is derived, we may feel certain of the accuracy of the melody, we welcome the little piece as an interesting contribution from a country which has up to the present time contributed but little towards the "World's Delight" in music.

Easy Sketches for Violin and Pianoforte. By Max Schröter. [B. Williams.]

AS the violin may now be termed a domestic instrument, music thoroughly within the powers of moderately advanced players will soon be eagerly sought for; and it is good, therefore, to find that accomplished composers are employing themselves in providing for the demand. It is a hopeful sign of the times that flimsy fantasias from Italian operas, and easily arranged airs with bald pianoforte accompaniments, should be gradually giving place to original pieces—however simple they may be—written for both instruments; and we cordially welcome the twelve Sketches before us as a healthy addition to the increasing store of such compositions. They are all melodious, carefully harmonised, and accompanied in a musicianlike manner. The "Barcarolle," "Humoresque," "Polka Gracieuse," "Mazurka," and "Saltarello" may perhaps be cited as amongst the best of the set; but there is not one weak number, and the young violinist may depend upon finding in all these little pieces good practice, as well as good music.

Inconstancy. Song. Poetry by J. Lodge Ellerton. Music by Frank D'Alquen.

[Duncan Davison and Co.]

AN unusually long but extremely elegant symphony introduces this Ballad, one of the most expressive we have seen from the pen of this composer. The change into the tonic minor, and the transient modulations which follow, seem to grow naturally from the feeling of the melody, which is throughout thoroughly sympathetic with the words. We are glad to call attention to so good a specimen of unpretentious song-writing.

The Trysting Well. Song. Poetry by Edward Foskett. Music by Berthold Tours. [Weekes and Co.]

MR. BERTHOLD TOURS is taking high rank amongst the song-writers of the day, for, although he writes much, he never writes carelessly. "The Trysting Well" is a notable instance of the power of an accomplished composer to invest a simple subject with interest. The theme of this song sympathises in its unpretentious character with the words; but its treatment is so varied as to hold the attention of the listener to the end of the little story, which, although an old one, we never tire of hearing, especially when wedded to such excellent music as that of Mr. Tours.

FOREIGN NOTES.

IT is a distinctly remarkable feature in the controversy excited by Richard Wagner's music dramas, since the appearance of "Tannhäuser," that their subject-matter, or "poetic basis," to use a Wagnerian expression, has engaged the attention of critical writers at least as much as the music to which they are wedded. Time was—and not so very remote either—when the libretto of an opera was considered of very secondary importance indeed. It was Wagner's immediate predecessor in the self-imposed task of creating a national German opera, C. M. von Weber, who first laid down the maxim that the composer of an opera should be responsible also for the choice of his book. Although certainly unfortunate in the selection of his "Euryanthe," as treated by Helmine von Chezy, he had at all events identified himself with the subject, and the influence of this work, both as to its subject-matter and musical treatment, is distinctly traceable both in "Tannhäuser," and more conspicuously, even as to details, in "Lohengrin." Still, "Euryanthe" as a stage drama provoked very little criticism at the time of its first production at German operatic establishments, and the degree of estimation in which the dramatic vehicle to an opera was held at even a later period, in this country, may be illustrated by the remarks contained in a leading English journal concerning a performance of Weber's chef-d'œuvre in London some forty-five years ago. "It ['Euryanthe'] is called a romantic opera," says the critic in question, "and as to the subject and action of the drama it is indeed romantic enough. However, it is neither usual nor practicable to consider too curiously the dramatic merits of such productions; and if they serve to carry on the music, which is the more important matter, the poet attains the object at which alone he most probably aimed, and the audience may be satisfied." How different the standard which then sufficed for an operatic poem to pass muster to that applied to the same work on its recent production by the German company at Drury Lane! Nor can it be for a moment doubted that it is owing in a large measure to Wagner's reformatory efforts that this standard has been raised to its present exacting elevation. Wagner, the poet, has moreover, both by the choice and the treatment of his dramatic subjects, given a powerful impetus to the revival of the study, on the part, at all events, of his countrymen, of the poetic masterpieces of a classical period of their national literature. The book of "Parsifal," like its predecessor "Der Ring des Nibelungen," had been in the hands of the public years before the work met with its stage realisation as a music-drama at Bayreuth, and has already produced numerous essays, pamphlets, and even entire volumes, concerning the origin and significance of the legend, and the epic poem of Wolfram von Eschenbach, upon which "Parsifal" is mainly founded. This fact manifests in itself an eminently creative faculty in Wagner, apart from his musical genius, and marks an enormous step in the development of what was once contemptuously styled the musical "libretto."

We have been led into these observations by the perusal of various articles contained in continental journals (of which we gave a partial résumé in our last number) respecting the now historical performances of Wagner's latest music-drama at the little Bavarian town, and in nearly all of which a preponderating share of criticism has been bestowed upon the poet's handling of the subject, while a certain reserve is, not unfittingly, exercised with regard to that of the musician. Hence there is but little of particular interest now to add, in a journal specially devoted to music, to the extracts already given. In our review of the book of "Parsifal," some four years ago, we expressed the opinion that some portions of it would be objected to on orthodox religious grounds, while others would be taken hold of by the satirist. There is no trace, as yet, of the latter, so far as we have seen, and the general disposition appears to be to treat the work in a spirit of reverence. It was not to be supposed, however, that the odium theologicum would fail to be aroused by the semi-religious exhibition at Bayreuth. Accordingly, to mention one instance only, an article, extensively reproduced in other papers, has appeared in the clerical Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, wherein the dramatic development by Wagner of the Parcial legend is characterised as "shallow and superficial," while the introduction on the stage of the Holy Grail ritual is denounced as "a profanation and a sin." Other journals have, of course, not been behindhand in furnishing more, or less telling refutations of the standpoint taken up by the clerical organ in question, but it is difficult to foresee any satisfactory issue from this branch of the controversy, which after all resolves itself into a question of religious feeling and of artistic taste. As a curious contrast to the denunciation just quoted, we may cite a few passages from an article from the pen of Herr Louis Ehlert, a critic justly esteemed for the honesty of his expressed opinions and the soundness of his judgment in art matters. Herr Ehlert is by no means a partisan of the Bayreuth reformer, yet his account of "Parsifal," published in the Deutsche Rundschau, is, on the whole, couched in terms of enthusiastic admiration. The passages alluded to, concerning the love-feast and the Holy Grail celebration generally, run as follows: "In vain does one look here for anything unworthy; Wagner has earnestly and deeply penetrated into the sacredness of the conception. . . . The performance of the Grail ritual, with its choruses and processions, was as worthy and as consistently appropriate an exhibition, such indeed as I should scarcely have deemed possible to be realised on the stage." A somewhat meagre and pale-coloured account of the "Bühnenweih-festspiel" is furnished by the Leipzig Signale, a journal which, although certainly not of the first rank, from an artistic point of view, has, strange to say, the largest circulation of all its German contemporaries. We will conclude our remarks by a brief allusion to the thoughtful and interesting article on the performance in question, published in the Berlin Der Klavier-Lehrer, from the pen of Dr. Langhans. Passing over the dramatic portion of the work, for which the critic has nothing but words of admiration, we meet here at all events with an outspoken individual opinion as regards its musical merits. "In the presence of such considerable poetic attractions," says the Doctor, "it is to be regretted that the music of 'Parsifal' does not rise to the same elevation. Neither the conception nor the elaboration of the thematic material fulfil the expectations which the composer of 'Tristan,' 'Die Meistersinger,' and the 'Nibelungen' had raised in our minds, and to which the subject especially of this drama entitled us. In the prelude already, consisting, as it does, of various themes unconnectedly placed side by side (and occasionally reminding one of 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin'), we miss the constructive power which once created the organically developed, wondrous structures of the preludes to 'Tristan' and 'Lohengrin.'" Although the writer subsequently remarks that his strictures in respect of the music are intended chiefly to prevent disappointment on the part of those who expected a still greater manifestation of the musical genius of the reformer, who after all is "a lion still in strength," yet it is evident that he has himself experienced a similar disappointment to that which he alludes to. In summing up, Dr. Langhans says: "This much at least is certain, namely, that, spite of all its defects, 'Parsifal' will have a lasting place by the side of the most important works of the master, as a grand monument of German art," and recommends every earnest amateur to go and judge for himself "how far the poet-composer has succeeded in solving that mighty problem of modern culture, viz., to unite the art with religious worship on the stage, in the manner of the ancients. To have made this effort is in itself a praiseworthy deed, and, whatever its success, Germany may be proud of the fact that it is one of her sons who has dared to attempt it." We recommend the perusal of Dr. Langhans' able article to such of our readers as are sufficiently acquainted with German. It furnishes a refreshing proof of the fact that even a confessed member of the Wagner congregation is able to regard a new work of the reformer with perfect sobriety and impartiality of judgment.

The representations of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth terminated on August 29, with the fifteenth performance, on which occasion the poet-composer himself wielded the conductor's bâton during the latter part of the last act, greatly to the delight of the orchestra. At the conclusion of the performance in question, small gifts were presented by the master to all the artists engaged on the stage, in token of his gratitude and as a memento of the event. The following, according to the Signale, was the constitution of the orchestra at the recent Bayreuth performances, viz.: 31 violins, 12 violas, 12 violoncellos, 8 contra-basses, 4 flutes, 6 oboes, 4 clarinets, 2 bass clarinets, 4 bassoons, 1 contra-bassoon, 7 horns, 3 trumpets, 4 trombones, 1 tuba, 2 kettle-drums, 4 harps, and, finally, the specially constructed bell contrivance, making a total of 106 instruments.

The total receipts of the "Parsifal," performances amounted to 500,000M., against an expenditure of 380,000M., leaving a surplus of 120,000M. in the hands of the committee of management of the "Festspiele," which are henceforth to be annually produced at the little Bavarian town.

A propos of the 44,000 telegraphic words despatched from Bayreuth on the evening of the first performance of "Parsifal" (to which we alluded in our last issue), we may remark, for the information of the curious in such matters, that there are some 6,360 words contained in Wagner's latest drama—viz., 2,443 in the first, 2,346 in the second, and 1,572 in the third acts—a total which has been exceeded sevenfold by the number of telegraphic words to which the performance in question has given immediate rise.

Herr Angelo Neumann, the energetic impresario, commenced a new season of performances with his "Richard Wagner Theater" on the 2nd ult., at Breslau, with the "Nibelungen" tetralogy, the entire representation of which concluded on the 6th ult. The success, both artistically and financially, is said to have been a brilliant one, the house being filled to the last seat on every occasion, while among the principal interpreters Frau Vogl, Frau Reicher-Kindermann, and Herren Vogl, Lieban and Unger seem to have specially distinguished themselves.

At the Darmstadt Opera a new operatic work by the orchestral director of that institution, Herr Willem de Haan, will shortly be produced. The work is entitled "Die Kaisertochter," and is founded on the well-known historic legend of "Eginhard and Emma."

A correspondent writes to us from Munich: "The Hof-Theater here reopened on the 3rd ult. with a performance of Marschner's opera 'Hans Heiling.' The following are amongst the operas that have since been given, viz.: 'Der Freischütz,' 'The Merry Wives of Windsor,' 'William Tell,' 'The Huguenots,' and 'Tannhäuser.' In the last-named Herr Anton Schott, of the Hanover Opera, gained a great success in the titre-rôle. The pianist, Herr Dingeldey, a pupil of Liszt, will, in the course of next month, give a concert at the Odeon, at which Liszt has promised to be present. The programme will include several pieces from 'Parsifal,' in the performance of which Herr Reichmann and other artists of the Munich Opera will assist."

The season of concerts at the Leipzig Gewandhaus is announced to commence on the 5th inst.

The excellent concerts annually given at Berlin under the direction of Herr Bilse recommenced on the 16th ult., at the Concerthaus, with an entirely reconstructed orchestra.

Viennese opera-goers have no reason to complain of a lack of variety in the répertoire of the Imperial establishment. Since the commencement of the season on August 1, the following operas have been produced here, according to the Signale, during the first six weeks, viz.: "Faust," "Figaro," "Tell," "Tannhäuser," "Postillon de Lonjumeau," "Hans Heiling," "Freischütz," "Trovatore," "Mignon," "Roberto," "Prophète," "Mefistofele," "Orpheus," "Zauberflöte," "Romeo," "Don Giovanni,"

"L'Africaine," "Der Betrugene Kadi," "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Violetta," "Oberon," "Les Huguenots," "Aïda," "Nordstern," and "Lohengrin,"—no less than twenty-five more or less elaborate works! Surely this truly surprising managerial activity cannot all be set down to the fact of the establishment in question being in receipt of a considerable government subvention.

According to the recently published annual reports, the number of pupils during the past academical year at the Imperial Conservatorium of Vienna was 748, of whom 54 were foreigners. The Dresden Royal Conservatorium, during the same period, numbered 646 pupils—viz., 296 male and 350 female, including 63 non-Germans. The institution is under the direction of Dr. Wüllner, and has a teaching staff of 77 professors of both sexes. At the Royal Musik-Schule of Munich, where the imparting of a sound general education, in combination with the musical, is made a special feature, there were 278 pupils under the tuition of 35 professors.

Dr. Hans von Bülow will give two Beethoven Concerts next month with the Meiningen Court Orchestra, at Frankfurt, to be followed by a third Concert, which will be devoted entirely to works by the late Joachim Raff, whose death, at the above-named town, we have recently recorded.

Herr Carl Klindworth, the eminent pianist and composer, has resigned his professorship at the Moscow Conservatoire, and has accepted a similar post at the "Neue Akademie der Tonkunst," of Berlin.

A monument in honour of Louis Spohr is to be unveiled at Cassel on the 22nd inst., the anniversary of his death, which occurred in 1859.

Franz Liszt, it is stated, has written a new Mass, which will shortly be performed at the Imperial Chapel of Vienna.

Gounod's opera, "Roméo et Juliette," was revived on the 16th ult., at the Paris Opéra-Comique with great success. Mlle. Isaac represented the part of the heroine, and M. Talazac that of Roméo, the latter's performance especially having called forth enthusiastic plaudits. The work was first produced in 1867 at the Théâtre-Lyrique, under the management of M. Carvalho, when Madame Carvalho created the part of Juliette, and the tenor Michaud that of Roméo.

At the Paris Grand-Opéra the already repeatedly announced reprise of M. Ambrose Thomas's "Françoise de Rimini" has had to be postponed in consequence of the indisposition of some of the leading vocalists. M. Camille Saint-Saëns's new operatic work, "Henri VIII.," is in course of active preparation at the same establishment.

The recent festivities in connection with the unveiling of a statue of Guido d'Arezzo, at the town of Arezzo, included a most enthusiastically received performance of Boito's opera "Mefistofele." An "Ode to Guido," composed by the Maestro Mancinelli, and forming part of the festive concert programme, likewise met with a most favourable reception. The statue of the celebrated Benedictine monk, which is much admired, is from the model of the sculptor Salvini.

A Mass, by Signor Ciro Pinsuti, was produced last month at Sinalunga (Siena) under the direction of the composer, and in connection with some festive musical performances held at that town. Vocal and instrumental artists from Rome, Florence and Siena took part in the rendering of the work, which is described in "La Nazione," of Florence, as a veritable chef d'œuvre, arousing much enthusiasm; a final fugue in the Gloria, as well as the Credo and Benedictus, having more especially created a deep impression. Signor Pinsuti, we need scarcely add, is held in the highest estimation at Sinalunga, his native town, which has a theatre named after him.

A permanent Commission has been appointed at Rome by the Italian Government, consisting of four musical composers, four dramatic authors, one musical and one dramatic critic, who will constitute a tribunal in all questions concerning music and the drama, artistic instruction, and the awarding of prizes.

Luigi Manzotti's Ballet, entitled "Excelsior," has recently been produced with great success at Trieste, after having made the round of the more important Italian operahouses. The work is also shortly to be mounted on the German lyrical stage.

A new opera by the maestro Cobbatì, entitled "Cordelia," is to be produced during the coming season at the Teatro Comunale of Bologna. The libretto of the opera is founded upon Shakespeare's "King Lear."

Mlle. Carlotta Desvignes—under which Christian name the lady prefers henceforth to be known, but who will be better remembered by London amateurs as Dora Desvignes—will make her début on the stage at Vercelli during the Carnival season. "Il Trovatore," from which we gather this information, speaks in terms of high eulogium of the vocal attainments of the young artist, and of the successful studies in dramatic singing recently made by her under the Maestro Sangiovanni, of Milan.

The Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, commenced a new season of opera on the 3rd ult. with Meyerbeer's "Roberto il Diavolo." M. Léo Délibes' opera "Jean de Nivelles" will be the first novelty to be produced during the present stagione.

The death is announced at Berlin, at the age of forty-nine, of Max Albert, the famous zither virtuoso, and composer for that instrument.

At Copenhagen died, at the age of fifty-eight, Ch. A. Hertz, well known as a dramatic author, and translator into the Danish language of the libretti to several of Gluck's operas, as well as of Wagner's "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," and "Die Meistersinger."

At Verona died, on August 29, at the age of sixty-seven, Charles Voss, much esteemed as a pianist, and the composer of numerous pièces de salon for his instrument. Voss was born in 1815, at Schmarow, in Pomerania.

We have to record the death, last month near Paris, of Edmond Membrée, a distinguished musical professor, and composer of numerous operas (among them "L'Esclave"), lyrical scenes, and songs. The deceased, who was a pupil of Carafa in composition, had attained the age of sixty-two.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Leipzig.—Concert at the Gewandhaus, in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Gustav-Adolf-Stiftung (September 14): Oxford Symphony (Haydn); Pianoforte Concerto No. 26 (Mozart); Overture, "Genoveva" (Schumann); Notturmo and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); Symphony, A major (Beethoven).

Sondershausen.—Lohconcert (September 3): Overture, "Friedensfeier" (Reinecke); Violin Concerto (Beethoven); "Aquarellen" (Henriques); Overture, "Oberon" (Weber); Violin Solos (Bazzini, Wieniawski); Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven). Lohconcert (September 10): Symphony, C major (Haydn); Flute Concerto (Manns); Overture, "Egmont" (Beethoven); Entr'acte and Ballet music from "Ali Baba" (Cherubini); Serenade No. 3 (Jadassohn).

Breslau.—Wagner-Concert of Angelo Neumann (September 1): Overture, "Tannhäuser"; Frühlingslied and Love-Duet, from "Walküre"; Prelude and "Liebstd," from "Tristan und Isolde"; Prelude to "Parsifal"; Siegfried's Death, from "Götterdämmerung"; Ride of the Valkyries and Ensemble-Scene, from "Walküre."

CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSIC BY ELECTRICITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I suppose the advertisement of "Music" by Electricity" you speak of in your August issue refers to a clever but simple little toy just invented. It consists of a plate of glass, under which is fixed on a pivot a revolving wire carrying a little hand. A disc of card is divided radially into compartments in each of which is written a question or an answer. The disc is laid upon the glass, and the question to which an answer is required is placed opposite a spot on the glass; the hand then swings round till it is opposite the answer. The card disc of course contains some form of magnet. The toy is very useful for teaching children, and contains a great number of rudimentary questions. I am not able to say where it is sold.—Yours,
DUNCAN HUME.

5, Church Terrace, Bournemouth.

[If the "little toy" described by our correspondent had been advertised as such, we should never have referred to it; but music is not to be "taught" by toys, however ingenious they may be; and it is only because it was asserted that it could be that we commented upon the announcement.—ED. M.T.]

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

RAFF AND TENNYSON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The record of a short conversation which I held with Raff in April last may, I think, be interesting to English readers, now that the great musician has passed away. I had visited him to ask his opinion as to which of his songs he considered most worthy of translation into English, and observed en passant that, in going through his songs myself, I was struck by the beauty of the texts of almost all of them. He smiled and remarked that perhaps the most beautiful text did not need translation into English, and, approaching a shelf, took down two English songs by Tennyson, put to music by him and published in the volume of Tennyson's Songs edited by Mr. Cusins.

"Yet," he added, "I doubt if, from a musical point of view, they belong to my best work."

"Why?" I ventured to ask.

"Because," was his characteristic reply, "your Tennyson is too great a poet to permit of such subordination to the composer as is necessary in a song put to music. In other words, he is too thought-heavy. I composed this sonnet of his ('Tears, idle tears') in two versions, neither of which satisfied me."

"Why?"

"I grew thought-heavy myself in making them."

With these words he presented me with the songs in question, and we parted with a hearty good-bye, and "Auf Wiedersehen" when I should return from Genoa, whither I was then bound. Alas! like too many an "Auf Wiedersehen" uttered at parting, it was destined never to be fulfilled.

As all the world now knows, Raff was found dead in his bed on Sunday morning, June 25, having died quite suddenly in the night.—Faithfully yours,

E. L'ESTERRE-KEELING.

ANONYMOUS CRITICISMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On page 484 of this month's MUSICAL TIMES, I see that exception is taken to the manner in which I have (when advertising) used quotations from critiques of "Ye Fancye Fayre" March. You do not specifically name the March, but as you insert the quotations, and they have been widely advertised, readers will readily connect your comments with my advertisement.

The first—"I have not for a long time heard a prettier or more graceful pianoforte piece"—is from Society; the other—"Worthy to rank with Gounod's Marionette March for quaintness and originality"—is from a letter from the conductor of a London orchestral union, whose name I had no authority to insert in these advertisements.

I inclose a printed leaflet giving the full passages, and many others, with the names of the papers or writers who have favoured me with remarks, which, you will see, are fully as favourable as those in question. My object in cutting down the quotations was to save expense in advertising.—Your obedient servant,

G. HUBI NEWCOMBE.

[Our remarks were upon the method of advertising, and not upon the work advertised, or upon the justness of the criticisms. The reply is no defence of the system complained of; but we give the composer an opportunity of proving that the quotations are genuine.—Ed. M.T.]

THE "BRINSMEAD CONCERT COMPANY."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Believing that amongst the multitude of readers which your MUSICAL TIMES justly claims there are many competent persons particularly desirous of entering professional life, but who are prevented by lack of the necessary introductions, &c., I have the pleasure to inform you that I am about to organise two or more long-period tours, commencing on January 6 next, to join which ability will be the only one thing needed; and that I shall be glad to hear from those of your readers who are really able solo vocalists or instrumentalists, and may wish to offer me their services.—I am, dear sir, very truly yours,

WILLIAM BENSON.

18, 20, and 22, Wigmore Street, London.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BOURNEMOUTH.—A Concert for the benefit of the Dispensary was given on the 14th ult. in the concert-room at the Red House. Vocal solos were well rendered by Miss Herdman and Miss Henden Warde, the latter lady receiving well-deserved encores. Miss Moseley's performance of Schumann's "Nachtstück" and the "Ruins of Athens" March, by Rubinstein, was highly appreciated. The string band, led by Mr. Levason, played with great taste and precision.

BRADFORD.—An excellent Concert was given on Saturday evening, the 9th ult., in the large concert-room of the Technical School Exhibition by the members of the Dewsbury Glee and Madrigal Society. All the glees were very well rendered, and the vocal solos by Mr. J. Marsden, Conductor of the Society, and Mr. W. H. Dawson were features of the evening.

BRIDGEWATER.—An Amateur Concert in aid of the All Saints' Mission Chapel, Eastover, was given at the Town Hall on Tuesday, the 19th ult. There was a good attendance, and about £15 was handed to the chapel authorities.

BRIDPORT.—Madame C. C. Rossiter gave two Musical Evenings at the Templar Hall, on Monday and Tuesday, the 4th and 5th ult., entitled "Two Hours with the Old Masters." The first evening was devoted to Rossini, Chopin, and Beethoven; and the second to Schubert, Haydn, and Weber. A short sketch of each master and his works was given by Madame Rossiter, who also played instrumental solos and acted as an efficient accompanist to the vocal solos, duets, and trios, which were artistically rendered by Miss Parkinson, Miss Helen Millar, and Mr. J. Greenhill.

BRISBANE.—Mr. Howell's Oratorio, The Land of Promise, was performed in the Creek Street Presbyterian Church on Tuesday, June 27. The vocalists, who were principally members of the Church Choir, sang remarkably well. Mr. Scott presided at the organ.

DUNSTER.—On Thursday, August 31, a very successful Musical Festival was held in the Parish Church, under the conductorship of the Rev. W. Hook, Rector of Porlock, to whom much of the credit of organising the Festival is due. The band, which consisted of about fifty performers, was led by Mr. M. G. Rice, of Torquay, the choir being about 100 in number. The singers were placed in the ancient Priory Church, east of the Parish Church (from which it is separated by a carved screen), thus being entirely hidden from the view of the congregation. The programme consisted of Handel's Overture to Samson, Beethoven's Second Symphony, and "Hallelujah" (Mount of Olives), and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" as the anthem. The soloists were Mrs. Anderson, Miss Mary Sharland, Mr. Depree, and Mr. J. G. King. The whole of the music was excellently performed, and the effect of the hidden orchestra, as heard in the Parish Church, was very solemn and impressive. The shortened form of evening service was used, the Rev. K. Acland-Troyte intoning the service. The Rev. J. W. Robinson gave a short address, after which the Rev. R. Utten Todd, Rector of Dunster, pronounced the benediction. Mr. J. Warriner, L. Mus., T. C. L., &c., Organist of the church, presided at the organ, and performed selections from Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Smart, Wely, &c.

GLASGOW.—A large and influential public meeting was held on the 7th ult., in the Grand National Hall, for the purpose of inaugurating a new Association for the study and practice of high-class music. Councillor Scott occupied the chair, and James Campbell, Esq., of Tilliechewan, moved the first resolution, as follows: "It being desirable that the largely populated districts in the south-eastern portion of the city should have a Musical Association for the practice and public performance of high-class music, this meeting resolves to form a new Society, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Westwood Tosh, to be called 'The Glasgow Musical Union,' and hereby commends it to the encouragement and support of the community." Mr. J. Morrison, member of the Glasgow School Board, and other gentlemen spoke in support of the motion, which was unanimously carried, and a large committee of management was appointed. The Society has commenced to rehearse Handel's Judas Maccabeus, the number of members being already considerably over a hundred.

Mr. Percy Starnes presided at the organ with great ability.

LLANBERIS.—A very successful Concert was given in the Town Hall, on the 21st ult., in aid of the Llanberis String Band, a society just formed under the direction of Professor Tisdwell, Bandmaster of the Vaynol Royal Brass Band. The Vaynol band performed an excellent selection of music, and Mr. Tisdwell, in conjunction with Mr. W. H. Chambers, played a duet for two violins by Viotti. The solo vocalists were Miss J. Griffiths, R.A.M., Miss J. E. Evans, R.A.M., Eos Padarn, and Ap Glaslyn. The performance of a selection of airs on the Organette by Mr. T. Hughes was much appreciated.

LONG MELFORD.—At the Holy Trinity Church on Friday evening, the 22nd ult., an Organ Recital was given by Mr. B. H. Hurst, the Organist, whose fine performance of a selection from the works of Sir Michael Costa, Best, Guilman, &c., gave great satisfaction to an appreciative congregation.

Matins followed at 11, the processional being "Come, ye thankful people, come," Tallis's Responses, Dykes's Te Deum and Benedicite in F, and Stainer's Anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land," all of which were well rendered by the choir. Evensong was sung at 3.30, and a special evensong in St. John's Church at 7.0. The sermons were preached by the Rev. G. Barnes, M.A., of St. Barnabas, Bethnal Green. The musical portion of the services was under the direction of Mr. Charles G. Sadler, of Croydon, who also accompanied.

OLDHAM.—The first of a series of Organ Recitals, to be given every alternate Wednesday evening in St. Thomas's Church, took place on the 6th ult., when Mr. Hudson, of Southport, presided at the organ. At the second, Mr. Irvine Dearnaley, of Ashton, was the organist, and at the third, Mr. Bradley, of Manchester. On the 13th ult., the first Popular Concert of the season was given in Henshaw Street Coffee Tavern. The vocalists were Mrs. Cheetham, Miss Lees, Messrs. Mewby and Kershaw, and Mr. J. Greaves presided at the pianoforte.

PORTSHEAD.—A Service of Praise was held at the Union Chapel on Wednesday, August 30, by the members of the Bristol Choirs' Association, numbering 200, all the choirs of the Association being represented. The musical arrangements were superintended by Mr. G. Corner, jun.; Mr. R. J. Vosper presided at the organ and Mr. F. C. Maker conducted. The service was well rendered.

SALISBURY.—Two very successful Amateur Concerts were given in the Assembly Rooms, on the 19th ult., in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music, by Mr. Augustus Aylward, who conducted an excellent band of fifty performers. The vocalists were Viscountess Folkestone and Miss Edith Parkyns; and Shakesperian Recitals were given by Mr. Chillingham Hunt. A novel feature was the performance of two of Handel's pieces by a band of ladies, conducted by Viscountess Folkestone, both of which were encored. Mr. Luard Selby (the Cathedral Organist) and Miss Curzon played solos on a grand pianoforte, kindly lent by Messrs. J. and J. Hopkinson, and Mr. Alfred Foley contributed a violin solo. The audience was most enthusiastic, and a handsome sum will be realised for the College.

SCARBOROUGH.—A Concert, in aid of the School Building Fund, was given in the All Saints' National Schoolroom on the 15th ult. The programme consisted chiefly of pianoforte music, and included Schumann's Andante with variations in B flat, played on two pianofortes by Dr. Naylor and Mr. Algernon Ashton; and a Suite for two pianofortes, consisting of four movements, the composition of Mr. Ashton, who was joined by Mr. E. H. Thorne in its performance. Mr. Ashton is a young composer and pianist of much promise, and he was warmly received. The vocalists were Miss Thompson, Mrs. Miles, the Rev. R. Brown-Borthwick, Mr. G. B. Thackwray, and Mr. Sanderson.

SOUTHPORT.—An Organ Recital was given in the Chapel Street Congregational Chapel, on the 14th ult., by Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O., Organist of Bolton Town Hall and St. Paul's Church, Kersal, Manchester. A good programme was excellently rendered. Vocal solos were contributed by Miss A. Carter.

SWANSEA.—A highly successful Concert in aid of the funds of the Hospital was given in the Albert Hall, on the 14th ult., by Madame Adelina Patti, assisted by several eminent artists. The charming singing of Madame Patti was highly appreciated, and her kindness in responding to the numerous encores will be long remembered. The other vocalists were Signor Nicolini and Signor Bonetti. Violin solos were contributed by Mdle. Therese Castellani, and pianoforte solos by Signor Tito Mattei. Herr Ganz conducted. £700 will be handed over to the funds of the Hospital, and £100 is to be distributed amongst the poor in the neighbourhood of Madame Patti's home at Craig y nos Castle.

TREDEGAR.—A district Choral Festival, in connection with the Llandaff Diocesan Choral Association, was held at St. George's Church on Thursday, the 14th ult., when twelve choirs, numbering in all 301 voices, under the conductorship of Mr. Seaton, of Margam Abbey, rendered the service most effectively. There were three surpliced choirs, including the one recently formed at St. George's Church. The service was intoned by the Rev. T. Jackson, of Abercarne, and the lessons read by the Revs. Plantagenet Somerset, of Raglan, and Jas. Pugh, of Llanfoist. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Wm. Hughes, of Christ Church, Ebbw Vale, and Mr. C. C. Caird, Organist of St. George's, presided at the organ. The psalms were chanted to single and double chants. Dr. Steggall's Te Deum in A and the anthems "Praise the Lord" (Elvey) and "Incline Thine ear" (Himmel) were admirably rendered, with the additional accompaniments of two cornets, trombone, and euphonium, led by Mr. Meredith. LONDON, SEPTEMBER, 1882.

W. J. WILLCOCKS has much pleasure in announcing to the Music Trade that he has entered into Partnership with Mr. THOMAS WARD (for thirty years with Messrs. NOVELLO, EWER and Co.), and that they together will in future carry on business as

G. HARTMANN (PARIS).

The English Editions which, under the new arrangement, WILLCOCKS & WARD will issue of the various publications of BOTE & BOCK, including the Klindworth Editions of Chopin's complete WORKS, and the Bülow Editions of Bach and Handel, will be known as which will be not only the finest but the cheapest extant. All copies will bear the combined Imperial Arms of Great Britain and Germany, which insignia WILLCOCKS & WARD hereby give notice they have registered as their Trade Mark.

COMPLETE CATALOGUES up to date of the combined Publications are in the press, and ADVANCE LISTS are now ready.

WILLCOCKS & WARD desire to call the attention of the PROVINCIAL MUSIC TRADE to the following, which will be made a special FEATURE of their NEW ENTERPRISE, viz.:—In conjunction with their own publishing business, they have established a CENTRAL LONDON DEPOT for the better circulation of the PUBLICATIONS of PROVINCIAL MUSIC PUBLISHERS.

WILLCOCKS & WARD are well aware, from long experience, that hitherto the sale of publications issued out of London has been very considerably interfered with owing to the fact that such publications have not been readily obtainable when ordered through the usual collecting houses, and they trust that in their endeavour thus to meet a long-felt want they may receive the combined and hearty support of Provincial Publishers and the Music Trade generally.

Provincial Publishers who desire to avail themselves of the advantages this arrangement offers are requested to communicate at once.

SPECIAL AGENTS for MESSRS. NEUMEYER'S CELEBRATED PIANOS: A choice selection of Pianos, Harmoniums, and Organs, by the BEST Makers, always in Stock.

A large and varied Selection of the Music of all Publishers, both English and Foreign. All Orders supplied by return of post: anything not in Stock procured immediately.

In conclusion, WILLCOCKS & WARD wish it to be clearly understood that their intention is to conduct their business on a FAIR TRADE BASIS, believing that the INTERESTS of the WHOLESALE and the RETAIL TRADE should be IDENTICAL; and as they can promise that their combined experience of nearly fifty years will be brought to bear upon the execution of the business intrusted to them by their customers, they appeal with confidence for a fair share of the support of the Music Trade throughout the Country.

AN ARRANGEMENT OF THE WHOLE WORK FOR PIANOFORTE &amp; SOLO BY BERTHOLD TOURS;

ALSO

THE TIMES.

"To sum up, Gounod's 'Redemption' may be classed among its author's noblest productions. It is a work of high aim, written regardless of immediate popularity, and therefore all the more likely to take rank among the few permanent additions which sacred music owes to modern composers. Its success at Birmingham was even more brilliant than might have been expected."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The climax came with M. Gounod's music to the Ascension Chorus, 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates,' or, as the present English version runs, 'Unfold, ye portals everlasting.' Here, by the use of simple harmonies in great masses, and by the employment of every orchestral resource, the composer stirs and excites the duller feeling. The ensemble was magnificent, and the audience, for once ignoring regulation, burst into long and loud applause."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"The orchestration is throughout worthy of M. Gounod's previous reputation as a consummate master of the art. The varied instrumental effects preserve from tediousness the passages assigned to the two Narrators, which are mostly in monotone. An exquisite theme—or leit-motiv—recurs frequently as typical of the Redeemer; and always brings the suggestion of benign holiness."

GUARDIAN.

"That the 'Redemption' is a great work which must at once take its place among the classics of musical literature cannot be doubted."

GRAPHIC.

"M. Gounod in the plan and development of his Oratorio, speaks for himself; and this, enhanced by the abundant melody and rich harmonic treatment that distinguish it from end to end, invests the whole composition with a sustained tone of originality, telling its own tale in a way not easy to misconstrue."

DAILY NEWS.

"The music, while occasionally somewhat secular in tone, is throughout earnest and serious, yet full of melodic grace and charm and all the richness of those varied harmonic progressions which belong to the modern period of musical art. . . . The orchestration is throughout that of a skilled and practised master of the art. . . . 'The Redemption' must rank as a masterpiece of its kind, especially in the orchestral treatment, which is a marvel of musical colouring."

MORNING POST.

"The hand of the experienced musician is recognisable in every bar, and the composer may justly call it 'Opus vitæ meæ' and be proud of it."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The work was listened to with the most complimentary attention the composer himself suppressing any attempt at applause, but after the powerful air for soprano, 'From Thy love as a Father,' the audience broke out again and again, in spite of the endeavours made to quell the demonstration. At the close of the performance the composer received a perfect ovation both from the audience and the performers."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"That it is a great work cannot for a moment be doubted, and in well-nigh every sense it is worthy the genius of Gounod, who has been justified in writing on its score, 'Opus vitæ meæ,' if he means by this that it is to be considered the finest sacred work of his life. To say that 'The Redemption' will take a high place in the domain of oratorio is not to assume too much."

MIDLAND COUNTIES HERALD.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1882.

OPINIONS OF THE LONDON AND PROVINCIAL PRESS

ON

A. R. GAUL'S CANTATA

"THE HOLY CITY"

COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR THE ABOVE FESTIVAL.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Altogether, a good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul.

"The Chorus, 'Thine is the kingdom,' proves that he knows how to write for imposing effect as well as for simple musicianship. 'Let the sea make a noise,' &c., belongs to the successes of massive choral writing, and the entire chorus with its fugal conclusion, 'Let the heavens rejoice' gives evidences of grand design and adequate musicianship.

"The scriptural texts have been chosen with much judgment."

STANDARD.

"The Holy City' is a healthy, straightforward work, with plenty of vigour and spirit about the writing. It is not of the 'new-fangled' school.

"From first to last Mr. Gaul exercises his undeniable talent in a thoroughly legitimate direction, and gladdens the ears of his auditors with plenty of tonic and dominant.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata just henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Mr. Gaul is a local composer creditably known in the metropolis. It will be a matter for surprise if the Cantata, 'The Holy City,' should not augment his reputation wherever it may be heard, inasmuch as it is a right spirited work, evincing the gift of melody and an excellent knowledge of effective choral writing."

MORNING POST.

"Mr. Gaul has given to the world pieces of sacred music which have obtained a reputation beyond the narrow circle of provincial fame. In his 'Holy City' he has also shown that he can write like a thorough musician in other and more severe styles. The air and chorus ('A new Heaven and a new Earth') with its pianissimo 'Sanctus' is a splendid idea. As a whole the Cantata is a good specimen of earnest musicianship and well-used means."

ACADEMY.

"There is a great deal of good and skilful writing."

MUSICAL TIMES.

"The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."

DAILY NEWS.

"The work is throughout the production of a thoroughly trained and earnest musician. The Orchestral introduction—illustrative of contemplation—is melodious, and contains some good orchestral writing. The pieces for solo voices evince a command of agreeable and flowing melody, and are well suited to the respective voices."

ATHENÆUM.

"We must first recognise the genuine musical feeling shown by the composer.

"The vocal writing is excellent, and shows good command of the resources of counterpoint. To sum up, 'The Holy City,' though not great, is a musicianly and pleasing work which does credit to its composer."

GUARDIAN.

"Melodious, smooth, and well written from beginning to end."

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"The work is throughout characterised by dulcet, graceful melody. The choral numbers show Mr. Gaul at his best; we remark here the sure practised hand of the writer, who has already made himself not a little famous by this class of work."

FIGARO.

"The Cantata is eminently creditable and the words admirably chosen."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"The Holy City' has been received with every mark of approval—approval richly deserved, and if London should ever be made the scene of such music meetings as are held triennially at Birmingham, Leeds, and Norwich, Mr. Gaul may be said to have earned the right to be represented. The composer has in him a pure melodic vein, on which he has freely drawn in giving the approximate musical expression to the beautiful sacred poem-hymns incorporated in his word-book or libretto."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

"Everything is carefully rounded off and finished in form and outline, and the cultivated musician is evident alike in the part-writing for the voices and the command of orchestral resources."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land.

"We think highly of 'The Holy City' music for its vein of pleasing melody, and for the good disposition of the voice parts in the choruses. The instrumentation has evidently received careful attention."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"From title-page to the final chorus there is such perfect organisation, genuine melody, and musical consistency in the just apportionment of subject-matter, that the Cantata is certain of a popular career."

NORWICH DAILY PRESS.

"To name any of the particular pieces for special commendation would be to name the whole, for every one portrays an earnest and thoughtful mind, as well as scholarly design."

NORWICH MERCURY.

"The general impression of the music is eminently pleasing: this arises from the perfect smoothness and elegance of Mr. Gaul's style, and the unimpeded flow of natural melody."

MANCHESTER COURIER.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."

LIVERPOOL DAILY COURIER.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."

TEXT BOOK of MUSIC

BY

HENRY C. BANISTER,

PROFESSOR OF HARMONY AND COMPOSITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

This Manual contains chapters on Notation, Harmony, and Counterpoint; Modulation, Rhythm, Canon, Fugue, Voices, and Instruments; together with exercises on Harmony, an Appendix of Examination Papers, and a copious Index and Glossary of Musical Terms.

... "We are bound to accord the highest praise to the work, which is so logically arranged throughout that reference to any special portion of it can be readily made. . . . The complete manner in which every department of the science is explained is highly creditable to the author; for not only does the book include a treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, Fugue, and Imitation, but some very able remarks upon Form in Composition, and upon the various musical instruments."—Musical Times, April, 1873.

... "Profound knowledge and deep thought. . . . Those alone who have drunk deep at the theoretical founts of Germany . . . and have yearned for a master mind to classify the recondite masses of erudition that make the search for the threads of the discourse of the German sages a mental game at hide and seek, can thoroughly appreciate the learned simplicity with which Mr. BANISTER applies his test of absolute utility to musical science."—Musical World.

AN ODE FOR MUSIC

BY

WILLIAM COLLINS

SET TO MUSIC FOR SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA BY

ALICE MARY SMITH

(Mrs. MEADOWS WHITE).

Octavo, paper cover, 2s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Firmness, vigour, and strength mark the treatment of conceptions which are massive rather than graceful and elegant. . . . I welcome Mrs. Meadows White's 'Ode to the Passions' as the production of undeniable talent, and a worthy addition to the musical things which, being English, give Englishmen cause for pride."

DAILY NEWS.

"The Cantata displays much musical taste and intelligence, with a considerable aptitude for the use of orchestral combinations, and the work will certainly not diminish the artistic reputation gained by Mrs. Meadows White's previous compositions."

STANDARD.

"Mrs. White's work is honest, straightforward, and legitimate in every acceptance of the term; she aims at producing no sensational effects, but achieves that which is infinitely better—a work which will grow upon the auditor and student alike as a pleasing and highly finished art-product."

ATHENÆUM.

"A work of great merit, and quite worthy of its position in a festival programme. It should prove an exceedingly useful addition to the repertoire of Choral Societies."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"Possesses merit of no ordinary calibre. It is a well-conceived and powerful setting of Collins's poem."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"The 'Ode to the Passions' is, on the whole, a well-written and effective work, and worthy of far more applause than it received."

A CONCISE
HISTORY of MUSICFROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA TO THE PRESENT TIME, FOR THE USE OF STUDENTS

BY

Rev. H. G. BONAVIA HUNT, B.Mus.,

CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD; WARDEN OF TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

"Mr. HUNT has produced a well-arranged and really concise history of the subject with which he deals. The book is divided into three sections, the first of which is a general review of musical epochs and events, while the second presents a series of chronometrical tables, and the third summarises a history of the art. The student 'is warned' in the preface 'that he is not to expect what is called a readable book,' but we feel bound to say that Mr. HUNT's work is, in the proper sense of the word, far more readable than books which attempt to combine valuable information with attractiveness by tricks to which Mr. HUNT has not condescended."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. HUNT has the enviable power of giving much information in few words; he has, therefore, in this small volume, afforded valuable assistance to musical students preparing for competitive examinations, which they could not so easily obtain elsewhere."—Musical Standard.

"It only remains for us to express unqualified approval at the appearance of a work which seems to contain all that is wanted in a study of music. We beg ladies especially to make a note of the work, and to consider whether an historical study of the art ought not to go side by side with its practice."—Educational Times.

ABRAHAM

COMPOSED BY

BERNHARD MOLIQUE.

Octavo, paper cover, 3s.; paper boards, 3s. 6d.; scarlet cloth, 5s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"'Abraham' comes to us a second time with perfectly intelligible and graceful speech; moreover it is the speech of a master who knows the spirit as well as the form of his artistic language, and can commend himself to the mind as well as the ear. Every number in 'Abraham' vouches for this, and it will be a marvel if the reward of so much merit does not come sooner or later in full measure. . . . In the performance of the selection from 'Abraham,' Hereford has rehabilitated a master upon whom neglect has unjustly fallen."

DAILY NEWS.

"The composer's thorough musical training, his command of orchestral and choral effects and contrapuntal resources, and his forcible declamatory writing, renders the work a good specimen of constructive art. . . . It was a step in the right direction to revive an artistic work which has long been unjustly ignored; and which offers so welcome a contrast to the immature and crude manufactures which under the name of novelties so often pass as compositions in these days."

GRAPHIC.

"'Abraham' may be Kapellmeister's music as certain of our advanced instructors insist; but if so we can only retort that Kapellmeister's music is very fine music, and that it would be well if more of such music were vouchsafed to us just now. . . . That more of 'Abraham' will be heard ere long may be taken for granted. . . . Had he written nothing more than 'Abraham,' where the keenest sense of musical expression and a perfect mastery of counterpoint (without a knowledge of which no musician can give fluent utterance to his ideas), and an unmistakable dramatic instinct are apparent, he would take high rank among composers."

NIELS W. GADE

Octavo, paper cover ... .. 2s. 6d.
 „ paper boards ... .. 3s. 0d.
 „ scarlet cloth ... .. 4s. 0d.

Full Orchestral Score in the Press.

TIMES.

“The music of Herr Gade is in perfect keeping with its subject. It is graceful and melodious rather than powerful, and the lyrical portions gain prominence over the tragic motives of the story, which other masters might have emphasised. The music assigned to the heroine, more especially, is marked by a freshness and fluency of conception, which show that the youthful innocence of ‘Psyche’ most immediately appeals to the composer. . . . Herr Gade’s music will be appreciated wherever refinement and grace combined with sound scholarship are valued.”

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

“Its music from first to last was intelligible, and charged with the grace and beauty of the school that, having had Herr Gade as a pupil, now claims him as a professor. . . . From beginning to end we are conscious of that happy union of the classic and the romantic which Mendelssohn and Schumann, each in his degree and manner, so conspicuously illustrate. . . . I cordially endorse the enthusiastic verdict of the Birmingham audience, for, though Herr Gade’s Cantata does not achieve the oft-times questionable feat of marking ‘a new departure,’ it is a thing of beauty that should live long to be a joy.”

DAILY NEWS.

“The vocal and orchestral combinations in this (the closing) scene, as indeed throughout the Cantata, are masterly in the command of dramatic effects and contrasts.”

STANDARD.

“Herr Gade’s ‘Psyche,’ last night, was a legitimate success, and in this work the musical world has been enriched with something likely to endure.”

MORNING POST.

“All that a sympathetic mind could suggest to clothe the story with becoming musical raiment has been done with skill and taste. . . . The Cantata, as a whole work, will be as gladly welcomed by Choral Societies as ‘The Crusaders’ of the same composer. . . . There is some very pleasing writing both for voices and orchestra.”

ATHENÆUM.

“We think ‘Psyche’ likely to be one of the most popular of the composer’s works. It presents no excessive difficulties to the executants, though it undoubtedly requires finished orchestral playing; but even without orchestra it will be found effective, and is well suited for choral societies of fair acquisitions.”

SUNDAY TIMES.

“The second part begins with an exquisite little scherzo, leading to another trio, ‘The birds in playful throng,’ with chorus for the same voices (soprano, alto, and tenor), than which it would be impossible to imagine anything more tuneful and charming, the instrumentation here being simply masterly. . . . The composer conducted, was warmly greeted, and was made the hero of an enthusiastic ovation at the close. In short, a perfect triumph was gained.”

GUARDIAN.

“The music is always graceful and pretty, and admirably constructed. . . . It need hardly be said that Mr. Gade was heartily applauded at the close of the performance; and without doubt ‘Psyche’ must be recorded as one of the great successes of the year 1882.”

MIDLAND COUNTIES HERALD.

“The choral writing is very good, especially at the close of the second and fourth parts, whilst the instrumentation is as bright and elegant as we had a right to expect from this gifted composer.”

WARD'S PIANOFORTE, HARMONIUM, & ORGAN PATENT LAMP.

TESTIMONIALS.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT says: "I have tried Mr. Ward's Patent Lamp, and have much pleasure in testifying to its excellence. It gives a good light, which is concentrated on the music, and it is moreover particularly useful on account of its portability."

Mr. BERTHOLD TOURS says: "It is a most ingenious invention, and only requires to be known to be universally adopted."

Mr. WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS says: "It is by far the best thing of its kind."

The Greatest Living Musicians have been pleased to testify to the superiority of this invention as compared with the present system of lighting by sconces.

As seen above, Ward's Patent Lamp throws a bright light direct upon the Music, and from its neatness and general artistic design is an ornament to the instrument.

Pianists who value their sight should on no account be without it.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of
LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackley Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON's Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

Illustrated Catalogues and Price List forwarded free.

J. & J. HOPKINSON

Invite attention to the following Testimonials :—

I have had occasion to test HOPKINSON's Pianos in London and in Paris, and I am bound to declare that with regard to power, evenness of tone, and equality of touch, I have found them of rare excellence.

They are Instruments that all Pianists ought to appreciate, for they allow them to give expression to their feelings, and to play with the most delicate nuances.

PARIS, July 23, 1878. (Signed) CH. GOUNOD.

I have played at the Paris Exhibition on Messrs. HOPKINSON's Pianos, and I say with pleasure that the quality of sound has completely satisfied me, as well as the elasticity of touch, which leaves nothing to be desired.

(Signed) ANTOINE DE KOTSKI.
July 30, 1878.

I have had the opportunity of trying the excellent Pianos of Messrs. HOPKINSON, whose instruments have the qualities I esteem in a Piano; "they have a soul," which permits the performer to communicate the poetic feeling in his heart, and in the spirit necessary to forget himself in his performances.

(Signed) D. MAGNUS.
PARIS, July 30, 1878.

The Grand Pianos of HOPKINSON, London, are very remarkable. They are equal to those of the best Houses already known. All the qualities which can be demanded by an experienced virtuoso—vigour of attack, openness of sound, possibility to give the necessary shade to the music, and to produce effects of extreme delicacy—are found in HOPKINSON's Pianofortes. They possess also a sonority of a crystalline nature, which gives them a certain charm, and characterises their own personality.

(Signed) NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,

Director of the Conservatoire of Moscow.

PARIS, August 3, 1878.

I state with pleasure that the Grand Pianos of Messrs. J. and J. HOPKINSON of London, which I have had the opportunity of hearing and of trying myself, are remarkable for their fabrication, and that they rival those of the best Houses of Paris and London for their wonderful power and elasticity of touch.

I should wish no other for my personal use, and to accompany me in my concerts.

(Signed) CH. NILSSON.

PATENT ACTION

FOR

Attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

This Action is manufactured solely of mahogany, and in its working is perfectly noiseless, and as weights and springs are not used it is warranted never to get out of order, and will last as long as the Pianoforte. It must be mentioned that the keys of the Piano are not forced up at the back by this Action, but are pulled down in the most natural manner at the place where they are played upon by the fingers. The Inventor, being an Organist, can most confidently recommend his invention to those wishing for real good pedal practice at home.

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte.

TESTIMONIALS.

13, Waltherton Road, St. Peter's Park, London, W.

I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the organ.

It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils.

F. E. GLADSTONE, MUS. DOC., CANTAB.

Dunsham House, Weston-super-Mare.

I have minutely examined Mr. Wm. Chinnock Dyer's Pedals and Action attached to a Piano, and find it in every way satisfactory. The points that strongly recommend his patent are:—

1. Simplicity of action, and therefore no liability of getting out of order.

2. Quick and ready response to the lightest Pedal touch, so that all degrees of tone are readily obtainable.

3. It is perfectly noiseless in working, which character, seeing that no springs are used and that all the centres are carefully bushed, it is likely to retain after constant use.

4. Compared with the roller-board action—which hitherto I have considered the only satisfactory method of attachment—this new action is inexpensive, and it is not in any way less effective.

I believe it only wants to be well known to become the general mode of attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes.

ARTHUR E. CROOK, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.,

Organist of the Parish Church, Weston-super-Mare.

Catterick, Yorkshire.

I have much pleasure in adding my testimony to the great excellence of the Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes, invented by Mr. Wm. Chinnock Dyer, of Weston-super-Mare, and am sure his invention will meet with general satisfaction from Organists and Students.

Being a purchaser I can, from experience, recommend it to Organists and others requiring pedal practice at home to be invaluable.

The Action is perfectly noiseless, works well, and can easily be attached to any Piano or Pedals.

ROBERT MACK, Organist, Parish Church.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

NOVEMBER 1, 1882.

MARTIN GERBERT:

PRIEST, PRINCE, SCHOLAR, AND MUSICIAN.

By FR. NIECKS.

UP to the middle of the last century the history of music remained in a very unsatisfactory condition. Since then, however, this field of knowledge has been cultivated with great diligence and thoroughness. To prove the superiority of the more modern historians we have only to place side by side those who wrote between 1600 and 1750 with those who wrote between 1750 and the present day. On the one hand we find Michael Praetorius, Printz, Bontempi, and Bonnet; on the other hand, Martini, Gerbert, Hawkins, Burney, Forkel, Kiesewetter, Fétis, Winterfeld, Coussemaker, Ambros, and an endless number of biographers and monographists. These names may be safely left to speak for themselves. Among the later group of historians there is none to whom we are more indebted for the firm foundation on which the present generation of historians is building than to Martin Gerbert. A biographical sketch of this remarkable man—remarkable, as we shall see, in more than one respect—may, therefore, not be unwelcome to the reader, although historians, especially those of the severer type, do not inspire so lively a personal interest as composers, singers, and players.

The following facts (in part as yet but little known) I have derived from various sources, of which the most important are Friedrich Schlichtegroll's "Nekrolog auf das Jahr 1793," and Professor Sander's "Reise zu St. Blasien, um Michaelis 1781," in Johann Bernoulli's collection of short accounts of travels. Next in importance are the article "Martin Gerbert," in Gerbert's "Lexicon der Tonkünstler" (1790), Ch. F. Nicolai's "Beschreibung einer Reise durch Deutschland und die Schweiz" (vol. xii.; Berlin, 1796), and Von Böcklin's "Beyträge zur Geschichte der Musik, besonders in Deutschland" (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1790). Joseph Bader's "Fürst-abt Martin Gerbert von S. Blasien" (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1875), though not free from errors, especially in the bibliographical data, is a very interesting and useful publication—treating, however, at greater length of the history of the monastery of St. Blaise than of the biography of Martin Gerbert, discussing more fully political and theological than musical matters. It would take up too much space to mention all the other works I have consulted; the titles of some of them, however, will be given in the course of this sketch.

Martin Gerbert, a descendant of the patrician family the Gerberts of Hornau, which at the time of the Reformation left Basle and settled at Horb on the Neckar, was born in the latter town, where his parents lived in "humble estate" (in gemeinem Stande), on August 12, 1720. After having got, at home and in the school of his native place, a thorough grounding in reading, writing, arithmetic, religion, and also music, he was sent first to a school at Ehingen on the Danube, then to the Latin School at Freiburg in the Breisgau, next to Klingenu in the Aargau, and lastly to St. Blaise in the Black Forest.

The origin of the last-mentioned monastic establishment dates, according to tradition, as far back as the time of the Merovingian Kings, when some anchorites, whom want and danger had driven together, built a cell and chapel on the Steinbach.

Thanks to pious donations in the first centuries of its existence, to advantageous purchases in the later ones, and to clever management at all times, there grew out of this small beginning the famous and wealthy monastery the superior of which styled himself, from 1746 onward, "We, Prince of the Holy Roman Empire and Abbot of St. Blaise, in the Black Forest, Lord of the imperial county of Bonndorf and of the outlying Austrian lordships of Staufen and Kirchhofen, as well as Gurtweil and Oberried, Hereditary Arch-chaplain of his Imperial Majesty in the outlying provinces,* and President of the estate of Prelates therein."

Into the school of the monastery, which had always enjoyed a good reputation, new life was infused, about the time of Gerbert's arrival, by some of the monks who, on returning from the Congregation of St. Maur, in Paris, whither they had been sent to complete their studies, brought with them to St. Blaise a profounder learning, a more elegant taste, and less pedantic methods than had previously been known there. Considering the studious and religious disposition of the youth, it is not to be wondered at that what he saw and heard in the monastery made so favourable an impression upon him as to induce him, in 1736, to enter the Order. His novitiate was not of long duration. Already on September 28, 1737, at the age of seventeen, he made his monastic profession, and on May 30, 1744, he was ordained priest.

Martin Gerbert's talents and love of learning, which had been the admiration of his fellow-students and teachers, did not remain unnoticed by Abbot Meinrad, who appointed the young monk professor, first of philosophy and then of theology, to which latter charge was soon after added that of librarian. During the ten years he held the professorship, his chief attention was naturally given to theology. Indeed, the twenty-two volumes published by him up to 1766 contain exclusively theological works, eight of them forming a complete system of theology, treating respectively of the principles of exegetical, symbolical, mystical, canonical, dogmatical, moral, sacramental, and liturgical theology. But whilst devoting himself mainly to this branch of knowledge, Martin Gerbert did not neglect the others. As a student he had not only diligently pursued the special theological studies, but also cultivated lovingly the Roman and Greek classics, Hebrew, history, modern languages, and music; and now as librarian he availed himself of the advantages of his position, and made strenuous researches into the ecclesiastical and secular history of the middle ages. The rich resources of the library of St. Blaise, however, could not supply all the information needed for the realisation of his projected works on the old Alemannic liturgy and on sacred music from the earliest age of the Church to his own time. Hence the desire grew upon him to consult other storehouses of books and monuments. "Having made up my mind," he wrote some years after, "to publish an account of the ancient liturgy which long ago had been in use in the principal and first countries of Germany which embraced Christianity—these being the only Catholic countries of which such an account does not exist—it appeared to me necessary that I should visit Alemannia." The prospect of literary fame to be gained by the monastery would probably have proved a sufficiently powerful motive to incline the superior to give a promising member of the community leave to travel; but there was another motive which no doubt urged him still more strongly to favour Martin

* It was the Arch-chaplain's duty to betake himself, as often as any member or members of the Imperial family came into these provinces, to their temporary residence, celebrate mass, say grace at table, and perform any other priestly office that circumstances might call for.

Gerbert's wishes. Old Abbot Meinrad had perceived that this monk was possessed of gifts and graces which fitted him for more important and more difficult offices than those of professor and librarian; and as nature seemed to have designated him his successor he began to regard him as such, made him early acquainted with the administration of affairs, and now consented readily to his favourite going abroad, which was the best means of acquiring a knowledge of men and the ways of the world, and an excellent preparation for the duties of prince and abbot. In Schlichtegroll's "Nekrolog auf das Jahr 1793," it is stated that "the abbot educated him, made him study and travel, employed him in affairs, and, in one word, trained him from early youth to be his successor."

Martin Gerbert's first excursion took him to Paris, whither he went by way of Breisach, Moyen-Moutier, Senones, and Flavigni, and whence he returned by way of Compiègne, Clairvaux, Faverney, Luxeuil, and Remiremont. This was in 1759. In the next two years, 1760 and 1761, he explored Alemannia and Suabia in all directions. After this he travelled in Bavaria and Austria; and in 1762 he visited Italy, where his longest sojourn was in Rome. Wherever he went he cultivated the acquaintance of the learned and ransacked the libraries, examining whatever books, manuscripts, inscriptions, gems, antiquities, &c., he could get sight of. His amiability and learning would have secured him a kind reception in any case, but his being a member of a monastic order cannot but have been of great advantage to him. In Rome, where he made very successful researches in the Vatican and other libraries, he must have found even more valuable information than in any other place he visited; for Garampi, the keeper of the papal secret archives, who had been staying for some time at St. Blaise, and had been his companion during part of his travels, was an intimate friend of his, and Braschi, who, in 1775, ascended the papal see as Pius VI., but in 1762 was privy secretary to Clement XIII., sought and loved his company. Martin Gerbert's chief object in searching the Italian libraries was to collect material for a history of music. He himself tells us how he was induced to undertake such a work. "The love of music," he says, "I sucked in with my mother's milk, and from early youth I applied myself to the acquirement of this art, even when severer studies occupied me. But it was by the precious St. George's codex, which contained the five books de musica by St. Severin,* besides other similar treatises, which had lately been brought to St. Blaise in order to be printed there, that I was incited to realise my early conceived project of writing a history of music." Martin Gerbert went so far south as Naples, and in Northern Italy visited, among other places, Verona, Padua, Venice, and Bologna. His visit to the last-mentioned town brought him in personal contact with one of the most remarkable musical characters of the last century—namely, with Padre Martini, who was the oracle of his age, and whose fame for learning has not been equalled by any other theorist, teacher, or composer. But although the two men now saw each other for the first time, they had been for years in correspondence. Without jealousy they imparted their treasures and knowledge to each other, and thus they were made doubly productive. Who can help admiring the noble and beautiful example, and regretting the rareness of its imitation? Gerbert says, in the account of his travels ("Iter alemanicum, accedit italicum et gallicum"): "From Ferrara I went to Bologna, where I called at once on Giovanni Battista Martini, of the Order of St. Francis. Many matters concerning the history of music we had already discussed by letter. We divided the labour amicably between us, so that he undertook the investigation of the history of music generally, but I particularly that of sacred music from the earliest age of the Church down to the present time. I was astonished at the number of 17,000 authors on the theory and practice of music which this industrious man has collected. Nevertheless, I gave him—I say it without boasting—out of my collection, for the most part made in German libraries, several authors which in my opinion are of greater service than many things in his own store. We compared our treasures and communicated them to each other." Padre Martini's library assumes a still more imposing aspect if we take into account that in these 17,000 works the musical compositions were not included, and that among them were 500 manuscripts. In the formation of this rare as well as extensive collection he had been assisted by his admirers, more especially by his friend Farinelli (Carlo Broschi), the famous singer, who also is said to have induced him to undertake the "Storia della musica" (3 vols., 1757, 1770, and 1781). Burney speaks of the padre's library, more especially of the MSS., with the greatest enthusiasm: "Besides his immense collection of printed books, which cost him upwards of a thousand zechins, P. Martini is in possession of what no money can purchase, MSS. and copies of MSS. in the Vatican and Ambrosian libraries, and in those of Florence, Pisa, and other places, for which he has had a faculty granted him by the Pope, and particular permission from others in power." (See "Present State of Music in France and Italy," pp. 194, &c.)

Gerbert, according to Gerber, made his musico-historical project known to the world in 1762, and asked for contributions complementary of his materials, a request which was not disregarded. On July 31, 1762, Marpurg published this prospectus—the title and contents of the work—in the "Kritische Briefe," vol. ii., pp. 313, &c. (not, as Gerber and Fétis say, in vol. i.), introducing it with these words: "He made latterly known to the public by a printed intimation the detailed contents of his work, which, as it may not be in many hands in these parts, I cannot refrain from here inserting." From a letter written by Father Heer, a monk of St. Blaise, on September 16, 1763, we learn various things concerning Gerbert's doings, achievements, and intentions: "Our Father Martin sojourned three months in Rome and still longer in Vienna, and in the interval visited Naples and Montecassino. His autores de musica inediti have now run up to 50, but he edits only one-half of them." Although Gerbert was already, in 1763, so far advanced with the collecting of materials, his two great works on music, "Concerning Chant and Sacred Music from the earliest age of the Church to the present time" ("De cantu et musica sacra a prima ecclesie aetate usque ad praesens tempus") and the "Ecclesiastical Writers on Music, chiefly sacred" ("Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum"), were not published till 1774 and 1784 respectively. The long postponement of the publication was owing to several causes: the difficulty of the task, the change which took place in the author's position, and the fire which in 1768 destroyed the monastery, and consumed, along with other treasures, the incomparable St. George's codex and the whole apparatus Gerbert had collected on his travels. In writing of this misfortune he says: "My only consolation after this painful loss was the circumstance that the first part of the 'History of Music' had already passed through the press, and that copies of the treatises contained in the codex were elsewhere to be found."

* This codex belonged to the St. George's Monastery of Villingen, in Würtemberg. The five books de musica here mentioned are those by Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus Boethius, who may not generally be known as a saint.

The change in Gerbert's position above alluded to took place on October 15, 1764, when, Meinrad having died, he was elected abbot by his fellow-monks. What the new abbot, Martin II., thought of this change we learn from a letter which he wrote soon after his consecration to the Abbot of St. George's of Villingen: "My account of my travels is still in the press, for everything is going slowly. I shall not be able to publish anything beyond what I had already formerly prepared, in the happy days, before they had torn me out of my literary leisure, wherein I was so content with my lot, knowing no other wish than that of remaining undisturbed therein. But now I see myself transported as it were into a strange part of the world, and this unfortunately at a time when the Church and her servants are threatened by the greatest dangers."

Abbot Martin II. of St. Blaise reminds me in more than one respect of Abbot Samson of St. Edmundsbury, whose portrait Carlyle sketches so vividly in "Past and Present." The divergencies of their character, it is true, are not inconsiderable; but they arise rather from the different conditions of the times they lived in, and from the different experiences they had gone through in the earlier part of their lives, than from fundamental differences in their original dispositions. Of Abbot Martin it could not be said, as of Abbot Samson, that he was a man "whom no severity would break to complain, and no kindness soften into smiles or thanks." But then he never had to do battle with adversity: neither had he to beg his bread on his journeys through foreign lands, nor was he put in chains by his superior. No wonder the monk of St. Blaise was less stern than his brother of St. Edmundsbury. The similarity of their character, however, is greater than the dissimilarity. The love of learning and hatred of shams were equally strong in both. They were untainted by vain ambition, and would have preferred remaining in the humbler position of librarian; but, being called to the higher one, they performed its duties with all their might. What Jocelin of Brakelond, and after him Carlyle, says of Abbot Samson's "right, honest, unconscious feeling, without insolence as without fear or flutter, of what he and what others are," of "his courage to quell the proudest," his "honest pity to encourage the humblest," of "his noble reticence," and of "his patience to hear unreason, and lay it up without response," and much more besides might be literally applied to Abbot Martin. Nay, did not the latter actually speak some such words as are reported of the other: "I wish, too, that every monk of you have free access to me, to speak of your needs and grievances when you will." And would not the abbot of the twelfth century have judged as he of the eighteenth who decided that the right of succession in a leasehold was no longer to belong to the youngest, but to the worthiest son, and to the youngest only if all were equally worthy? Although Abbot Martin was a pious and truly religious man, passing three hours every morning in prayer and self-contemplation, and also saying mass before taking up his other occupations, he was more liberal-minded and enlightened than any of his predecessors. Indeed, some of the older monks did not at all approve of the relaxation of the former rigour, and no doubt would have made opposition had it not been for the esteem, admiration, and fear with which their superior inspired them. "Monasteries," he held, "should be workshops of learned industry; and their inmates should disprove the contemptuous reproach of an idle, useless life by scientific works." He tried to inculcate into the community at the head of which he was placed that their Order was not merely an order of obedience, prayer, and repentance, but also an order of useful activity. The sciences were, in his opinion, the fairest treasure and ornament of monasteries. No sooner had the abbot issued and put in force his new regulations for the conduct of the monks than he set himself to improve the method of teaching in the school of the monastery. The nature of his innovations might have been foretold from certain remarks in the "Iter alemannicum, &c." He says that this diary was written with the intention of encouraging his fellow-monks to devote themselves with steady application and wise discrimination to art and science, "to shake off the old scholastic school dust, and to discontinue the pseudo-erudite disputes from which never any good can result either for Church or State." He recommended most strenuously the banishment of all mechanism from the teaching manuals, and among other excellent advice he gave the teachers was this: to make the pupils acquainted with the literature of each of the sciences they were learning, so that after leaving school they might continue their studies by themselves.

In his endeavours to ameliorate the condition of his secular subjects, Prince-Abbot Martin was indefatigable. New roads were made, the country schools were put into a state of efficiency, a bank for the safe investment of the capital of orphans was founded, a hospital was built, wool-spinning and muslin-embroidery were introduced, the extravagant number of holidays was reduced, &c., &c. Nor did the prince-abbot's efforts for the well-being, present and future, of his subjects stop here. He prescribed regular attendance at church on Sundays and holidays, prohibited blaspheming and swearing, the tending of cattle, &c., by young people of both sexes promiscuously, the superstitious and dangerous ringing of church bells during thunderstorms; prohibited, likewise, coffee-drinking and smoking to all persons under twenty-four years of age, and other things endangering the peace, safety, health, morality, and salvation of the people. The way in which he sometimes exercised his paternal government may, seen in the light of the nineteenth century, raise a smile; but his intentions, it must be admitted, were good, and so were also, in the majority of instances, the results. In short, under Martin II.'s administration the monastery and its school became model institutions of their kind, and the country enjoyed more order and greater prosperity than it had ever done before.

The course of the prince-abbot's reign, although on the whole smooth, was not invariably so. The destruction by fire of the monastery and church, in 1768, must have been a terrible blow to the religious community of St. Blaise, and more especially to their head. But, in the case of a man of Abbot Martin's mettle, the painfulness of the occurrence and its consequences were compensated by the pleasure arising from the display of energy and from the realisation of practical and artistic ideas, for which now ample opportunities offered. Already, in 1771, the dwellings of the new monastery were finished, and, ten years later, also the church, one of the finest in Germany, an imitation of Maria della Rotonda in Rome. According to Professor Sander, about a million of florins were spent in building the new monastery and the church, this estimate including 17,000 florins for the organ, a finely-toned instrument of fifty stops, by the old Silbermann. Abbot Martin never considered any expenditure for the library too great. That he now took good care that the architect (Pigage) should provide a worthy and convenient receptacle for his treasures may be easily imagined. The new library consisted of a cheerful, well-lit hall, with a gallery and sixteen adjoining cabinets. "In the cabinets," we learn from the above-quoted authority, "a great quantity of books can be put up, and, thanks to the galleries, large ladders may be dispensed with. . . . The cabinet of coins is beside the library." Nicolai, who, like Sander, visited St. Blaise in 1781, furnishes some more particulars. He relates that the library of the new monastery was put up in a spacious hall, with adjoining cabinets, which were richly stored with coins, engravings, and minerals, as well as with books. The latter belonged for the most part to the departments of theology, history, and diplomacy; German literature, excepting Gellert's works, was hardly represented at all.

The differences which the prince-abbot, who was a subject as well as a prince, had with the Austrian Government on account of increased taxation, curtailments of his sovereign rights, and interferences with the conventual regulations (for instance, the duration of the novitiate) were troubles unmixed with pleasurable emotions, and therefore of a more vexatious and grievous kind than those caused by the conflagration. During the life of Maria Theresa things were easily made smooth by a little diplomacy, for the abbot was a great favourite of the Empress. But all was changed when her son Joseph II., the reformer, the enemy of priestcraft and monachism, took the reins of government into his hands. The last years of the abbot's life were indeed more and more embittered by the tendencies of the age. They made him tremble for the safety of Church and State, for he was a believer in papal infallibility, and regarded with abhorrence the freedom of the press and the then flourishing "enlightenment." Jansenism found in him a ruthless opponent. The state of his mind is reflected in the works which he produced in those years (1789-1793), in the "Church Militant" ("Ecclesia militans, regnum Christi in terris, in suis fatis representata"), the "Reflections on the Present Dangerous State of the Church" ("De periclitante hodierno ecclesia statu, praesertim in Gallia"), &c., &c. The sweetness and evenness of temper which distinguished Martin Gerbert during the greater part of his life seem to have given way at last to an inborn but hitherto well-mastered irritability. Death, ushered in by inflammation of the chest and dropsy, laid his hand upon him on May 13, 1793, and removed him, we may say, out of a world with which he felt no longer in harmony and where his work was done.

The following extracts from Sander's "Journey to St. Blaise, about Michaelmas, 1781," interspersed with supplementary and explanatory notes derived from other sources, will picture to us the ways and appearance of the abbot and his surroundings. Thus we shall be enabled to realise more fully the character of the man, his influence, and his work:—

"St. Blaise is a real palace, wherein one finds the longest passages and the largest halls, and an infinite number of rooms. In order to facilitate the search for the monks and the strangers an animal is painted above every door. In the middle storey the quadrupeds, in the upper the birds, are depicted by master hands. There you can live with the lion, with the cat, with the elephant, with the parrot. . . . In the monastery visitors have rooms, cabinets, the necessary furniture, good beds, and all possible attendance and attention. St. Blaise is a large establishment, but everywhere one sees order, regularity, good arrangements, and a certain fixed plan which is never swerved from. The motive spirit of the prince governs everywhere, and spreads from the anointed head to all the members. In this house very much is done every day, and the calmness and quietness which should dwell therein are not disturbed thereby. I have not noticed here at all some things which I was sorry to see in other much smaller monasteries, and indeed have spent here five days with great pleasure and much profit." Although living in the monastery, our professor did not feel as if he were cut off from the world. "One is here surrounded by monks, but their knowledge goes beyond the narrow bounds of the cell. One suffers want in no respect; but then the whole way of thinking of this religious society is attuned to higher things than eating and drinking. Earthly high-living and spiritual idleness is by no means the dominant tone at St. Blaise. . . . The holy exercises which are prescribed by the Order are practised without exception and at all times, day and night. But also the remaining time is filled up, and the less the inclemency of the climate, the severity of the weather, and the disagreeable situation of the monastery allows of other amusements and diversions, the more the industry of the monks confines itself, after the example of their worthy and wise superior, to books, documents, collections, manuscripts, medals, monuments of ancient history, objects of natural history, coins, and maps. The enlightened prince tests their capacities and distributes the work. Every one has his day's work and destination. Some are occupied at least in copying the erudite works of their superior, in printing them, and in correcting the proofs." In short, the relation of Abbot Martin to the conventuals was, as the necrologist describes it, that of an experienced and pious father to his sons and friends, who were intrusted to his guidance in order to be led to an activity profitable to religion and civilisation.

A COMPARISON OF THE ORIGINAL AND REVISED SCORES

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. 8—"What have I to do with thee?" The differences between the MS. and printed score in this number are very numerous and important. Noticing that the former is marked "Allegro agitato" instead of "Andante agitato," we observe also that the original time was 3-4, and not 6-8—a variation which materially alters the character of the music. Apart from this, and the fact that the repeated notes for strings are quavers, not semiquavers, the orchestral introduction is as we now have it up to the fifth bar. At that point, instead of a lead-up to the exclamation, "What have I to do with thee?" the soprano voice enters, echoing the oboe phrase upon the words, "Help me, man of God." The recitative in the printed score is, therefore, an addition. From the beginning of the passage just indicated to the cadence in B minor both versions are substantially the same, but thence to the end of the Widow's solo they are entirely different. The solo is thus continued in the MS.:—

The musical score is for the vocal solo "Help me, man of God." It features three staves: a vocal line (soprano), an oboe line, and a string line. The vocal line begins with the lyrics "Help . . . me," and is marked with a fermata. The oboe line plays a melodic phrase that the voice echoes. The string line provides harmonic support, marked with a forte (sf) dynamic. The key signature has one flat (B minor), and the time signature is 6/8.

Help me, . . man of God, my son is sick.

At this point occurs a short unaccompanied recitative—

For if thou wilt, he still by thy pow'r may be as-sist-ed.

immediately after which Elijah exclaims, "Give me thy son," and the prayer, "Turn unto her," follows, with some variations from the printed score. Passing over slight differences in the orchestration, it should be noted that the theme of the Andante begins on the latter half of the first bar, and that the first clause of the second phrase is the same as that with which the melody opens. From bar 9 to the end of the prayer the versions differ materially, as a glance at the original will show:—

For Thou art gra-cious

Here the Widow interposes with the question, "Wilt thou indeed shew wonders to the dead?" and again we find the two scores completely at variance. Originally the passage stood thus:—

Wilt thou indeed shew wonders to the dead? Say, shall the dead arise and praise thee? say, shall the dead arise and praise thee?

(Elijah.) Lord, my God, . .

The second prayer, "Lord, my God," follows, with the trombones accompanying, and then we once more arrive at a passage which the printed score shows to have been rewritten. In the MS. the music to "The Lord hath heard thy prayer" runs as subjoined:—

The Lord hath heard thy pray - er, the soul of my son re - viv - eth, my

At this point occurs a short recitative for the Widow and Elijah— following which comes the passage "Now by this I know," the melody being the same as in the printed score up to bar 5, where, in the MS., the number abruptly ends with a cadence set to the first words of the succeeding chorus:—

This leads directly into the chorus "Blessed are the men who fear Him."

Few examples of more thorough change than that which Mendelssohn caused this scene to undergo can be adduced. Fewer still so forcibly illustrate the adage, "Second thoughts are best."

No. 9—Chorus, "Blessed are the men who fear Him." The leading theme shows a marked variation in the MS. from what it is as printed. The first two bars run thus:—

Further important differences are apparent as soon as the subject is taken up by the tenors. A comparison of the subjoined extract with the corresponding passage of the printed score will show their character:—

In the MS. the second subject, instead of being given to the sopranos alone, is harmonised for the three upper parts:—

The basses echo the phrase, as now, but with varied harmony—and then comes a passage which Mendelssohn cut out bodily, substituting for the eighteen excised bars no more than four:—

The ensemble on the words "He is gracious, compassionate," &c., offers another variation, standing thus in the MS. :—

From this point to the end of the chorus in the printed score is 27 bars, in the MS. no more than 15, so that if Mendelssohn took away in one place he restored the balance by additions in another. As the original differs wholly from the revise, the 15 bars are here given :—

In this chorus we have another striking example of the thoroughness with which the master worked at his self-imposed task of alteration and improvement.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

WE have referred to the preparations made by Rossini's enemies on account of "Il Barbiere," and several independent accounts of the first performance give a clear idea of what they resulted in. The overture proper, not the one now associated with the work, was scarcely listened to, a murmur of excitement filling the house. Presently the storm broke. Garcia played Almaviva, and in the serenade scene introduced a Spanish air, arranged by himself. As, however, his guitar was out of tune, and a string broke in screwing up, the audience began to laugh and hiss; subsequently proceeding to imitate the song with all manner of absurd exaggeration. "Largo al factotum" passed unheard amid the din, while afterwards a series of accidents intensified the ridicule and hilarity of the house. Vitarelli (Don Basilio) stumbled and fell on making his entry, and began singing with a handkerchief to his nose. Then, in the finale of Act I., a cat came upon the stage, and had to be chased off, amid convulsions of laughter. It is not wonderful that Rossini, who, as usual, presided in the orchestra, felt greatly annoyed; but he did not exhibit his usual prudence in turning round, when the curtain fell, shrugging his shoulders at the people, and showing his contempt for their verdict by applauding. The result of this injudicious act was that not a note was afterwards heard for uproar. But the master refused to lose his temper again. When all was over he returned home and went to bed, where he was found fast asleep by certain of the artists who called to condole with him. In the morning he got up, wrote "Ecco ridente in cielo," to replace the Spanish air, and went back to bed again, determined that the second performance should take care of itself. By that time the Romans thought it might be as well to hear the music. They listened accordingly; with what result let M. Azevedo tell :—

"While they sang 'Il Barbiere' without him, the master remained quietly in his apartment, chatting with some guests about the terrible vicissitudes which composers have to undergo. All at once a noise was heard in the distance; it drew nearer, and the name of Rossini could be distinguished above the tumult. Doubt was no longer possible; the exasperated public had come to give the author of the work so abundantly hissed a bad quarter of an hour. Rossini himself believed that they would set fire to the house. But friendly voices soon reassured him. The people had heard the first act, and, being ravished, sought the composer, whom they conducted to the theatre in triumph, by the light of torches, and there applauded and acclaimed as much as on the previous evening they had hissed and contemned. For Rossini the Tarpeian Rock was not near the Capitol, but the Capitol near the Tarpeian Rock. He began by suffering, to finish by triumph. But one less strong might have been broken in the process."

Thus did genius assert itself, and an immortal work, which sprang without effort from a brain surcharged with all that constitutes musical inspiration, set out on its jubilant course. It is needless to dwell upon the beauties of "Il Barbiere." Enough that the opera will go down to remotest posterity as the most superb example of Italian lyric comedy, alike by reason of its melodic grace and invention, its gaiety, and its unflagging humour.

From Rome the master returned to Naples, and found the San Carlo a heap of ruins, the theatre having been destroyed by fire. This did not interfere with his engagement to Barbaja, who, like an enterprising impresario, had two other houses at command. The Del Fondo was one, and there, in June of the remarkable year 1816, Rossini produced a Cantata, "Teti è Peleo," for the fêtes connected with the Duchesse de Berry's marriage. Although of small dimensions, being about equal to one act of an opera, Barbaja's best artists—such as Colbrand, Dardanelli, Nozzari, and Porto—played in it, and achieved as much success as a mere pièce d'occasion could be expected to afford. Following this came a two-act opera, "La Gazette," written for the Fiorentini, where the famous buffo, Casaccia, was engaged. In this instance the master returned to the old style of such works, in order to accommodate the principal artist. According to one biographer, "La Gazette" made little effect; but M. Azevedo, speaking after a study of the pianoforte score, asserts that it "ought to be very diverting when played by good artists." The question is of small account, and we pass it the more readily because the next opera awaiting notice is "Otello," which was produced at the Del Fondo in the autumn of 1816, with Colbrand as Desdemona, Nozzari as the Moor, and Davide as Rodrigue. Strange to say, the success of this work, which still lives to attest its composer's genius, was not immediate. The Neapolitans found it too sombre and tragic for their taste, and not the Neapolitans alone. When "Otello" was transferred to Rome in 1817, the catastrophe had to be entirely removed. The Moor, it is true, seized the fatal pillow, but on Desdemona exclaiming, "What doest thou, miserable man? I am innocent," he asked, "Is that really true?" and, receiving the reply, "I swear it," brought the lady to the footlights, where both sang a lively piece from Rossini's "Armida." That the opera was not a decided failure at the outset of its career appears from the action of Barbaja, who brought it out in the new San Carlo. This fresh appeal to public taste proved entirely successful, and "Otello," no longer too shocking for Neapolitan nerves, entered upon its brilliant career. As a point of interest, it may here be stated that the Roman ending of "Otello" was in vogue as late as 1823. In that year M. Edouard Bertin wrote, concerning a performance witnessed by him: "Davide, considering apparently that the final duet of 'Otello' did not sufficiently show off his voice, determined to substitute for it a duet from 'Armida,' which is very pretty, but anything rather than severe. As it was impossible to kill Desdemona to such a tune, the Moor, after giving way to the most violent jealousy, sheathes his dagger and begins, in the most tender and graceful manner, his duet with Desdemona, at the conclusion of which he takes her by the hand and retires, amidst the applause and 'Bravos' of the public, who seem to think it quite natural that the piece should finish in this manner, or, rather, that it should not finish at all; for, after this beautiful dénouement, the action is about as far advanced as it was in the first scene." M. Bertin was clearly wrong in his explanation of the change; but the fact that it should have survived and been applauded for seven years makes us wonder how Rossini, catering for a public so careless of dramatic propriety, could have gone as far as he did in the direction of better things. To what heights might the author of "Guillaume Tell" have risen had his early years been spent amid a people less tolerant of absurdities! "Otello" shows a further development of the reforms begun in "Tancredi." The music of each scene is continuous; the recitatives are all freely accompanied by the orchestra, and the employment of two choruses in the first finale marks a step towards the impressive combinations of a later time. Moreover, provision in the score for four horns and three trombones foreshadowed an orchestra such as the Italians then had no conception of.

Hardly had the costumes worn in "Otello" lost their freshness before our indefatigable master was in Rome, carrying out an engagement made with Signor Cartoni, of the Valle Theatre. Cartoni had offered him 300 Roman crowns (about £62) for music to an opera written by Ferretti, and entitled "Cenerentola, ossia la Bontà in trionfo"; undertaking also to board the composer during his stay in the Eternal City. The impresario was a grocer, and it is said he supplied Rossini's table with such strong and highly spiced food—thinking, perhaps, to give his ideas pungency—that the master fell ill, and was ordered to modify the incendiary character of his diet. Rossini had his new work ready for the Carnival of 1817; when it was produced with success, notwithstanding a performance distinguished rather by the absence than the presence of merit. A noteworthy feature in "Cenerentola" is the studied absence of all the fairy effects and supernatural "business," plentifully found in the piece—Etienne's "Cendrillon"—from which the libretto was adapted. It is said that this was owing to Rossini's own action; he demanding "the complete suppression of the marvellous," and requiring that the French féerie should be "reduced to the proportions of a simple comedy—a dramma giocoso—where all the situations are brought about and worked out by purely natural means." The reason here assigned was not, however, that put forward by Ferretti, the librettist, in a preface to his book, where we read: "If 'Cenerentola' do not present itself before you in company with a magician prolific of phantasmagoria, or with a talking cat, and if at the ball it does not lose a slipper, as at the Théâtre Français or in some large Italian house, you ought not to consider that as high treason, but rather as a necessity of the Valle stage." Rossini's objection was probably the true reason, and had its foundation, no doubt, in practical wisdom; for the Italian stage of that day was incapable of elaborate scenic effects. We shall see, by-and-by, how near a ridiculous artifice came to ruining "Mosè in Egitto." With regard to the music of "Cenerentola," Mr. Sutherland Edwards has happily said that it "belongs to the composite order of architecture." In point of fact, Rossini built up the opera much as Handel constructed some of his oratorios—by fitting together fragments from other works; the only difference being that in the Italian master's case the other works were all his own. That other writers for the lyric stage have done the same—even Wagner is suspected of having used in "Parsifal" portions of his once projected "Christus"—may be no justification; but the real question is whether any justification is required when, as in Rossini's case, the effect is happy. Who has ever complained because Handel's lovely air "Lord remember David" originally figured in "Sosarme," or because the still more beautiful "Holy, holy," is the "Dove sei amato bene" of "Rodelinda"? "Cenerentola" did not meet with the success of "Il Barbiere" for reasons connected rather with the subject than with the music; and from Rome the incessantly active master hurried to Milan, where another great task awaited him.

His business in the Lombardian capital was to write an opera for La Scala, the book entitled "La Gazza Ladra" having been prepared by a lawyer named Gherardini. The remuneration agreed upon was £96. The subject, as is well known, was found in a French melodrama, "La Pie Voleuse," and is a good subject enough for an opera of domestic interest, but Gherardini was altogether a raw hand, having never before written a line for the stage. This led Rossini to remark, with his customary humour, "In consideration of your great experience at the bar, I leave you free to deal with the Trial Scene as you please; but, for the rest, I desire that you will follow my indications." Gherardini, not being proud, accepted these conditions, and the two men worked together comfortably. The master had resolved to make a special effort in "La Gazza Ladra." He could not forget the indifferent reception of "Aureliano" and "Turco" by the Milanese public, whom he resolved now to subdue, if that were at all possible. Looking at the vast space of La Scala, the way to victory showed itself. He would give the orchestra a splendour of sonority and a measure of importance in the general scheme such as the Milanese had never known. At the very beginning of the overture, therefore, he introduced two side-drums, answering each other from opposite sides of the orchestra, in the now well-known, but then novel and surprising, manner. A propos to this, a good story is told by Mr. Edwards in his biography of the master:—

"One young man in the pit—a student of music, and a pupil of Rolla, the leader of the orchestra—went almost into convulsions on hearing the drums, and wished to take summary vengeance on the composer who had ventured to introduce such instruments into an operatic orchestra. The youthful conservative, with all the ardour of an Italian revolutionist, swore that he would have Rossini's blood, and went about with a stiletto in the hope of meeting him. The master of this vehement orchestral purist warned Rossini that he meant mischief; but Rossini was so much amused at the idea of any one wishing to assassinate him because in an overture of a military character he had introduced a couple of drums, that he got Rolla to bring him and the young man together. Then, in a humble tone, he set forth his reasons for introducing the instruments which had so irritated the student's susceptible ears, and ended by promising never to offend in a similar manner again. For which or a better reason Rossini never afterwards began an overture with a duet for drums."

There were other objectors besides this young man, and, strangely enough, some protested against the light themes introduced into serious situations, one example of which offence even Stendhal declines to champion. Indeed, that biographer protests that in none of his operas has Rossini been guilty of so many faults of sense and feeling as in "La Gazza Ladra." The explanation is, perhaps, that the master, for all his desire to astonish the Milanese, wrought hurriedly. On this point the publisher Ricordi is a witness, assuring Stendhal that Rossini composed one of the most important duets in his back shop, and in less than an hour, while all sorts of business was being transacted around him. Yet the opera was an enormous success. Stendhal attended the first performance, and says:—

"It was one of the most unanimous and most brilliant triumphs that I have ever witnessed, and the enthusiasm sustained itself for three months. . . . After having applauded (the overture) to the utmost, shouting and making all the noise imaginable during five minutes; and when unable to do any more, I observed that each person spoke to his neighbour—a thing quite opposed to Italian mistrust. Men of all ages and temperaments cried in the boxes: 'O bello! O bello!' repeating the words twenty times running. . . . These transports had all the vivacity, all the charm, of a reconciliation. . . . Thenceforward the representation was nothing but a scene of enthusiasm. At each piece Rossini was obliged to rise several times and salute the public from his place at the piano, and he appeared sooner tired of doing this than the public did of applauding."

Leaving Milan early in 1817, Rossini returned to Naples, and there composed "Armida" for the San Carlo. Thence he went to Rome and produced "Adelaida di Biergegna" at the Torre Argentina, this occupying him till February 3, 1818, between which time and March 22, he was bound to prepare an "oratorio" for the Lenten stage of the southern capital. We ought not, perhaps, to be surprised at any achievement of Rossini after the composition of "Il Barbiere," but the rapidity with which he composed "Mosè in Egitto" is astonishing nevertheless. According to some authorities, the master called in help for the first time; Carafa writing certain recitatives and also Pharaoh's air, "Arispettar mi." Allowing for this the labour was immense, especially taking into account the often serious and elevated character of the music. As to this, Rossini succeeded in puzzling as well as surprising the Neapolitan amateurs. To illustrate the plague of darkness he wrote an orchestral piece so unlike Italian music that gossip assigned it to a German composer whom some went so far as to name. M. Azevedo tells us that a copy of the movement was actually sent for identification to the musician in question, who promptly replied that it was not his and that he had never produced anything so beautiful in his life. The "oratorio" was a success, imperilled, however, by the ridiculous scene of the passage of the Red Sea. So badly was this managed that persons in the pit saw the waters standing, defiant of natural laws, six feet above the level of the shore; while those higher up could amuse themselves by watching boys make waves with green baize, and perform the miracle of dividing the deep. All through the season this effect produced roars of laughter, and it was not till the revival of the piece in 1819 that Rossini ennobled the situation and distracted the attention of the audience by introducing his famous Prayer. Stendhal tells the story of this immortal inspiration, on the authority of a friend who was a witness:—

"The day before that fixed for the reprise of 'Mosè,' one of my friends found himself, about noon, at the house of Rossini, who, as usual, was idling in bed, giving audience to a score of callers, when, to the great joy of all, Tortola (author of the libretto) appeared, crying 'Master, I have saved the third act!' 'And what hast thou done, my poor friend?' replied Rossini, imitating the manner—half burlesque, half pedantic—of the man of letters. 'They will laugh in our faces, as usual.' 'Master, I have written a prayer for the Hebrews before crossing the Red Sea.' Thereupon the poor poet took from his pocket a roll of papers and gave them to Rossini, who began to read some scrawl on the margin of the principal one. Tortola bowed and smiled during this process: 'Master, the work of an hour!' he repeated in a low voice every few moments. Rossini looked at him: 'The work of an hour, eh?' The poet, trembling and more than ever fearful of some pleasantry, shrank within himself, and, with a forced smile, answered 'Yes, signor.' 'Well, if thou hast taken an hour to write this prayer, I am going to compose the music in a quarter of an hour.' Saying this, Rossini leaped out of bed, sat at a table in his shirt, and wrote the music to the prayer of Moses in eight or ten minutes at most, without a piano, and amid the conversation of his friends, carried on at the top of their voices, after the Italian fashion. 'There is thy music,' said he to the poet, who disappeared; and then, leaping into bed, he laughed with us at the frightened air of Tortola."

Here Stendhal takes up the narrative on his own account:—

"On the morrow I did not omit going to San Carlo. Applause greeted the first act, as usual, but when the third came, bringing the passage of the Red Sea, everybody prepared to laugh. Laughter had actually begun in the pit, when Moses commenced a new air, 'Dal tuo stellato soglio.' It was a prayer which the people repeated in chorus after Moses. Surprised by this novelty, the pit listened, and the mirth ceased. Aaron continued; the people singing after him. Finally, Elcia addressed to heaven the same petition, the people answering as before, and all threw themselves on their knees with enthusiasm. Then the miracle took place; the sea dividing and leaving a path for the protected ones of the Lord. This last part is in the major. It is impossible to describe the thunder-peal which rolled through the house. . . . Never have I seen such excitement or such a success."

Thenceforward the Italian career of "Mosè" was like sailing over summer seas. We shall meet with the work again when we follow Rossini to Paris, where its ultimate form was taken.

An opera, in one act, "Adina o il Califfo di Bagdad," followed the sacred work, and was written at the request of a Portuguese gentleman, who paid for it one hundred louis d'or. Having completed this trifle, Rossini composed a serious opera, "Ricciardo è Zoraïde," for the autumn season, 1818, at San Carlo. Here he carried the florid style of vocal music to an excess, and went far to confirm a reaction against it, of which, some months later, he took advantage in his "Ermione," a work more nearly allied to the severe school of Gluck than to that of which Rossini was the brightest ornament. A cantata, "Parthénope," composed for Mdle. Colbrand, to sing on a special occasion, completed the master's labours for 1818.

The year 1819 opened with a characteristic incident. Rossini, being entreated by the manager of the San Benedetto at Venice to write him an opera, replied that his Neapolitan engagement did not permit him to be absent long enough for the composition of an original piece, but that he would visit Venice for a few days and arrange a centone, which is a piece compounded—like the late Mr. Gardner's oratorio "Judah"—of selections from other works, with, of course, recitatives specially written for the dialogue of the book. Under these conditions "Eduardo è Christina" came into existence, Rossini receiving for the expenses of his journey and trouble the sum of £64. Such are the facts of the case as told by Azevedo; but Stendhal has a very different story to relate. According to him, Rossini was so infatuated with a Neapolitan lady that he would not leave the city—had the Venetian libretto sent to him, and quieted the Venetian manager from time to time by sending him instalments of beautiful music for the new work—with strangely altered words, it is true, but that did not signify. Nine days before the theatre opened the master arrived in Venice, and all went well till, at the performance, it was noticed that a Neapolitan gentleman present was able to sing all the airs before the artists. When asked how he could know new music before hearing it, he replied, "They are playing 'Ricciardo' and 'Ermione,' which we had in Naples six months ago. I want to know why you changed the title." The news soon spread, and the good-humoured Venetians laughed. Not so the manager. Alarmed for the result, he reproached Rossini, who coolly answered, "I promised thee music which should be applauded. This is successful, and what more dost thou want? If thou hadst had common sense, thou wouldst have perceived, from the state of the copies, that it was old music I sent thee from Naples. Bah! for a manager, who ought to be a rogue and a half, thou art only a fool." Azevedo contends that much of this, notably the scene between impresario and composer, is untrue, positively affirming that the character of the piece was agreed upon and that the manager could not have been surprised at what he knew all about. Between these authorities we shall not attempt to decide; wishing to believe the one, and fully conscious that the other has a good deal of verisimilitude to back up his tale. The reported speech to the manager must, if untrue, have been invented by a man not wholly unacquainted with him upon whom it was fathered.

BALFE.

IN another column is a report of the unveiling of a tablet in Westminster Abbey in memory of Michael William Balfe, known to fame in this country as a composer of ballads and English ballad-operas. The operas of Balfe were decidedly an advance on the melodramas, or dramas with music, patronised by a preceding generation of Englishmen. The æsthetical culture, however, of the present day has so outgrown the style of the "Enchantress" and "Bohemian Girl" that there are many who will look at the honours now paid to the composer as an ill-judged concession either to the enthusiasm of a few admirers and contemporaries of Balfe, or to popular if not vulgar musical tastes. It will be asked, and it has been asked, If Balfe is to have a monument in the Abbey side by side with the memorials of all that is greatest and best in the long line of British statesmen, poets, heroes, and philosophers, why not pay the same honour to Vincent Wallace?—and where are we to draw the line?—and how are we to find space in the national mausoleum for such a possible increase in what the late Dean Stanley referred to with a certain degree of dismay as "the existing number of cenotaphs"? The best answer to the main query is that where the merit in an individual is not so great as to remove all question, the next point to consider is the representative character of the merit. Canon Duckworth, in unveiling the monument erected in memory of Balfe, compared him to Charles Dickens, whom he called a minister of purest delight and recreation to the masses of his countrymen. From this we infer that the memorial in honour of Balfe was like a memorial in honour of Dibdin, both men being representatives of a certain type of popular art; and on that account it need not follow that we are to erect monuments to all, individually, who may have been successful in composing sea-songs or ballad-operas. Compared with Wallace, Balfe claims priority in regard to period; and there must be few who would contest his superiority in respect to genius. Indeed, the real interest, the special significance, of the recently unveiled tablet in honour of Balfe is that it was a tardy and somewhat unwilling tribute to genius, irrespective of those attainments and that acquired knowledge which in this country will, in art or literature, always be the most prized. It shows that the unconsciously exercised power we call genius will sooner or later be recognised in the rough as in the polished product of art, and that the gift of invention, of which the pedantic professors not only in music, but in all arts and even in science, are so strangely jealous, will in the end assert itself. In science the jealousy is more intelligible. Intuition in science is a dangerous quality; and, besides, there is a grand work of labour and research to be done without its assistance. But in musical composition there is absolutely nothing to be done without genius. A "composer" means a man of genius; and, failing in that quality, he is a mere mechanic. His work, like any other useless mechanism, has just this value—that if the materials cannot be sold for old iron, they can at least be worked up again by others who are better inspired. Thus it happens that on the solid mechanical work of the mediæval contrapuntists modern music reposes. It may be imagined that the self-evident proposition that genius is necessary to musical composition need not be pressed, as no one denies it. But, in one form or another, it is denied now, and daily. It is indirectly denied in the fallacious maxim that genius is “a capacity for work,” and in continued gloatings over passages in biographies in which it is found that great musicians employed orthodox forms and learned their lessons and attended to their “points of imitation” like other good boys; it is expressly denied in supercilious sneerings at Italian composers, and above all Rossini, who, with perhaps the single exception of Mozart, was the greatest musical genius that ever existed. We speak of musical genius apart from the many other attributes, technical, moral, and intellectual, that are necessary to form a great composer. The self-evident proposition that genius is essential in musical works is again denied in the prevalent silly and affected contempt for “tune,” “tunefulness,” or “melody,” without an attempt at explanation of what is or of what may be understood by the use of any of those terms. Again, we are sometimes reminded, with an air of triumph, that genius is quite as apparent in the development and construction of a musical work as in the invention of a melody! Yes, but it is not musical genius; it is only the same genius that, otherwise directed, would terminate in a Dutch clock or in a locomotive: and neither one nor the other would go without natural powers and agents independent of the mechanist. In music, the impulse, the forces of those natural agents are represented by genius. Canon Duckworth reminded those who were standing around Balfe’s monument that his bright, spontaneous song had endeared his music to hearers of all classes, and that his simple, flowing ballads, with their mingled sunshine and pathos, will be the delight of “other hearts and other lips” than those of his generation. Canon Duckworth’s familiar quotation has even been artistically utilised by M. Malempré, the designer of the monument. It is difficult to dissociate in the minds of Englishmen the name of Balfe from the popular air “Then you’ll remember me,” of which a very good judge, Dr. Macfarren, has written, that “it is not the less beautiful by reason of its popularity.” The song is in truth a perfect model of the English ballad form in structure and in modulation, and can be analysed with profit by any student of the elements of form. But the essence of the song, as of all music, is in the untaught quality we name “expression.” It must at the same time be granted that the immense difference between one music and another is in what is therein intended to be expressed. Ordinary sentiments, however much they may endear the music to a large class of hearers, are still ordinary; and steadfastly to persist in their indulgence is simply to degrade the art. It is unfortunate, even for the tablet in Balfe’s memory, that so much of his music was allied to verse that has become a byword and reproach. The merit of the verse is by no means a measure of the merit of Balfe’s music, but it enables non-musical people to understand and to do justice to the opinions of serious musicians who might be inclined to look coldly on the honours paid to a popular but unlearned composer. On the other hand, it must be confessed that it is a frequent and sad feature in the serious-minded that their greatest defect is not in failing to appreciate the genius which may exist in popular music, but in not seeing it. There is nothing in their own natures congenial to it: they are not attracted by it. Amongst other pointed observations, it was remarked by Canon Duckworth that “the characteristic quality of Balfe’s music was never so little esteemed, or at least so scantily exhibited by composers, as at the present hour.” The whole subject attacked by this apparently innocent observation is too complicated to be approached in the present article. But, with the reservation that the composers of our generation naturally follow the stream of development in the art, just as the greatest amongst their predecessors did before them, it must be acknowledged that, whether it be cause or concomitant, a desire to adopt and invent technical devices is contemporaneous with an absence of spontaneity. To the older devices of canon and imitation have been added what are technically known as “developments”—short, iterated phrases, which, from their individual melodic insignificance, lend themselves to rapid and distant modulations, and to an harmonic treatment which is not, strictly speaking, contrapuntal. This device was beginning to weary and show signs of exhaustion in chamber music when a master amongst masters of dramatic music, and of our own period, introduced a similar device, but with a dramatic object. The “leit-motive,” however, is purely a mechanical device, and for that very reason it opposes the dramatic theories of the inventor himself, and also contravenes the first canon of art—the concealment of art. It curiously resembles what we have recently been told is a notable feature in the poetry of the Ottoman Turks, who “show their originality by presenting stereotyped metaphors and forms in new and ingenious combinations.” Fortunately, the great modern master of the music-drama has himself exhausted his own device. The coming composer of true genius—if he is ever to come—would, by the possession of that faculty alone, be too self-dependent to resort to a mechanism which, to use a vulgar expression, could be “spotted” at once by the veriest tyro in the auditorium. We have seen it stated recently that a young English composer of the highest promise fails in “declamation”—the modern term for recitative. Spohr reminded us long since that if a man could not make a good melody he could not make a good recitative. Mendelssohn, who has contrived some exquisite melodies, was yet not a melodist; and the recitatives in his oratorios that may have pleased his contemporaries would now be thought of the most formal pattern. The same intensity of feeling and momentary abandonment of extraneous aids that make a “tune” will alone give the true point and colouring to dramatic declamation. In the present dearth of invention we have been ransacking history for gavottes. Our researches may gradually creep up to a period nearer our own; and if, in due course, the operas of Balfe be not revived, we are more likely to turn to the naturalism they typify than to artificial devices which, however ingenious and grandly employed, are of a kind that begins and ends in one generation.

UNMUSICAL ENGLAND.

ALTHOUGH the advantage to be derived from “seeing ourselves as others see us” is but a relative one, depending very much for its value upon the degree of competence on the part of our observers, it will scarcely be disputed that Englishmen are, as a rule, eager to seize upon the opportunity whenever and wherever it presents itself, and that even the most adverse criticism of foreign visitors to our shores is sure to be listened to patiently and with something more than mere curiosity. Indeed, the disposition thus generally exhibited by the educated portion of the community is apt to assume the form of self-depreciation whenever our national musical status is touched upon; a fact the existence of which will, without entering more minutely upon the subject, be sufficiently accounted for by a reference to the number of composers of original genius produced by this country during the last two or three hundred years as compared with that of the great masters who have sprung up during the same period in Italy, France, and, above all, in Germany. If the result of such a comparison alone be accepted as conclusive evidence, then, undoubtedly, we can scarcely as yet lay claim to the title of a musical nation. That it has been so accepted by not a few of our critics in the past, whose experience of English national life had been, to say the least, a very limited one, we are well aware; that it should continue to be so accepted in some quarters, notwithstanding the manifestly rapid strides in general music cultivation which this country has been making of late years, is, however, a circumstance which somewhat detracts from the merit and the instructive value of the strictures periodically passed upon us as an unmusical people. When, in the year 1746, Gluck produced one of his earlier operas in London with but scanty success, Handel is reported to have remarked to his younger compatriot, "You have given yourself too much trouble with this work, the like of which is not appreciated here. In order to please the English, you must think of something more demonstrative and more calculated to stir coarse nerves." The story is related from hearsay by Reichardt, and bears intrinsic evidence of being totally unfounded. Handel understood the genius of the inhabitants of these islands—for whom he has written his sublimest masterpieces—much better. But, si non è vero, the story is at least ben trovato as showing the kind of estimation in which English musical taste was held on the Continent in the past century. With somewhat altered conditions, the same opinion concerning ourselves may be safely said to be still prevailing in the minds of a majority of our continental neighbours at the present day.

If, as we have stated, there exists a tendency on our part to underrate our own musical capacities, there is, on the other hand, no lack of self-assurance to be discerned in the writings of some of our most recent critics. Dr. von Bülow, some time since, furnished a graceful example of this fact by the publication in the Leipzig Signale of a series of letters concerning the musical institutions of the "land of fogs," as he politely denominated this country, which did more credit to his dialectical powers than to his artistic individuality, and the chief purpose of which seemed to be to serve as a convenient background from whence the central figure of the versatile pianist himself might stand out the more effectively. Great men invariably have imitators. No sooner had Hans von Bülow, some years ago, accomplished his tour de force of playing from memory six of Beethoven's sonatas at a stretch, than we were told in our "Foreign Notes" that "the eminent Austrian pianist, Herr Bonawitz," had done the same thing at Vienna. The last-named gentleman has now likewise emulated his prototype in his critical excursions in England, and has communicated his experience of our musical capacities, tastes, habits, and institutions to his friends of the Wiener Signale. The subject he has chosen for his inquiry lies, it is true, in a small compass, and could be easily circumvented by a foreigner in a week or two, especially if he be an eminent pianist following in the footsteps of another still more eminent. But Herr Bonawitz has gone to work more conscientiously. He arrived in this country, as he tells his readers, some time in 1880, and may, for all we know, be still residing in our midst. During this unnecessarily prolonged period, as far as the study of English musical life is concerned, he has no doubt fully mastered the subject about which he writes to the Viennese paper in question. The following, then, is his description, by implication, of English amateurs in general: "Dozens of times," says the pianist-observer, "have I been seriously asked here to play the 'Missa Solennis' or the Ninth Symphony, and my reply that I could only play certain portions of these works has been met by blank surprise. I was then usually told that some youthful prodigy or other had recently visited a concert or the opera for the first time in his life, and had afterwards repeated an entire symphony or opera on the pianoforte at home." This, and much more like it, may be very entertaining reading to the Viennese public, though it will strike any one acquainted with the real subject Herr Bonawitz professes to portray as a trifle too absurd. But the pianist-observer has a further object in view. Having thus prepared the necessary background to his picture, he proceeds to exhibit the more prominent figure. "I was at first not a little astonished—nay, even chagrined—at the request of these people, but I discovered at last the right means to deal with them according to their requirements. If now any one asks to hear the Ninth Symphony, I simply sit down to the piano and play a few bars from the first movement, then a few more from the second and third, and wind up the whole with nameless variations of my own on the 'Ode to Joy.' In a similar way I proceed with the 'Missa Solennis' and other great works." We should be glad, if space permitted it, to treat our readers to a few more passages from Herr Bonawitz's amusing narrative of how cleverly he succeeded in hoodwinking the "English amateur." Enough has, however, been quoted to show how strangely our would-be derider has been mistaken in his choice of the type he intended to introduce to the acquaintance of his friends in Vienna, although, we must do him the justice to add, he subsequently admits that there are "a very few" amateurs who know something about the art to be met with even in this country.

Having thus effectually disposed of the characteristics of the English amateur, the critic next proceeds to survey our lyrical and concert institutions, and arrives at the conclusion that they are either going to the bad for want of public support, or are upheld partly by the foreign element in the metropolis, partly by the monster character of their performances. Thus we are told that "the days of the Philharmonic Society are numbered," that the Monday Popular Concerts derive their support "chiefly from foreigners and Jews," and that among the artistic undertakings deserving of honourable mention are "the choral and orchestral performances of the brothers Macfarren." We are not so much concerned here, however, with the matter or the accuracy of the information Herr Bonawitz conveys to his readers of the Wiener Signale (and to which he has promised to furnish additions in a subsequent number of that journal) as with the manner of it. There is some truth, no doubt, here and there, in his strictures upon our musical culture generally, but a great deal also which shows a certain arrogance of judgment, coupled with a very superficial knowledge of our national life. His remarks, moreover, frequently betray a want of that essential quality by which alone a similar acquaintance can be gained—viz., a sympathetic insight into the idiosyncracies of a people; a quality possessed by some other visitors to our shores who were at the same time endowed with the modesty of genius—such, for instance, as our latest critic's own countrymen, Carl Maria von Weber and Mendelssohn.

Herr Bonawitz having made no allusion to the executive qualities of the English amateur, of whose capabilities he otherwise shows such a profound appreciation, we may not inaptly supplement his observations by a brief extract from another foreign source touching upon this subject, and with which we will conclude this article. A propos of the recent performance at Birmingham of Gounod's oratorio "La Rédemption," a writer in L'Indépendance Belge remarks, inter alia: "An English journal has advised us, in reference to our recent Festival at Brussels, to take an example from the Birmingham choir; and there can be no doubt that the admonition was perfectly justified. We are as yet a long way from having achieved such choral ensembles, where all is firmness and precision, where all the voices together constitute but one voice. Our only consolation is that not even in Germany, any more than with ourselves, has this English perfection as yet been attained." Whether the high artistic standard reached by the Birmingham choristers, if the Belgian critic may be believed, is owing to the presence in their midst of some of the "very few competent amateurs" which Herr Bonawitz has been able to discover in this country, or whether it be simply an unaccountable phenomenon, considering the otherwise "low musical capacities of the English," we must leave it to that gentleman to conjecture. It is a theme worthy at least of a postscript when next he writes to his friends at Vienna concerning "Unmusical England."

CONSIDERING how inseparably united were opera and ballet for very many years, even in this country, we have much pleasure in directing the attention of our readers to a recently published book, "The Life and Works of the Chevalier Noverre," edited by Charles Edwin Noverre. The name of this energetic reformer of the ballet has so long passed from recollection that many may not be aware how much his life was mixed up with the musicians of his day. Through the interest of his old pupil, Marie-Antoinette, he obtained the post of Maître des Ballets en Chef at the Imperial Academy of Music; and on the arrival in the French capital of the composer Piccinni, the name of Noverre became prominent in connection with the well-known Gluck and Piccinni war. In this controversy, although originally loyal to the cause of Gluck—even to the extent of becoming his collaborator in several of his Parisian productions—he afterwards openly espoused the Piccinni side; but it does not appear that he was a violent partisan of either composer. It was his connection with Mozart, however, which makes his life in Paris interesting to musicians. Earnest in his admiration of this composer's genius, he at first endeavoured to secure an opera from his pen for the French stage, and, failing this, he enlisted his services to compose the music for a ballet called "Les Petits Riens," which appears to have been enormously successful, although in the laudatory criticisms upon the performance Mozart's share in the work is not even mentioned. The fourteen numbers composed by Mozart for this ballet were only rescued from obscurity in 1873, when the score was discovered by M. Nuiittier in the library of the Grand-Opéra; and the pieces, arranged by M. Renaud de Vilbac for the pianoforte, are printed in the interesting book to which we have alluded. Many of Noverre's ballets were produced with much success at the King's Theatre in London, under his own direction, the French Revolution driving him from Paris, with the total loss of his fifty years' savings.

THE custom of "hissing" at either a dramatic or musical performance is scarcely, we think, one to be upheld by any who knows how sensitive are the feelings of an artist when in presence of an audience. It is very true that it may be the only recognised method of expressing dissatisfaction by those who are disappointed at the quality of the entertainment provided; but then it must be remembered that their opinion is not really invited; and although applause may be accepted as a spontaneous proof of extreme gratification, a manifestation of censure can assuredly only be exhibited on the supposition that a jury has been called together to return an audible verdict upon the merit of the actors or singers called up for judgment. But though we are inclined to disagree with this direct and, as we think, unfair display of feeling, we cannot believe that authors and composers who send their works for review are to expect, and indeed almost to demand, unqualified praise; because, in the first place, the appeal is not a personal one, and, in the second place, by forwarding their composition unsolicited, they tacitly request you to notice it. The same feeling, however, which has led almost to the abolition of hissing at a theatre is evidently expected to rule critics of the present day—at least, on musical works—for when compositions are sent to our office we are usually told in an accompanying letter that the author will be obliged by a "favourable review"; and in some cases it is said that if a laudatory notice cannot be given, the composer would wish that none should appear at all. If it were thoroughly understood that this last principle were acted upon, both the reviewers and the reviewed should be content; but as we constantly receive letters complaining that works have been passed over, it is evident that, in this matter at least, there is little eloquence in silence. Let us at once, therefore, say that, as we do not ask for works to notice, we shall on all occasions speak candidly upon those which are sent to us; and, moreover, that whenever a "favourable review" upon a piece is requested, we shall unquestionably take the liberty of not reviewing it at all.

ALTHOUGH we are not bound to believe the assertion we once heard, that whenever you inhabit a "semi-detached" house the most intense pianoforte practice is sure to be carried on in the house which is not detached, we cannot but think that our modern builders should have more kept pace with the advance of music than to construct walls so thin that we are reluctantly compelled to mix up the five-finger exercises and scales of our neighbours with our own daily life. The liberty, however, of doing as you please in a residence for which you pay rent and taxes is thoroughly recognised both socially and legally, and magistrates have constantly decided that you have no power to prevent even inharmonious sounds which proceed from the houses and gardens by which you are surrounded. But we are glad to find that a protest is beginning to be raised against the same law being enforced in the public streets. A recent leading article in a contemporary points out that the railway whistle is rapidly becoming an intolerable nuisance, and this not from the absolute necessity of using it as a signal, but from its being too often treated as an amusing toy by those in charge of a train. The writer likewise mentions the "hooters," as they are termed, which are used to dismiss and call back the workmen at large manufactories, and also to the unseemly noises of street-singers, both professional and amateur. A letter from a correspondent, in the same paper, supplements this article by calling attention to the performance of the German concertina by knots of young men on their way home at unseasonable hours of the night; and we can strengthen the case by mentioning, from our own experience, a horrible Highlander, who, generally between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, turns on the whole force of his bagpipes, the drone of which lingers upon the ear of the drowsy and unwilling listener long after what we may presume to have been intended for a melody is completely inaudible. Surely it is not too much to expect that those who are paid to protect us from robbers of our goods should also protect us from robbers of our rest?

AN American paper informs us that Des Moines has an opera-house, and that the manager has laid down some rules designed to improve the manners of the public frequenting the establishment. "Gentlemen," he says, "will not wave their hats, neither will they step from one row to another over the backs of the seats. The people, furthermore, are requested to applaud with their hands, instead of yelling like wild beasts." "Ladies," he also tells us, "should go to the theatre unattended whenever they choose, as they have as much right to go to an entertainment as they have to go to church alone." The journal quoting these plain-spoken regulations very truly says that people don't yell in church like wild beasts, nor do they step over the backs of pews, or keep their hats on, and for this reason ladies are not afraid to go alone. When, therefore, the Des Moines Opera-House ceases to resemble a promenade concert, or a menagerie, no doubt ladies will honour it with their presence, even unattended, as much as the manager can wish. But how will the opera-goers receive these gentle rebukes upon their unseemly behaviour? Will they flock to the theatre and sit demurely penitent for their past transgressions; or will they openly resent such a check upon their liberty of action, and get up a "wild beast" uproar, like the celebrated "O. P. Row," recorded in the theatrical history of London? Many reforms are indeed needed in the opera-houses and concert-rooms of our own metropolis; yet in effecting these we have more faith in the tacit admonitions of those before the curtain than in the stern orders of those behind it. Encores, bouquet-throwing, and many other absurdities of the kind are gradually fading away; but neither Mr. Gye nor Mr. Mapleson have ever thought of issuing a managerial decree peremptorily forbidding any such demonstration on pain of an ignominious expulsion from the house.

BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

IN one respect the organisation of this Festival is unique, since the triennial performances are only the most conspicuous feature of a plan of operations that knows no interregnum. There is in Bristol a Musical Festival Society, consisting of ladies and gentlemen, guarantors of £10 each; and this body, through its representative committee, organises not only the grand demonstration every three years, but a series of concerts each winter. More than this, it has recently established educational classes in various districts of the city, and engaged competent teachers to impart instruction in music and singing. The charge being only threepence per lesson, the advantages thus offered are open to all classes, while the committee are enabled to extend the resources and improve the material from which the Festival chorus is drawn. According to an official Report, these classes were attended last winter by 794 pupils, of whom 260 received certificates of efficiency. One result is that no need exists to go out of Bristol for choral voices; nor do the committee find themselves obliged to engage professional skill in that capacity, or to make any disbursements whatever on account of help. According to the same responsible document, the Musical Festival Society has produced since 1873—the year of its foundation —no fewer than thirty-two important works, or at the rate of three and a fraction per year. I am glad to lay stress upon these important doings, because they show that Bristol has earnestness and a faculty of organisation such as, in all likelihood, will soon amend what experience is proving to be weak. I shall presently find it my duty to point out certain faults, with plainness and firmness, but not with the reproach that attaches to deliberate shortcoming. The Bristolians mean well, and an institution only nine years old can hardly be expected to have made its system perfect.

The Festival which began on October 17, and ended on the 20th, was the fourth of the series, and took place, like its predecessors, in the spacious hall named after Bristol's great benefactor, Edward Colston. Its executive resources were ample. In the first place the committee could bring into the orchestra an admirable chorus of 385 voices, trained by Mr. D. W. Rootham, who is no unworthy successor to the late Mr. Alfred Stone. In the second place, and as on former occasions, Mr. Hallé's band of eighty performers attended, Mr. Hallé himself acting as Conductor, while the solo vocalists included Mesdames Albani, Anna Williams, Patey, and Trebelli; Messrs. Lloyd, Maas, Harper Kearton, Hilton, Worlock, and Santley; Mr. G. Riseley presiding at the organ. Connoisseurs may be of opinion that an orchestra eighty strong is no balance for a picked and efficient choir of near upon 400; but, even taking this into account, it is clear that the force directed by Mr. Hallé was competent to first-class effects if guided aright. In selecting works for performance the committee showed judgment and taste. The Bristolians do not care for novelties. That has been sufficiently demonstrated; wherefore the programme contained but one work of the class—namely, Mr. Mackenzie's Cantata "Jason," specially composed. As, however, the fame and popularity of M. Gounod, together with the wide-spread discussion of his Oratorio, "The Redemption," had stimulated public curiosity in an exceptional manner, the French composer's magnum opus was included. For the rest, there were "Elijah," which a leading daily contemporary describes with perfect truth as "a financial not less than an artistic necessity"; "The Messiah" (of course), Beethoven's Mass in D, Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," Haydn's "Spring," and a number of classical and modern compositions for orchestra alone. It is hard to find fault with such a programme as this, since it represented almost every school save the one—if it be a school—to which the "Christus" of Abbé Liszt belongs. Nevertheless, objections may be—and, indeed, have been—urged against Rossini's Opera-oratorio. For my own part, I regard the presentation of "Moses in Egypt" as timely. The composition of such a work may neither be probable nor advisable now, but the value of pure and simple melody in vocal music should have free assertion under present circumstances. Permanent obscuration of its worth is no doubt impossible, because against the order of nature; still, a tendency exists to sacrifice it to the elaboration and cloudiness of modern musical thought.

It might have been supposed—nay, concluded even—that Mr. Hallé's orchestra would go to Bristol quite ready for the finishing touches of general rehearsal. The contrary was the case. I am informed, on authority which satisfies myself, that neither "The Redemption" nor "Jason" had received any attention from the band previous to its members leaving Manchester for the West on Monday morning at five a.m. In the judgment of Mr. Hallé, therefore, it was possible to prepare the music of seven concerts, including two important novelties, in half a day. That artist never made a greater mistake, as events sorely proved; and the marvel is that a man of such experience, and credited with so much professional zeal, should have fallen into it. The task he set himself was simply hopeless from the first, so that, when ten o'clock p.m. came and Mr. Mackenzie's "Jason" had not been touched, there may have been cause for disgust, but there was none for surprise. An hour later the wearied performers collapsed utterly, and the artistic success of the week became chance's plaything. In a speech delivered at some festive gathering later on, Mr. Hallé endeavoured to excuse his action on the ground of saving expense. I do not see what he has to do with the question of cost. That is a matter for the committee, not for the musical director whose business is to secure facilities for adequate preparation. Had Mr. Hallé gone to his employers and said, "I cannot answer for a musical success unless I am allowed two full days' general rehearsal," he might not have got what he wanted, but he would have vindicated his artistic conscientiousness and relieved himself from a great deal of responsibility. It is, perhaps, well that the slovenly system which so damaged the Festival has had a supreme illustration. We may hope never to see the like again; and if this good should result, London critics, who lashed the shortcomings at Bristol unsparingly, will consider themselves rewarded for the harsh words levelled at them in return by men who felt the indictment in the degree of their conscious inability to refute it.

The public business of the Festival began on Tuesday morning in the traditional manner—that is to say, with a performance of "Elijah," preceded by "God save the Queen," Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Maas singing the solo verses. Mendelssohn's Oratorio again fully asserted its claim to be a financial and artistic necessity, nearly every seat in the Hall having an occupant. A good rendering of the favourite work was of course expected, since any other, if thought of at all, appeared extremely improbable and entirely inexcusable. Still, the good rendering did not come. The music had had no general rehearsal, and the chorus, unused to Mr. Hallé's beat, were not as precise in attack and neat in execution as could have been wished. On the other hand, the orchestra, for a precisely opposite reason, left little or nothing to desire. The solos were in good hands throughout; Miss Anna Williams taking all those for soprano, and Madame Patey the whole of the contralto airs and recitatives, while Mr. Maas represented Obadiah, Ahab, &c., and Mr. Santley the Prophet—help being given in a subordinate capacity by Miss Gane, Miss Hayes, Mr. Kearton, Mr. Lukins, and Mr. Hilton. It is unnecessary to remark upon the doings of the principal artists in an Oratorio so familiar. Let the reader assume that full average excellence was shown, and he will not be far wrong, save as regards Mr. Santley, who transcended all his previous efforts in dramatic characterisation. The general performance seemed to satisfy the mass of its hearers, but left an uncomfortable impression upon connoisseurs, who, arguing from the known to the unknown, and asking, "If these things be done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry?" found the outlook discomforting. They had not long to wait before their fears were justified.

Beethoven's Mass in D opened the evening Concert—which was largely attended—and at once laid bare the weakness of the Festival arrangements. Amateurs need no information about the exacting nature of a work that defies pains and skill to secure a perfect rendering. They are equally well aware that the Mass might have taken up the whole of Monday's rehearsal, and yet have had legitimate demands unsatisfied. It goes without saying, therefore, that the short time actually bestowed upon it proved utterly unavailing, even for a decent performance. The chorus knew their work, and were as competent as chorus can be to the achievement of a task impossible in its very nature; but the ensemble was—well, not an ensemble sometimes, and the band played loosely, even to the extent of leaving out or "scamping" whole phrases. Nothing could be more provoking, because here were admirable resources quite equal to a reasonably good result, yet wasted for want of proper management. To make matters worse, even the soloists were not quite happy, and either nervous anxiety or some potent cause led to a faultiness of intonation from which the "Benedictus" suffered. Even such artists as Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Hilton may be pardoned if, amid general uncertainty in so exacting a work, they themselves failed to be sure. Altogether, the performance of the Mass in D was unfortunate. There may be no disgrace in defeat by Beethoven's extraordinary music, but nothing save shame waits upon failure when common and obvious precautions are neglected. The second part of the programme atoned in a measure for the shortcomings of the first. Mr. Hallé's orchestra had no difficulty in playing well the overtures to "Rienzi" and "Ruy Blas"; nor had the audience any scruples about accepting as worthy of unanimous applause the songs contributed by the artists already named.

M. Gounod's "Redemption" was performed on the second morning. Bristol showed no less anxiety to hear the new Oratorio than Birmingham, and it is now a matter of openly expressed regret that the Midland plan of representing it twice was not adopted. That this might have been done without risk is clear. Upwards of 2,000 tickets were sold, and only fifty of them were unserved. M. Gounod's work, moreover, attracted an audience which, alike for distinction and culture, bore away the palm. A large number of the aristocracy were present, and well-known amateurs from towns and cities near and far were recognised amongst the crowd. For such an audience, if not in deference to the claims of the new work, a good performance should have been prepared with the utmost care; instead of which the one hurried rehearsal supposed to answer in the case of "Elijah" and "The Messiah" was all that the managers thought necessary. It is even said that the band had not seen the music till it was put before them on Monday. Under these circumstances the committee and Mr. Hallé had no right whatever to expect anything save disaster, the risk—nay, the almost certainty—of which they heedlessly ran. That catastrophe was avoided speaks much for the skill of the executants. Yet, if the performance was saved "so as by fire," it suffered from many and inexcusable blemishes of a kind not to be guarded against by individual ability. Moreover, Mr. Hallé's reading differed from that of the composer on several points, and a few numbers lost their exact significance by being taken too fast. Happily there is something to be said on the other side. The chorus again proved that, given proper conditions, they were equal to the task in hand; while the soloists, most of whom had "created" their parts at Birmingham, left nothing to desire. Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley were again successful, as were, for the first time, Mr. Worlock, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Hilton in the music assigned at the Midland performance to Mr. F. King, Mr. Cummings, and Signor Foli respectively. As for the band, I may, perhaps, praise the skill with which its members acquitted themselves in avoiding a breakdown; but to call what they did a "reading" of the orchestral music would be absurd. There was no "reading," only a fairly successful effort to play the notes. Nevertheless, even such a performance made an impression upon the audience, who listened with profound attention, and obviously felt the sacred story as told in M. Gounod's peculiar manner. Of the lyrical numbers it can hardly be needful to speak. Such things as "Lovely appear," the choral "For us the Christ is made," the grand chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," and the semi-chorus "He has said, They are blessed" admit of no question as to beauty and artistic power. Wherefore, as far as they are concerned, the Oratorio is safe. That the narrative portions, which form so large a part of the whole, are safe also, growing experience seems to indicate. They are made so, despite their distinctive and unfamiliar treatment, by M. Gounod's studied reticence. Had he placed his music in the forefront, to be the cynosure of every eye, it might not have stood the test. As an accessory to the narrative, the force of which it unobtrusively heightens, all the power of the tremendous theme is, so to speak, on its side. By-and-by, most likely, the high principles upon which the composer has acted will receive recognition, along with the general propriety of his illustrations, and then "The Redemption" cannot fail to be recognised as a great thing—even, perhaps, as fully deserving the "opus vite mee" of its distinguished author. The programme of the evening Concert was curiously arranged, Haydn's "Spring" ("The Seasons") coming last, after a long selection of miscellaneous works. It certainly should have been played first, and given the position held by Schumann's Symphony in E flat (the "Rhenish"), which, with Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G (No. 4) and a Ballad and Variations from the "Coppelia" of Delibes, made up a good representation of orchestral music. With these things the band were so familiar that there is little or nothing to say in the form of adverse criticism. Through them Mr. Hallé's artists asserted competency to anything, and inflicted the severest censure upon arrangements which refused to utilise such excellent material to the utmost. Mr. Hallé's rendering of the pianoforte solo in Beethoven's work was as good as ever, and elicited one of the heartiest demonstrations of the week. Special applause likewise followed M. Délibes's pretty music, in which a violin obbligato enabled Herr Straus to make his mark. The "Spring" music, coming so late in the evening, had but little chance of proper appreciation, although it was generally well performed. The solos were taken by Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Hilton. Of the more notable airs in the selection, mention was deserved by Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty monster" (Miss Williams) and "Waft me, ye zephyrs" (Mr. Maas), Rossini's "Pensa alla patria" (Madame Trebelli), and Spohr's "Der Kriegerlust ergeben" (Mr. Santley).

The performance of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," on Thursday morning, was honoured by the attendance of his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, President of the Festival, with whom was the Duchess. These illustrious persons, being on their way to Plymouth for a festive purpose of another character, kindly consented to halt a few hours at Bristol and make the Duke's connection with the musical doings there something more and better than a paper one. As a matter of course, the most was made of royal good-nature; or, if not that, as much as a day of unrelenting wind and rain would permit. It seemed almost a mockery to decorate the streets in such weather; but the citizens made a respectable, if not an imposing, show, and supplemented flags and inscriptions with a strong muster of volunteers, who formed guards of honour and lined the thoroughfares in what, but for the downpour, would have been brave array. The reception of their Royal Highnesses by the crowd—who were too damp to cheer much—was cordial, but hardly as enthusiastic as that given to them by the occupants—warm and dry—of Colston Hall. Something like enthusiasm attended the entrance of the Duke and Duchess into the President's gallery; immediately upon which the National Anthems of England and Russia were performed. As may be supposed, the attendance was large, but how far so full a house was a compliment to Royalty and how far to Rossini made be matter for conjecture. The choice of "Moses in Egypt" has not passed without criticism in which those who take a comprehensive view of the subject will hardly care to join. Considered in the interest of a section, it may seem unjustifiable; but the duty of Festival managers is not to limit their choice to particular schools but to take care that all are represented by what is good of their kind. "Moses in Egypt" conspicuously illustrates the school which places its chief reliance upon melody, and the committee were as much within their right in presenting Rossini's work as they would have been in choosing one of a very different character by Brahms. It is silly for individuals to demand that their taste shall alone be suited. Were such persons in power, we should be condemned to music of one pattern, and to a limited and poverty-stricken art. That the action of the Bristol committee was approved no observer among the audience failed to see. Apart from such interest as the story may have had, the unending stream of pure vocal melody, accompanied so as to set off rather than obscure its beauty, delighted the vast mass of listeners, and may have raised frequent doubts whether, in the expression of human emotion by means of voice-music, our generation has improved upon its predecessor. The principal singers revelled in their task, and acquitted themselves to admiration. This may especially be said of Madame Albani (to whom the work was new), Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley; while the first and third of the quartet carried off more distinguished honours than their associates, because the love-music—at once beautiful and passionate—fell to their share. It would not be easy to exaggerate the deserts of Madame Albani and Mr. Lloyd in such numbers as "Losing thee" and "Whither would'st thou lead?" Their singing was as truly great as any the tradition of which has come down to us. Mention should here be made of good service rendered by Mr. Kearton (Aaron), Mr. Worlock (Moses), and Mr. Hilton (Osiris). All these gentlemen did well, and completed the efficiency of the cast, Mr. Worlock earning a special meed of praise by intelligent singing and appropriate dignity of style. The easy choruses were given with spirit, and, generally speaking, the performance was amongst the best of the week. It is said that his Royal Highness the President expressed himself much gratified by what he had heard, and readily consented to hold his post at the Festival of 1885.

The evening Concert had more interest than any other for lovers of absolute novelty, and for those who are concerned about the welfare of English art. Reference has already been made to the "Jason" of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, and now is the time, à propos to its first performance, for some remarks which, though not intended to be exhaustive and final, shall at least give an idea as to the scope and character of the work.

The story of "Jason" is not the best that classic legend affords for musical purposes, but Mr. W. Grist has treated it, on the whole, very well. He could not impart to it much human interest, and the most has consequently been made of the stirring scenes of adventure, and of the striking, if far from attractive personality of Medea. Besides this, the subject is admirably laid out for the composer, and the verses, though they may not bear the close scrutiny of hypercriticism, are generally well made, and have a free rhythmical swing. The book is divided into six scenes, so entitled as to tell their own story. They are—No. 1, "The Building of the Ship"; No. 2, Invocation and Departure"; No. 3, "Medea's Vision"; No. 4, "Welcome and Love"; No. 5, "The Conflict"; No. 6, "Triumph." These appear sufficiently varied to test a musician's command of expression, and in taking a general view of Mr. Mackenzie's treatment of them, connoisseurs are struck by a rare power of descriptiveness. All things considered it was well, perhaps, that the story exacted a liberal exercise of this faculty, because it does not appear from the composer's handling of the few sentimental and emotional episodes that he is equally happy in that department. Exception, should, however, be made in favour of the Women's lament over the departure of the Argonauts. This, if somewhat measured and calculated, strikes the right chord, and meets with the response of our sympathies. Still, Mr. Mackenzie is most at home with such stirring scenes as "The Building of the Ship," "The Conflict," "The Triumph," and so on. Here he is not only graphic and picturesque, but impetuous. The music has a dash and "go," which carry us with it, and excite a strong desire that its composer may soon throw the same heart into his illustration of tender emotion. A propos to this, much might be gained by cultivating a more purely vocal style when writing for the voice. It is the fashion with modern composers to ignore the fact that the voice—the organ of highest expression, and the means by which heart speaks to heart—should be considered first of all, and everything made subordinate to its efficacious use. They treat it as simply a co-ordinate factor with the orchestra in the musical ensemble, and sacrifice its unique demands to general exigencies. Hence there is nowadays but little vocal music worthy of a great singer. Mr. Mackenzie is not a flagrant offender in this respect, but his love strains in "Jason" would be additionally acceptable were they written with a more exclusive regard for the voice and, also, were they animated by a stronger passion. It would, perhaps, be unavailing to look in the music of the chilly North for the fiery utterances that flow, like lava, from the hot South. Nevertheless, love is warm everywhere, and love music should never lack something of natural and impetuous flow. These remarks, I think, are fairly called for by the sentimental music in "Jason"; and it can hardly be that considerations akin to them have not exercised the composer's own mind in reviewing his work. Turning to the general structure and character of the music, a perception of Mr. Mackenzie's eclecticism is unavoidable. He gives us old forms and new; the style of the past with that of the present; and impartial reminiscences of Mendelssohn on the one hand and Wagner on the other. The idea conveyed is, in short, that of a man who has not yet determined along which artistic path his genius prompts him to walk. This is not surprising. Albeit Mr. Mackenzie is not a very young man, he is a young composer; his undoubtedly great gifts having, like those of many others, been slow to ripen. In a little while, no doubt, the weight of inborn sympathy and the decision of enlightened judgment will definitely shape his course, and give to his music the homogeneousness it now lacks. Taking the numbers of "Jason" one by one, more might be said without redundancy than space will here allow; and it must suffice for the purpose of remarks which are somewhat tentative to indicate the more prominent features. Mr. Mackenzie is happy in his opening scene, "The Building of the Ship"; the form being excellent and the style clear and forcible, while the contrast between the men's vigorous chorus and the lament of the women is capital alike in conception, development, and effect. The scene, which may be regarded as one long movement, includes a solo for Orpheus, containing some melodious passages; though here the legitimate vocal effect is sometimes weakened by consideration for what should have been kept rigidly subordinate. This, however, is a fine-drawn objection, considering the overwhelming balance of excellence. I do not hesitate to say that the opening scene of the Cantata is a masterly effort, adequate in itself to the highest hopes of Mr. Mackenzie's future. There is power, also, in Jason's invocation of Zeus, and the answering chorus of Argonauts; one singularly happy touch being a suggestion of the distinctive phrase in the Women's lament on the words of the departing adventurers, "Loved land, farewell." Mr. Mackenzie carries this device farther in a lengthy orchestral intermezzo entitled "On the waters." The movement is beautiful and picturesque in itself, none the less because written in a distinctly Mendelssohnian vein; but when, in the second part, the theme of the Women's chorus is introduced again and again, we recognise an applied significance of the happiest nature. More clearly than words, the music tells us that the Argonauts are thinking of loved ones left behind. The long scena called "Medea's vision" is less musically attractive than many other portions of the work; while the love-duet for Medea and Jason is too elaborately wrought and too constrained in expression for the desired effect. In "The Conflict" admirable writing is found, notably a canon for soprano and tenor chorus descriptive of a peaceful evening. Merit of a vigorous character, however, is in the ascendant and shines conspicuously throughout the choral description of Jason's encounter with the oxen; the chorus of Armed Men, "Weapons clashing"—a decidedly striking conception—and Jason's own solo as he finally engages and overcomes the dragon. With all these matters the composer is at home. He moves with an assured tread, and dominates alike his means and his theme. From the level so attained, the closing scene, "Triumph," does not fall, mention being specially deserved by a fugue, "Thus Argo's fame will never die," regular in construction, well worked out, and highly effective. To sum up, this Cantata is a remarkable addition to the list of British works—remarkable not only for what it presents, but for what it promises. Henceforth Mr. Mackenzie will need to remember the maxim "Noblesse oblige."

The performance of the work was so bad, notwithstanding the efforts of the soloists, Miss Williams, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, and despite the ability of the chorus to deal with it, that even the Festival Committee must have been convinced of need for better arrangements. I shall not dwell upon so disagreeable a subject, but simply express a hope that never again will a new work by an English composer be exposed by inefficient preparation to such a fate. "Jason" was well received nevertheless. The audience obviously liked it, and after the last chorus recalled the composer to compliment him warmly.

Concerning the Festival generally little need be added. "The Messiah" was performed on Friday morning to its usual large audience, and with that immortal work the proceedings terminated. Financially, I am glad to say, they were a success; for, although fewer people attended than in 1879, the larger number of reserved seats taken brought in an increased sum. That there are materials in Bristol for a great Festival nobody can dispute, and it only remains to utilise them in the best manner. This the committee have not yet done, but it would be absurd to suppose that they wilfully neglected any precaution. In all likelihood they trusted to Mr. Hallé for efficient musical preparation; and he, in turn, trusted to the luck that often pulls English festivals through. Both parties know better now, and, from speeches delivered after the Festival by the Chairman of the committee and the Conductor, it is clear that measures of improvement will be taken. The managers have just passed through a rough time, but they will find the truth that adversity, though, "like a toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in its head."

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace opened on the 14th ult. in a manner worthy of the reputation of these excellent entertainments. Mr. Manns, after all, has succeeded in being the first to introduce to the English public a work eagerly looked forward to by amateurs. Brahms's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat—the work in question—has been announced more than once. It was down in the programme, of the Richter Concerts, with Mr. D'Albert as interpreter, and the Philharmonic Society, in accordance with its recent progressive tendencies, was anxious to do honour to Brahms's latest emanation. Practical impediments, however, intervened, and the summer season of 1882 passed without this last addition to the long list of its memorable events. The Crystal Palace being first in opening the autumn campaign easily won the victory. Having become acquainted with the work thus ardently competed for, we naturally ask, Was the prize worth the strife; was it, to use a culinary simile, necessary to make "Tant de bruit pour une omelette"? It is to be feared that if the question had been put to the vote, the majority of the Crystal Palace audience would have answered it in the negative. Was it that the taste of Brahms's "omlet" was of too strange a flavour to be found immediately palatable, or that the circumstances under which it was offered to the public were not altogether favourable to its success? The fact remains that that success was one of esteem rather than of genuine enthusiasm. Whether this first impression will be modified by subsequent performances is a question which time must decide. As it happened, the Concerto appeared in the programme between Sterndale Bennett's Overture "The Wood Nymph" and Wagner's concert arrangement of the "Waldweben," from the second act of "Siegfried," the former a simple and tenderly graceful idyl, the latter an effusion of beautiful and spontaneous melody set forth with the consummate skill of the greatest orchestral virtuoso the world has ever seen. A more unfortunate position for the new work could scarcely have been selected. It is exactly in the qualities above specified—natural grace, spontaneous melody, and skilful instrumentation—that Brahms's music in general, and the present Concerto in particular, is most palpably wanting. Brahms is a great musical scholar, who handles the forms of contrapuntal structure with the hands of a master. He is, moreover, a musician of the highest and purest aim; but, as Goethe says in "Tasso," "the Graces" (not Lord Chesterfield's "graces") "are, alas! absent," and the artist from whom they withhold their gifts can never find his way to the hearts of the people. There are, to use a favourite form of literary criticism, poets for poets. Brahms is a musician for musicians, although in this instance he has certainly not been a pianist for pianists; for the solo part of the Concerto is most awkwardly written, being extremely difficult and by no means effective in proportion. Detailed analysis of so complicated a work would be impossible at this early stage. Our first impression of the new work may be briefly summarised thus: Of the four movements of the Concerto, the most effective is the second, which is in the form of a Scherzo, containing a very charming trio in D major. Next in merit stands the final Allegretto grazioso, founded upon one of those Hungarian melodies which Brahms has turned to frequent and excellent account. The opening movement is lengthy and involved, and the Andante displays most strikingly the fault of Brahms, which the vox populi—in this, as in many cases, not far from the truth—has called want of melody. The rendering of the Concerto left something to be desired. It may be doubted whether the directors had been altogether judicious in the choice of their pianist, Mr. Beringer, who, although a conscientious and able artist, scarcely occupies a position to introduce so important a work with sufficient éclat. It is, however, but justice to

Mr. Beringer to say that he had evidently studied the work carefully, and in many respects did justice to his difficult task. To master that task in all its exigencies would require the strength of a giant and the intellectual grasp of a "subtle-souled psychologist." The remainder of the programme included Beethoven's Symphony in A, Mr. Lloyd's admirable rendering of Berlioz' Hymn to Happiness from "Lelio," and the "Prize Song" from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

The most important number of the second Concert of the series (21st ult.) was the Symphony in D (No. 6, Op. 189) by Raff, played for the first time at the Palace and in England generally. The poetic import of the work is sufficiently indicated by its matter, thus imperfectly Englished in the programme—"Life, Aspiration, Suffering, Struggle, Death, Fame"; its musical structure is that of its predecessors from the same pen. Raff was an excellent musician, who fell short of being a great musician only through want of concentration and originality. He developed no style of his own, but could express himself in almost any style he chose to adopt. There is no individual creation in his Sixth Symphony, but there is plenty of excellent music. Madame Ida Bloch was the pianist, and Miss Ella Lemmens the vocalist of the Concert.

It should be added that after the opening Concert Mr. A. J. Eyre gave a Recital on the great Festival Organ, newly reconstructed by Messrs. Gray and Davison.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THESE performances were resumed on the 16th ult., when a crowded audience testified to the continued and, if possible, increasing popularity of this excellent institution, which has now entered upon the twenty-fifth year of its existence. There was, however, no special feature introduced into the programme to mark the jubilee character of the occasion, such as would have been the case under similar circumstances on the Continent. Nor has there been an attempt at emulating another laudable Continental custom, consisting in the publication on such occasions of a summary report of the previous activity of the establishment. This, however, the director has probably reserved for the end of the present season, when the cycle of twenty-five years will be completed, and when it will form an interesting and valuable record of the exertions during that period of an institution which has already done, and continues to do, so much in cultivating the public taste for abstract music of the highest type.

The performance in question opened with a fine rendering on the part of Madame Norman-Néruda and MM. Ries, Holländer, Zerbin, Pezze, and Piatti, of Brahms's Sextet in G major (Op. 36), one of the most finished and most profound among the chamber compositions of modern production, and a work, moreover, illustrating in a marked degree the peculiar intermediate position occupied by its composer between the classical Beethoven and the romantic Schumann. Mdlle. Janotha was the pianist, and gained her usual well-deserved applause in Mendelssohn's characteristic "Variations Sérieuses"; another instrumental solo being contributed by Madame Norman-Néruda, who played, for the third time at these Concerts, the Prelude, Romance, and Scherzo (from Op. 27) for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, by Franz Ries. The three movements, although not conspicuous for originality of thought, are exceedingly well-written for the instrument, and received a masterly interpretation at the hands of the lady executant, whose exquisite "singing" of the Romance more especially elicited enthusiastic applause. Songs by Handel, Schumann, and Mendelssohn were well declaimed by Miss Carlotta Elliot; and the Concert concluded with a capital performance of Haydn's bright and genial string Quartet in D minor (Op. 42), in which the lady violinist and MM. Ries, Holländer, and Piatti took the respective parts.

The programme of the following Saturday afternoon Concert included a very thoughtful reading, on the part of Mdlle. Janotha, of Beethoven's pianoforte Sonata (Op. 27) in E flat, the fine impression produced by which was, however, partly marred by a portion of the audience insisting upon an encore, to which the lady, with evident reluctance, responded by playing another piece. A welcome feature also of the Concert was Signor Piatti's finished rendering of the violoncello Sonata in D major, by Locatelli, in which he was ably supported by Mr. Zerbin, who played the pianoforte accompaniment. The performance opened with Schumann's string Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1), executed by Madame Norman-Néruda and MM. Ries, Holländer, and Piatti, and concluded with Mozart's charming Sonata for pianoforte and violin, in F major, in which the two lady executants of the Concert took part. Mr. Santley created the usual furor in his favourite songs "O, ruddier than the cherry" and Gounod's "Maid of Athens," to which he added, in response to several recalls, the chanson arabe "Medjé" by the same composer.

On Monday evening, the 23rd ult., Beethoven's string Quartet in E flat (Op. 74, No. 10), known as the "Harfen Quartet," on account of the arpeggio passages for the first violin for which the Allegro movement is conspicuous, one of the most characteristic works of the master's so-called second period, formed the first item in the programme. The pianoforte Sonata in E minor (Op. 90) by the same composer, consisting of two movements only, and associated by tradition with an amorous episode in the life of Count Lichnowski, to whom the work is dedicated, was played with her usual poetic feeling and refinement by Mdlle. Janotha. Again the most noisy portion of the audience testified to its want of good taste by repeated calls for an encore, a demand to which the performer finally retaliated, as we take it, by playing some dashing variations on "Home, sweet home," which, singularly out of place though they appeared in these surroundings, were probably intended as a well-merited rebuke to the noisy clamourers, rather than as an affront to that section of the audience which manifested its disapproval by some slight hisses. However that may be, it is high time that some effectual measures were adopted to check this annually increasing and, from an artistic point of view, most objectionable practice. Other numbers of the evening's programme were a violoncello Sonata in F major, by Porpora, played in his accustomed masterly style by Signor Piatti, and Schumann's Sonata for pianoforte and violin, in A minor (Op. 105), in which the lady pianist was associated with Madame Norman-Néruda, who also led the performance of Beethoven's Quartet. Miss Santley was the vocalist, and contributed songs by Handel, and Maude V. White. The young singer has made decided progress since last we heard her at these concerts, her voice having gained somewhat in fulness and timbre, and her execution in general finish. Mr. Zerbin, on the three occasions here referred to, was a most efficient accompanist.

THE JAVANESE "GAMELAN."

MORE than two thousand years ago, when Britain was peopled by savage tribes, the inhabitants of Java had attained a high degree of civilisation. All that now survives of the ancient Javanese race is a people physically and intellectually degenerate, who inhabit two small provinces of the island, Djocjokarta and Solo. Their religion, we are told, has been changed by foreign influence, many of their arts have fallen into decadence, and even their language has undergone alteration; but they reverently preserve their literature, and in successive generations musicians and performers are trained for the rendering of the traditional drama. It is as a subordinate element in the drama that Javanese music has been preserved in its highest form. To understand the music it is necessary to understand the story it accompanies. The music, like the intoned declamation and gestures of the performers, forms an integral part of the dramatic representation.

For all this learning we are indebted to the printed programme of the Javanese "Gamelan"—admission, one shilling—Imperial Theatre, Royal Aquarium, Westminster. Some further particulars are afforded by a gentleman who addresses the audience during one of the pauses in the performances of the Javanese at the Imperial Theatre. By him we are informed that the "Gamelan," or orchestra, including actors and musicians, consists of about thirteen performers. The instruments, chiefly of percussion, such as gongs of various shapes and plates of wood and metal, are valued at £2,000. The cup-shaped gongs are made of an alloy of silver and copper. The principal instrument is nevertheless a two-stringed viol, like the older form of the rebab introduced into Europe by the Arabs. An ancient form of the flute is also in the orchestra. The Javanese, we are told, have no notation for their music, which is learned orally, and transmitted from generation to generation by tradition. From that fact alone we understand that, making allowances for the degeneracy of the people, and the natural enfeeblement of traditions descending through more than twenty centuries, we are, when listening to the Javanese "Gamelan," absolutely witnessing an ancient music-drama, contemporaneous at least with Aristotle and Aristoxenus, and perhaps Æschylus, or may be Homer or King David. The first impression one receives of ancient music, as produced at the Westminster Aquarium, is that of a tinker's shop with a very bad viola obbligato. The drama itself is even less intelligible to a modern European than the music. It is not an acted drama like that of the Chinese, in which music is occasionally called into requisition to heighten the pathos or sentiment of a situation too intense for ordinary language to express. It has, on the other hand, no resemblance to what in modern days is called a ballet d'action, wherein the argument is easily followed by the spectators. In the Javanese drama there seems to be no dialogue, and, strictly speaking, there is no pantomime. The few sentences here and there sung or intoned by the actors appear to the uninitiated to be independent musings or meditations, similar to the moralisings of a Greek chorus; but there are two accompaniments, which are incessant: firstly, the music; and secondly, a poetry or language of signs and gestures, rather than of motion and pantomime, as in the ballet. The delicate flexibility of the hands and arms of the performers is manifestly the result of a long and almost painful education; the nervous tremulousness of the hands resembling that often noticeable in the hands of experts on musical instruments. The object of such training can be appreciated only by those who know the language and traditions of the Javanese, for whom the gestures of the actors must possess some very real significance. As to most of us, it possesses no significance at all; and if, as we are told, "to understand the music we must understand the story," we must be content to understand neither, or at least to treat the music as we might a symphony of Mozart or a song without words by Mendelssohn. Even from that point of view, the Javanese music, as we gradually accustom our ears to the strange intonation and the still stranger qualities of sound, possesses a certain fascination, and is much better than we might expect from an orchestra consisting of instruments of percussion of a beautiful make but of a primitive form, and limited to a scale of five, or in some cases six, notes in the octave. The strangeness of intonation or of quality of tone is more marked in the viol, bowed like a violoncello, and in the voices of the singers, or rather actors. The similarity between the nasal bleat of the voices and that of the viol is so absurd that it is difficult to recognise one from the other, particularly as the actors in intoning scarcely move their lips. Still it is in the voices and the viol rather than in the fixed-toned instruments we must seek for the character or genus of the intonation, which varies very much, and is, in the absence of recognised system or notation, next to impossible to define without careful examination and the aid of apparatus. One thing, however, is very certain—that, contrary to what might have been expected of ancient music, and above all things of strictly Oriental music, the system is not minor, but from beginning to end major. Supposing the system to be pentatonic, the scale is not a major scale with the fourth and seventh notes omitted, but with the re and the la omitted, which in a major diatonic system are above all others the variable notes. The notes forming the tritone in a common major scale are much used in a Javanese melody. Its general characteristics appear to be more or less as in this rough sketch, where, it will be observed, there is neither a re nor a la:

It would not be safe to theorise on the strength of the Javanese major system as represented at the Westminster Aquarium. If in Java foreign influence has changed the religion and the language, it might very well have had some effect on musical traditions. The instrumentation of the "Gamelan" music is, for instance, curiously clever, and indicates a knowledge of effect which if it existed, as it may be presumed it did, in a higher degree, two or three thousand years ago, supposing that the Aquarium band of flute, viol, drums, glockenspiel, and pianoforte—or harmonica—is a genuine outcome of tradition, then those who still nurse their delusions in regard to the ancient Greek orchestra may take courage. We can with some justice concede that the instrumental music of the Greeks was as superior to that of Java in its best days as the Greek drama is to the "Wayang" or "Samedang," which, according to the programme of the Javanese "Gamelan," mean respectively "The Ardjoeno War" and "The Royal Banana Tree." The female performers in the "Gamelan" in the interpretation of their own drama of gesture may be consummate artists; but, generally, in regard to manner and appearance, melodic phrasing, and bleating quality of voice, they resemble exactly the half-caste and degenerate descendants of the Incas.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Bristol musical season may be said to have commenced on the 2nd ult. with the performance of Beethoven's opera "Fidelio," at the New Theatre Royal, by the Carl Rosa company. This company remained a week, having a full house each night, especially on the 4th and 6th ult., when they gave Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and Gounod's "Faust." The next event of interest was the first Monday Popular Concert (sixth season) of which the programme was as follows: Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn; Recitative and Air, "Angels ever bright and fair," Handel; Symphony, No. 4, in B flat, Gade; Air, "Honour and arms," Handel; Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Hungarian Dances, Brahms; Recitative and Air, "Softly sighs," Weber; Entr'acte, "Sevillana," Massenet; Ländler, "Grossmutterchen," Langer; Song, "The old grenadier," A. C. Mackenzie; Waltz, "La Plus Belle," Waldeufel; March, "Cornelius," Mendelssohn. Mr. Riseley's band has a new leader in the person of Mr. Carrington, and shows signs of careful rehearsal during the "off" months. The first violins are stronger, and the band has in every respect much improved. The Symphony was the most successful part of a generally successful Concert, though there were one or two trifling faults to be found in it, as, for instance, in the coda of the Allegro Vivace, where the tremolo of the strings was scarcely kept down enough, and obscured the sustained notes of the flutes and reeds, and in the beautiful Scherzo, where the drums were too conspicuous. Barring these mistakes, there was more finish and delicacy about the Symphony as a whole than is usual with this band, though the broad effects of light and shade, and the admirable "sforzando," which are its strongest points, were not wanting. Miss Kate Hardy and Mr. Lucas Williams, were the vocalists, the latter obtaining much applause in Mr. Mackenzie's spirited ballad.

The Bristol Musical Association gave its eighth Concert on the 14th ult., Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" being the principal item in the performance. Mrs. Villiers, Miss Hayes, Mr. Morgan, and Mr. Dyer were the soloists.

The assiduous practice of the Festival choir, which I commented upon in my last letter, culminated on the 16th ult. in a nine hours' rehearsal with Mr. Hallé's band at the Colston Hall; and it is gratifying to Bristol that the result, as far as the local section of the Festival was concerned, proved fairly satisfactory. The praise bestowed upon the choir by so many of the London critics shows what Bristol talent, properly encouraged, is capable of; and there is no doubt that with sufficient rehearsal beforehand, instead of nine hours hard labour on the day immediately preceding the public performance, the choir would have merited and obtained far higher commendation.

The People's Concert Society gave a performance of Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" on the 21st ult., Miss Julia Jones, Madame Rosa Bailey, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Montague Worlock being the soloists. There was a large attendance.

The second Monday Popular Concert took place on the 23rd ult., when the following programme was performed: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony, No. 3, in E flat, "Eroica," Beethoven; Recitative and Air, "Che farò," Gluck; Overture to "Tannhäuser," Wagner; Minuet and Trio, Prout; Aria, "Di tanti palpiti," Rossini; Albumblatt, Wagner; and Ländler, "Grossmutterchen," Langer (by request); Song, "The Lost Chord," Sullivan; Overture to "Zampa," Hérold. The drums were frequently too loud and not always in tune in the Symphony, and there was occasionally a want of attack in the first movement, which went the least well of the four. The flutes in the "second subject" of the Finale were very good. In the Overture to "Oberon" the same over-loudness of the drums was noticeable, but the Overture to "Tannhäuser," a standing favourite in Bristol, was altogether successful. Mr. Prout's graceful Minuet and Trio were played con amore, and had a warm reception from the audience. Miss Hilda Wilson's name is familiar to your readers in connection with the Hereford Festival. She was the only vocalist on this occasion, and sustained her reputation. Mr. Riseley accompanied Sullivan's ballad on the organ, but even his perfect playing (which his audience would gladly hear oftener at these Concerts) could not prevent a question arising as to whether there may not be other songs, of at least equal merit, which are not so painfully familiar to the concert and drawing-room listener alike.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Yorkshire musical season of 1882-83 was opened on the 5th ult., when a Vocal and Instrumental Concert was given in the Leeds Town Hall, the vocalists being Madame Carlotta Patti, Madame Evans Warwick, Mr. Percy Blandford, Mr. Joseph Lynde, and Signor Vergara; and the instrumentalists, Signor Papini (solo violin), M. Ernest de Munck (solo cello), and Signor Tito Mattei (solo pianist). The latter also acted as Conductor. Madame Patti was indisposed, but nevertheless sang Verdi's air "Caro nome" (from "Rigoletto") and some English ballads with the greatest taste. Mr. Lynde's first appearance here was highly successful, and Signor Vergara's selections (which included the Toreador's song from Bizet's "Carmen") were artistically rendered. The instrumentalists were much and deservedly applauded. A similar Concert was given in St. George's Hall, Bradford, on the following evening, and by the same artists.

Mr. Walter Parratt, Mus. Bac., Oxon., the newly appointed organist of St. George's Chapel Royal, Windsor, delivered in the Town Hall of his native town, Huddersfield, on the 10th ult., the first of the series of "Highfield Lectures," his subject being "Organs and Organ Music." The lecturer illustrated his remarks by numerous selections of organ music on the fine instrument which was built for the Festival of last year, and rendered them in a manner worthy of his Oxford reputation. Additional interest was imparted to the lecture by the appearance of Madame Patey, who was in excellent voice, and sang in faultless style, "He shall feed His flock" ("Messiah") and two secular songs.

Mr. Abercrombie's Concerts at the Huddersfield Town Hall, on the 12th ult., and at St. George's Hall, Bradford, on the 13th ult., were not as well patronised as they ought to have been, considering the character of the programme and the reputation of the artists engaged: the names of Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Helen d'Alton, Mr. Abercrombie and Mr. Frederick King as vocalists, with Miss Maggie Okey as solo pianist, and Mr. Turlie Lee as conductor, should have attracted larger audiences. Mr. Abercrombie is, we believe, a native of Yorkshire, and has often sung before Yorkshire audiences, but never with the success which attended his efforts at the concerts under notice: Madame Edith Wynne's interpretation of Gounod's air "Far greater in his lowly state," from "La Reine de Saba," was excellent, and Mr. King's style of singing imparted quite a new interest to the well-known songs which he selected.

The Leeds Choral Society, under new management, financial and musical, has again come forward, and performed Handel's "Solomon," at the Leeds Town Hall, on the 17th ult. The chorus, as those present had naturally expected, was very fine in power and tone; but at the same time it hardly showed itself capable of dealing with the more expressive passages of the work, such as occur in "May no rash intruder," and "Draw the tear from hopeless love": this defect will, however, be removed by further experience: the massive double choruses were very finely sung, especially "Praise the Lord with harp and tongue," and "From the censor." The band was hardly powerful enough for the occasion, being very deficient in wind instruments. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Marie Thompson, Miss A. Clarke, Mr. G. Howard Welch, and Mr. W. Morton. Miss Clarke, who is the possessor of a very pleasing contralto voice of even quality, and Mr. Welch, of Durham Cathedral, were the most successful. Dr. Creser, the Organist of the Leeds Parish Church, conducted with care and discretion; we thought, however, that in the airs, "What though I trace" and "Can I see my infant gored," some of the effect was lost through the speed of the tempi. The reprehensible practice of applauding between the numbers was freely indulged in.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was given by the Huddersfield Choral Society in the Town Hall, on the 20th ult. Again the chorus-singing was the feature of the performance, being not only remarkable for a display of power, but also for considerable taste in the less massive choral numbers; the "Hailstone" chorus was redemanded, and the expressive chorus, "He sent a thick darkness," was equally successful. The vocalists were Miss Tomlinson, Miss Orridge, whose song, "Thou shalt bring them in," was encored; and Mr. Auty, a local tenor vocalist, who was so successful in "The enemy said" that he was compelled to repeat it. Mr. Joshua Marshall conducted an excellent band with great care, and Mr. H. L. Parratt used the organ with discretion when it was needed. The duet, "The Lord is a man of war," was sung as a chorus with the usual telling effect.

A series of Concerts was given at York in the Exhibition Building, from the 16th to the 21st ult. On the 16th Rossini's "Stabat Mater" formed the first part of the programme, the principals being Madame Lemmens-Sherington, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Burdon; the orchestra being under the direction of Mr. R. S. Burton. On the 18th a Concert of operatic and ballad music was provided, with the assistance of Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Maybrick as vocalists, M. Buziau as violinist, and Mr. Sidney Naylor as conductor. On the 19th there was a similar concert, with Mr. Bridson as vocalist. On the other evenings of the week military and orchestral music was performed by the bands of the Royal Engineers, 5th Dragoon Guards, Scots Guards, and others.

Mr. R. S. Burton has made a praiseworthy attempt to provide the people of Leeds with Orchestral Concerts of classical music at popular prices, his Harrogate orchestra having appeared in the Albert Hall, Leeds, on the 7th, 12th, 13th, and 14th ult. The experiment was not, however, a financial success, but we hope that it will soon be repeated.

The coming Leeds Musical Festival is already engaging attention. Meetings of the committee have been held, and at one of these the Hon. Sec. (F. R. Spark, Esq.) stated that the guarantee fund was at that time double the amount realised at a corresponding date three years ago. It is as yet too soon to speak of the programme of music to be performed, as it is not published, but if prevailing rumours are to be trusted, the Festival of 1883 will not be behind its three precursors, either in important new works, or in the selection of works already published.

Since writing the above we learn from the Honorary Secretary that the guarantee fund for the coming Festival now amounts to £13,000, which is more than double the sum reached up to the present date in 1879, and that the new works to be performed will include an Oratorio by Professor G. A. Macfarren entitled "King David," a secular Cantata, "Sardanapalus," by Mr. Frederick Clay, and a sacred work by Mr. J. Barnby.

THE prospectus of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace contains a number of interesting features which must assuredly make this, the twenty-seventh season, a memorable one in the history of these excellent performances. Besides Brahms's Second Pianoforte Concerto and Raff's Symphony in D (No. 6, Op. 189), given for the first time in England on the 14th and 21st ult. respectively, first performances of an early Symphony by Haydn, called "Le Midi," with two violins and cello concertante, Schubert's Symphony in E, No. 7 (which Mr. J. F. Barnett will complete from the composer's draft), and a MS. Symphony by Mr. T. Wingham are announced. For the first time at the Crystal Palace Mozart's Concertante Symphony in E flat (solo violin, Herr Joachim, and solo viola, Mr. Krause), Mr. C. V. Stanford's Orchestral Serenade and Mr. Hubert Parry's Symphony—both produced at the recent Birmingham Festival—selections from Gade's "Summer Day in the Country," Mancinelli's "Cleopatra," Bizet's "L'Arlésienne," a Symphonic Poem, "Visegrad," by Smetana, Legends by Dvůřák, &c., will be performed; and, amongst the choral works, Handel's "Acis and Galatea" will be revived. The "chief interest of this series of Saturday Concerts, however," says the prospectus, "will be centred in the performance of Gounod's new Oratorio, 'The Redemption,' which will be given at one of the early Concerts; and Berlioz' "Messe des Morts," to be performed on one of the Saturdays in Lent. For both these works exceptional engagements will be effected, and there can be little doubt that exceptionally large audiences will be attracted on each occasion. Engagements have been made with Miss Mary Davies, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Ella Lemmens (her first appearance at these Concerts), Mdlle. Carlotta Badia, Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Marian Fenna, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli. Instrumentalists: Mdlle. Janotha, Madame Ida Bloch, Miss Emma Barnett, Miss Marie Wurm, Mr. Carrodus, Mr. Oscar Beringer, Mr. E. Howell, and Herr Joachim; Mr. Manns, of course, retaining the office of Conductor. The season extends from the 14th ult. to June 2, 1883, with the usual vacation at Christmas.

THE "Proceedings" of the Musical Association, recently forwarded to us, is a volume of the highest value to all interested in the progress of the art. When the Society was first established, we spoke freely our opinions upon the importance of carefully selecting for reading and discussion subjects having a practical bearing upon music and musicians, and we now have additional pleasure in bearing testimony to the excellent manner in which this object has been lately carried out, because, in the early days of the Association, it seemed to be drifting gradually into a mathematical congress. Of course it is impossible to review a book of this nature; but, as the papers contain not only the ripe thought of their authors, but materials for thought in their readers, we subjoin a list of the contents: "On the Arrangement of the Stops, Pedals, and Swell in the Organ," by Mr. R. H. M. Bosanquet; "On the Beats of Mistuned Harmonic Consonances," by the same; "The Cultivation of Church Music," by Mr. W. H. Monk; "Songs and Song Writers," by Mr. Eustace J. Breakspere; "On some Italian and Spanish Treatises on Music of the Seventeenth Century," by Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley; "Consecutive Fifths," by Dr. Gladstone; "Sir William Sterndale Bennett," by Mr. Arthur O'Leary; "Some Remarks on Richard Wagner's Music-Drama 'Tristan und Isolde,'" by Mr. H. F. Frost; "From Rhythmic Pulsation to Classical Outline," by Dr. H. Hiles; and "On Various Attempts that have been made to Record Extempore Playing," by Mr. T. L. Southgate.

MR. F. A. BRIDGE, who has relinquished his appointment as Choirmaster of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, was, at a meeting recently held in the Vestry-hall of the parish, presented with a framed testimonial, expressing the regret felt by all at his resignation. The testimonial was handed to Mr. Bridge from the clergy, churchwardens, overseers, and parishioners, by Mr. Churchwarden James (in the absence of the Vicar), accompanied by a handsome drawing-room clock and pair of ornaments en suite. This has been followed by an electro-silver reading-lamp, from the gentlemen of the choir, and a pair of antique two-handled Dresden cups, covers, and stands, from the choir boys.

THE prospectus of the twelfth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, pays a well-merited tribute to the zeal and skill of the Conductor, Mr. Joseph Barnby, to whom the Association certainly owes much of its success. The Society is now under the patronage of Her Majesty; and the Directors are naturally anxious that this mark of royal favour shall be acknowledged by an increase of exertion on their part, and earnestly solicit the support of all serious lovers of music to aid them in their efforts. The commencement of the season, on the 1st inst., will be marked by the production, for the first time in London, of Gounod's new Oratorio "The Redemption"; and the works also named for performance during the season are Berlioz' "Faust," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Handel's "Messiah," Haydn's "Creation," and Beethoven's Mass in D. There will be eight Subscription Concerts; and subscribers to the series will have the privilege of attending the weekly rehearsals of the Society on Monday evenings. Engagements have been made, or are pending, with the following artists: Madame Albani, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Valleria, Madame Marie Roze, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Fassett, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Santley, Mr. Frederick King, Mr. Henry Pyatt. The organ will remain in the able hands of Dr. Stainer, and Mr. Barnby of course retains the post of Conductor.

THE first regular meeting of the newly formed Society of Professional Musicians was held at the Old Town Hall, Manchester, on Saturday evening, the 7th ult., the chair being occupied by Dr. Henry Hiles, of Manchester, and about twenty members of the musical profession being present. After the Honorary Secretary had read the minutes of the last preliminary meeting, the Chairman, in his opening remarks, referred to the want of such a Society, not only for the protection of the interests of the musical profession, but also to bring musical men in contact with one another, and to create a more genial and worthy feeling amongst them. Through the instrumentality of this Society, professional men would be able to meet together on a common platform and discuss subjects of vital interest to the profession at large. In conclusion, Dr. Hiles said that over fifty names had been received in reply to 100 circulars sent out, and he accounted for the small number of circulars issued by stating that the Honorary Secretary (Mr. James Dawber, of Wigan) had restricted himself to men who were well known as bona fide professors, and he hoped that other men who had inadvertently been overlooked would come forward and make themselves known. Votes were then taken for the election of fifteen members to serve on the Council.

THE Sixth Report of the Sydney Musical Union for the season, extending from July 1, 1881, to June 30, 1882, shows, we regret to say, that the hopes for the future of the Society which were entertained and expressed by the Committee at the commencement of the season have not been realised. The losses sustained by the first two Concerts were indeed so heavy that it became doubtful whether it would be possible to carry on the Society to the end of the season; but the members of the Committee having made themselves personally responsible to the amount of £200, the promise of four Concerts made in the prospectus was faithfully carried out. For the seventh season it is sincerely to be hoped that more extensive patronage will be accorded to the Union. The indefatigable Conductor, Mr. Moss, has, not only in rendering his valuable artistic services to the Society, but in relinquishing his share of the profits of a Concert organised in aid of the funds, shown an interest in the welfare of the institution which should be an incentive to all who desire the progress of high-class music in Sydney.

NIELS W. GADE's Cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter" was most successfully performed at the monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society, given at the Grosvenor Hall on the 20th ult., under the direction of Mr. G. R. Egerton. The solo vocalists in the Cantata were Madame Gedge-Glover, Miss Emma Buer, and Mr. Frederick Bevan. A miscellaneous selection of choruses, part-songs, and solos was also given, the latter by Miss Edith Anderson, Mr. S. G. Millen, and the before-mentioned artists. Miss Florence Hartley was a most efficient accompanist.

THE Camden Town Harvest Festival was held on the 5th ult., at the Parish Church, and was attended by an immense congregation. The choir consisted of members of the choirs of the Parish Church, St. Philip's, Regent Street, St. James's, Hampstead Road, and St. Matthew's, City Road (Guild Choir). They were supported by two cornets, a saxhorn and euphonium, placed respectively among the trebles, tenors and basses. The choir and clergy entered the church singing in procession the hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come." The canticles were Cantate Domino and Deus misereatur (Goss), and the anthem "Sing praises to God" (Wareing). By the addition of a small band of strings and wood very fine contrasts were produced, the accompaniment of the tenor solo of the anthem by strings alone, and the introduction of the brass in the verse "With trumpets also and shawms" having an extremely good effect. A solemn Te Deum was sung after the offertory, and the service closed with the hymn "Now thank we all our God," sung in procession. Praise is due to Mr. A. H. Crowest, the choirmaster, for the very satisfactory manner in which the details of the service were carried out. Mr. Meredith presided at the organ.

On Friday, the 20th ult., a tablet memorial of Balfe was unveiled in Westminster Abbey, in the presence of a large number of spectators, including many eminent artists. The tablet is placed in the north-west aisle, near the monuments of Purcell and Dr. Arnold, the tomb of William Sterndale Bennett, and opposite the monuments of Dr. Blow and Dr. Croft. The tablet is of Carrara marble. On the lower panel is the inscription, "Michael William Balfe. Born in Dublin, the 15th of May, 1808; died at Rowney Abbey, Hertfordshire, the 20th of October, 1870." On the moulding below are the words, "Knight of the Legion of Honour of France; Commander of the Order of Charles III. of Spain." Resting on the top of the panel is an oval medallion portrait of the composer; on one side of the medallion are shown books of the scores of his Operas "The Talisman" and "The Bohemian Girl," and on the other side a book, open at the words of the well-known song, "Then you'll remember me." The speech of the Rev. Canon Duckworth on the occasion was eloquent and earnest; but even the most enthusiastic admirers of Balfe might have wished that he had left some few sentences unsaid.

THE Harvest Festival Services at St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, took place on Wednesday, September 27, and were attended by large congregations. At midday a service for City men was held, when the music consisted of Smart's Te Deum in F and Albert Lowe's Anthem "The earth is the Lord's." The sermon was preached by the Rev. T. Bates. At evensong the service commenced with the processional hymn "We march to victory" (S. Gee). The proper psalms were 65 and 148. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to a setting in F by J. T. Musgrave, and the anthem was "I will magnify Thee, O God my King," by Calkin. After an eloquent sermon by the Rev. F. W. Kingsford, two hymns were sung, followed by a solemn Te Deum (Hopkins, in G). The whole of the music was excellently rendered by the choir, under the able direction of Mr. C. E. Tutill, the choirmaster, and the accompaniments and voluntaries were admirably performed by Miss Kate Westrop, the organist. The services were continued on Sunday, the 1st ult., when a Communion Service by Henry Houseley, in F, was sung.

THE Harvest Thanksgiving Service in connection with St. Matthew's, New Kent Road, took place on Wednesday evening, the 11th ult., and following Sunday. The service was Smart's, in B flat, and the anthem consisted of the greater portion of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the recitative and air "Sing ye praise" being effectively sung by Mr. Cornwall. An eloquent and appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Barry, D.D., after which Mendelssohn's quartet "O come every one that thirsteth" was sung, followed by the double-choir motett "Blessing, glory, wisdom" (Bach). On Sunday evening the anthem was "Praise the Lord" (Goss). The choir sang in a highly creditable manner under the able direction of Mr. W. Taylor, Organist and Choirmaster.

Justice; conductor, Mr. John Kirby; chorus, the Aberdeen Choral Union. The first concert was to take place on the 27th ult.; the second is announced for December 27; and the third for February 19, 1883.

THE prospectus of the South London Choral Association, for its fifteenth season announces that a performance of unaccompanied part-music will be given at St. James's Hall, and a series of six Concerts at the South London Institute of Music. The programmes of the Concerts comprise Handel's "Messiah," and "Israel in Egypt," W. Jackson's Cantata "The Year," selections from "Elijah," "Creation," &c., Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" (by the Camberwell Choral Society), and a performance by the instrumental band. In addition to this, Mr. Venables is engaged for the third time to conduct a choir at Mr. Boosey's "London Ballad Concerts," and for a performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at St. James's Hall on Good Friday. Mr. Venables of course continues to be conductor of the choir which owes not a little of its popularity to his exertions.

THE programme of the two Richter Concerts announced for the 9th and 14th inst. at St. James's Hall will be of exceptional interest to all lovers of high-class music. At the first the Introduction to Wagner's "Parsifal" will be given for the first time in England, and the programme also contains the Introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," Mr. Villiers Stanford's Orchestral Serenade (produced at the recent Birmingham Festival), Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F, and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The programme of the second Concert comprises Brahms's new Pianoforte Concerto, to be played by Mr. E. Dannreuther, the Introduction and Closing Scene from "Tristan und Isolde," Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." The orchestra will be led by Herr Ernst Schiever, and Herr Hans Richter will, as usual, be the Conductor.

THE first meeting of the Streatham Hill Literary Society was held at Mr. Evan Spicer's, Tulse Hill, on the 17th ult., when Mr. C. Dowdeswell lectured on "Richard Wagner and his Works." The lecturer was assisted by Miss Plummer, Miss Johnson, Mr. W. C. Ward, and Mr. Walter Dowdeswell. The selections consisted of Senta's ballad and the great duet between Senta and the Dutchman, from the "Flying Dutchman"; and Wolfram's Tournament Song, "The address to the evening star," Elizabeth's first song in the second act, and her well-known prayer from "Tannhäuser." The programme occupied about two hours only, but so lucid was Mr. C. Dowdeswell's exposition, so well chosen were the illustrations and so admirably was the music rendered, that an audience generally unfamiliar with Wagner was interested in the highest degree throughout the lecture.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at Wycliffe Chapel, Philpot Street, Commercial Road, on Sunday and Monday, the 8th and 9th ult.; at the former, Curwen's Harvest Thanksgiving Service was performed, and at the latter, Goss's "O taste and see," "Fear not O land," "I will magnify"; Barnby's "O Lord how manifold," Haydn's "The heavens are telling," &c., all of which were admirably given by the Chapel Choir, under the direction of Mr. George Merritt, the Choirmaster. Mr. George E. Hedges presided with much ability at the organ. On Thursday, the 12th ult., the elementary singing classes in connection with the Choir were inaugurated by an introductory lecture, illustrated by choirs of boys and mixed voices, under the direction of Mr. Merritt.

THE Church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street, City, celebrated its Dedication Festival on Friday, the 6th ult., with full choral evensong. As on previous occasions, Schubert's ever-fresh chorus for female voices, "The Lord is my Shepherd," preceded the service; for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis Attwood's setting in C was employed, and for the anthem a short selection from "St. Paul." A sermon, in music in lieu of prose, and in the shape of Dr. Stainer's popular Cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus," then followed; and in this, and indeed throughout the evening, the good singing of the boys from St. Paul's Cathedral, who rendered valuable assistance, was most noticeable. The service concluded with the hymn "The Son of God goes forth to war," sung, of course, to the grand old tune, "St. Ann." Mr. C. F. South presided most efficiently at the organ throughout the service.

WE have received a prospectus of the Amateur Dramatic and Musical Union of London, the object of which is to promote and defend the interests of purely amateur dramatic and musical clubs; to establish and encourage by social fortnightly meetings the production of dramatic, literary, and musical compositions contributed by the members; to form a dramatic library for reference; to keep a register of all dramatic performances given by the clubs associated with the Union; and to promote a strong and useful combination of dramatic and musical societies for their joint benefit. It is particularly requested that Secretaries of clubs sympathising with this movement and wishing to become members of the Union will communicate at once with Mr. George J. Kayner, the hon. sec., 37, Wetherell Road, South Hackney.

A SPECIAL Harvest Festival Service was held at the old Priory Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, West Smithfield, on Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., when the musical portion of the service was rendered with admirable taste and skill by the choir of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, under the direction of Mr. C. E. Tutill. The music was of an elaborate character, and comprised, amongst other compositions, a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C by Mr. W. M. Wait (organist of All Saints', Clapton), the solos in which were sung by Masters Dott and Davis, and the trio by Messrs. Dunand, Tutill, and C. J. Robinson. Mr. W. M. Wait presided at the organ with marked ability. A very eloquent sermon was preached by the Rev. A. Ingleby.

The selection included Prout's Evening Service in F, Dr. Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land" (the solos in which were expressively rendered by Mr. George Whillier and Master Busby), Beethoven's "Hallelujah" chorus ("Engedi"), Tallis's Festal Responses, and Special Psalms and Hymns. The music (which was under the direction of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. J. R. Griffiths) was well rendered by the choir, and gave great satisfaction. The church was beautifully decorated, and the Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B., preached on each occasion to large congregations.

Mr. Frank Austin, the Choirmaster and Organist, presided at the organ. The church was crowded.

AT St. Paul's Cathedral a Harvest Thanksgiving Service, was held on Monday evening, the 9th ult., when the church was attended by a large congregation. The music was sustained by the Cathedral and the Sunday Evening choirs, who sang the excellent plain Parish Church or Congregational Service, consisting of chants and hymns, which is employed on every Sunday evening through the year. The Medical Guild of St. Luke also held its Anniversary Service on the evening of the 18th ult., the feast of the Patron, when the musical arrangements were undertaken by the Gregorian Association, a small contingent from which was in attendance, conducted by Mr. Spenser Nottingham.

AT a Harvest Thanksgiving Service, held on Wednesday evening, the 4th ult., at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, a very creditable rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given by a mixed choir, aided by the boys of Westminster Abbey, by whom the treble solos were sustained. The service consisted of shortened evensong, sermon followed by the "Lobgesang," and hymns—the congregation being exceedingly large. The Cantata was accompanied by the organ only, the lady-organist of the church, Mrs. Bennett, keeping the voices together, without the aid of a conductor, in a highly commendable manner that did her infinite credit.

THE annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in Christ Church, Mayfair, on Wednesday evening, the 11th ult. Mr. R. Stokoe, Mus. THE "Orpheus Society," established especially for the study of classical music, deserves a few words of warm welcome as, when the original prospectus of the Association was forwarded to us, we ventured to offer some remarks upon the method in which such a Society should be managed. By a communication just received we find that these remarks were taken in good part; and the programme of a Concert announced for the 26th ult., is in every respect so excellent as to warrant us in the belief that one more institution is added to the many pledged to protect and promote the growth of healthy musical art.

THE Institute Choir and Music Classes at the Bow and Bromley Institute, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Monnaught, have now commenced; and it is announced that Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus," Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," and Gounod's new Oratorio "The Redemption," will be rehearsed during the season. An elementary singing class, for sight-singing on the Tonic Sol-fa method, an intermediate singing class, an advanced class for the study of difficult music in either notation, and a class for the theory of music are also formed at the institute.

In the morning, Garrett's Te Deum and Benedictus in D, Prout's Communion in F, Spohr's "As pants the hart" and Barnby's "Whatsoever ye would" and "Not every one" were sung; and in the evening, Calkin's Service in B flat; Gadsby's "Blessed be the name of the Lord" and "The heavens are telling" were the anthems, the latter preceded by "In splendour bright"; Gregorian Chants to the Psalms (special) and suitable hymns were also sung.

A VERY successful Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held at St. Anne's, Hoxton, on Sunday, the 15th ult. The Canticles were sung to chants selected from the "Cathedral Psalter," and Tallis's Responses were used. The Kyrie and Sanctus were sung to Merbecke's setting, the remainder of the music being chiefly from Helmore. Appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. D. H. Newman and the Vicar, the Rev. W. M. Puttock. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. George Dixon, the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. E. Puttock being the Precentor.

THE Bermondsey and Rotherhithe Choral Association gave a very successful Concert in the Drill Hall, on September 26, under the direction of Mr. Harding Bonner, assisted by the Royal Holdfast Hand-bell Ringers. The Choir sang several part-songs in a very creditable manner, and the bell-music met with great applause, and frequent encores. During the interval an address on the merits of Tonic Sol-fa singing was given by Mr. Robert Griffiths, Secretary of the Tonic Sol-fa College. The accompanist was Mr. Stretton Swann, Organist to the Bermondsey and Rotherhithe Choral Association.

THE accounts of the late Hereford Festival are now made up, and it appears that out of the credit balance of 1879 the Stewards have bought the materials and fittings of the temporary orchestra, which will save them considerable expenditure on future occasions. This has reduced the amount in hand from £101 os. 2d. to £43, which will of course be carried forward. The sum collected at the doors during the present year's Festival is £867 5s. 2d., but this may still be increased before remitting the share of the amount to each of the three dioceses.

A PROSPECTUS has been forwarded to us announcing the fourth season of the Subscription Smoking Concerts at the Cannon Street Hotel, with a choir of male voices and the following instrumental soloists: M. THE Sunday morning celebration of the Harvest Festival services at St. Saviour's Church, Herne Hill, took place on the 8th ult. The Te Deum and Jubilate were sung to Smart in F, and the anthem was Sydenham's "O give thanks." The singing was worthy of commendation throughout. Mr. Boardman presided at the organ.

AN Evening Concert was given at Barnsbury Hall, Islington, on the 11th ult. The programme was under the direction of the Cornelius Musical Society, the orchestra of which performed several selections; and songs were also given by Misses Ethel Harwood and Gordon, Messrs. Banly, A. Probert, H. Moynihan, Thorne, Warne and W. H. Mason. An operetta, supported by Mesdames Starling and Crook and Mr. Crook, was also performed with much success.

THE Ebury Glee Union gave the first of a series of Smoking Concerts at "The Restaurant," Westminster Chambers, on Saturday, the 14th ult. THE Blackheath Conservatoire of Music, under the presidency of Mr. Henry Hersee, announces a highly satisfactory list of professors in every branch of the art, and will no doubt prove a boon to the musical residents of the locality. The following week the Vicar and Churchwardens gave him a valuable dispatch-box and writing-desk combined.

THE Brondesbury Philharmonic Society announces in its prospectus for the fourth season that two Concerts will be given, the rehearsals for which have now commenced. The Society will continue under the able conductorship of Mr. Frederick Walker; and the orchestra, formed last year and conducted by Herr Alfred Laubach (of the Conservatoire and Gewandhaus Concerts, Leipzig), will be attached to the Society as before.

It is, we understand, extremely doubtful whether we shall have German Opera at all in London during next season, Her Majesty's Theatre and Drury Lane being both unavailable. It is a matter to be regretted that Italian Opera should be enabled to reign supreme by the fact of rivals being precluded from competing with it; but we are glad to learn that at Easter Mr. Carl Rosa will enter upon his season of English Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre.

A HARVEST Festival was held in the church of St. James's, Clerkenwell, on the 15th ult., followed by a Service of Song on the 17th, when Haydn's "Creation" was admirably rendered. THE performance of "The Redemption" which takes place to-day at the Royal Albert Hall is likely to be the most perfect and interesting which has yet been given of this great work, the size of the building enabling the composer's intentions to be carried out in a manner which has not been possible elsewhere. A special feature will be the rendering of the last chorus in the second part of the work, "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," in which the music assigned to the celestial choir will be sung by a chorus of from forty to fifty boys, who will be accompanied by a band of twelve harps. The solo singers will be Madame Albani, Miss Edith Santley, Madame Fasset, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Pyatt, and Mr. Santley; Conductor, Mr. Barnby. The curiosity to hear the work is very great, nearly all the tickets having been sold some days since.

The chorus rehearsals will commence on Friday evening, November 17, at the Neumeyer Hall. Mr. W. H. Cummings has kindly consented to conduct the choral meetings, and the superintendents of the old Society have proffered their valuable services as heretofore.

A SELECTION of the articles from the pen of Mr. Francis Hueffer the distinguished musical critic, which have appeared from time to time in the columns of The Times, and other important journals and magazines, has already had a large circulation in this country in the form of a volume entitled "Musical Studies." This volume has now appeared in Italy, the translation having been admirably done by Signor Visetti, the well-known teacher of singing.

The concerts (which will continue until March, 1883) are under the direction of Mr. Dorey, the organist.

ON Wednesday evening, the 25th ult., the Walworth Choral Society, now numbering 140 voices, opened the season by a performance of Dr. Sloman's "Supplication and Praise." A selection from "Israel in Egypt," and Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," formed the second part of the concert. Madame Jarratt and Mr. H. Blower, in their respective solos, were very successful, and Mr. Curtis conducted in a most efficient manner.

THE Organ Recitals at the Bow and Bromley Institute continue as attractive as ever. During the present season the organists have included Dr. Bridge, Messrs. Walter Parratt, E. H. Turpin, J. G. Wrigley, and Dr. A. L. Peace, of Glasgow; during the present month Dr. Stainer, Messrs. W. T. Best, Stimpson, and others will play; and in December Mons. Alex. Guilmant will give two Recitals.

THE London Church Choir Association Festival takes place on Thursday evening the 2nd inst. at 7.30, in St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast's recent prize setting (in B flat) of the Te Deum, published by Messrs. Augener and Co., is—with the exception of the chants and hymn-tunes—the only novelty in the music of the Festival.

MR. FREDERICK W. HOLDER announces a Concert at the Artillery Barracks, Hull, on the 8th inst., in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music, for which he has secured the services of Mr. Charles Hallé as Conductor, and Miss Julia Gaylord as solo vocalist; accompanist, Mr. J. ## REVIEWS.

Life of Mozart. By Otto Jahn. Translated from the German by Pauline D. Townsend. With a Preface by George Grove, Esq., D.C.L. In three volumes. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN his preface to this work, Mr. George Grove says "The book has been long familiar to me, and I regard its appearance in an English dress as an event in our musical history. It will be a great boon to students and lovers of music, and it shows how much the study of music has advanced among us when so large and serious a work is sufficiently appreciated to repay the heavy expense attendant on its translation and publication." These words suggest a thought which must occur to the mind of every amateur who, not being a reader of German, has long regretted that the masterpieces of musical biography are sealed to him, and who has often been told that no sufficient public exists in this country to warrant the cost of producing them in the vernacular. For long such music-lovers have heard with desire, and well nigh despair, not only of Jahn's "Mozart," but the still incomplete "Haydn," by Pohl, and other monuments of true German research and conscientiousness in the field of musical literature. There never was, however, any occasion for despair. Slowly, perhaps, yet surely, a musical reading public has formed itself; and the frequent appearance in English of works like Schumann's collected essays and criticisms and Wagner's "Beethoven" gave earnest of a time when still greater things would be done. That period has arrived—the three handsome volumes before us are proof of it, and we shall be greatly mistaken if their success do not demonstrate the absence of any reason why English amateurs should, in regard of musical literature, be less fortunate than their German brethren. An English reviewer is not likely to forget that we have long had a biography of Mozart from an English pen, and one which, till Jahn's work appeared, was as good or better than any other in any language. To this Herr Jahn himself bears testimony, and we are glad to reproduce his remarks concerning a literary effort so creditable to our country:—

"Holmes has arranged the essential portions of the correspondence with intelligence and discrimination, and has connected them by a narrative built upon previous notices; he has thus produced a trustworthy and, as far as was possible, an exhaustive account of Mozart's life. . . . He undertook a journey through Germany to inspect the original manuscripts in Andre's possession, and to collect stray oral traditions. He took care to make himself acquainted with musical literature, and the result is a work which must be considered as the most trustworthy and serviceable biography that could be produced by a skilful employment of the means generally accessible."

To the foregoing Herr Jahn adds:—

"Holmes has not attempted to draw from hitherto unknown sources; he neither carries his researches to any depth, nor offers any original opinions or explanations."

In these words, read inversely and applied to Jahn, we have a succinct statement of the features which most distinguish the voluminous biography under notice. "The task I proposed to myself," writes our author, "was a thorough investigation of the sources available for a trustworthy and exhaustive account of Mozart's life, with special reference to all that was calculated to affect his moral and musical development in the general conditions of his time, and in the local and personal circumstances which influenced him; and, in addition, a history of his development as an artist, and a characterisation of his artistic performances, as comprehensive as a thorough study and appreciation of his compositions could make it." From this it follows that an exhaustive review of the work would consider the contents under three heads—first, Mozart as man and artist; second, Mozart's works; third, connected persons and circumstances. Jahn himself, let us add, has made no such formal arrangement. Indeed, the order of his materials seems at times quite arbitrary; but this is only in seeming. As a rule, to which scarcely an exception can be discovered, his essays on, say, "Mozart as an Opera Composer" or "Mozart and Freemasonry" come at the right time for a complete understanding of their significance. Anticipating an objection that the great divisions of his subject should have been kept separate and not dovetailed, our author says: "No side of this task could be treated altogether independently, both the researches and the remarks resulting from them touching now one, now the other; in the biography, as in the individual, the artist and the man are indissolubly united."

Herr Jahn tells at length how laboriously he strove to get at facts. That he exhausted the available literature of his subject goes without saying; but not content—indeed, extremely discontented—with this, he went to Vienna and ransacked the Imperial city; thence to Salzburg, exploring the Mozarteum to its last letter, and puzzling the landlady of the Golden Ox by writing from morning till night in his room for three weeks. Next he lived in Andre's house at Frankfurt for five weeks, surrounded by the composer's manuscripts; and so, by indefatigable, patient labour, overlooking nothing that had even a remote connection with his theme, he brought together perhaps all there is to know concerning his hero. For this monumental achievement Herr Jahn deserves and enjoys the thanks of the musical world, and will be gratefully honoured by future generations, who without him would have but a dim and imperfect view of the greatest absolute musician that ever lived.

The space at command here altogether forbids any attempt at noticing in detail the contents of these volumes. For such a purpose nothing short of a series of articles would suffice, and we must be satisfied, therefore, to take a few passages, considering them as representative of the whole. From the chapters devoted to Mozart's personality, that on his connection with Freemasonry may be chosen as typical. It begins with a sketch of the circumstances under which Freemasonry flourished in Vienna, and then discusses the reasons which may have led Mozart to become an enthusiastic member of the brotherhood. The thing was fashionable at the time, but Jahn believes Mozart's motives to have been quite disinterested, springing from "his genuine love for mankind; his warm sympathies, both in joy and sorrow; his sincere desire to help and benefit others, which amounted even to a weakness; and perhaps the greatest attraction of all would be the satisfaction of his truly exceptional longing for friendship." We are assured that earnest endeavours after freedom of moral and intellectual development were at that time the special characteristic of Freemasonry in Vienna, and Herr Jahn holds that the effects of his connection with the Order are plainly discernible. His earnestness and devotion appear in a letter written to persuade his father to join, and are witnessed by the oration pronounced after his death. This is given, and forms a most interesting part of the chapter. "He was a zealous supporter of our order," said the speaker. "The main features of his character were brotherly love, devotion to the good cause, benevolence, and genuine satisfaction in using his talent for the good of his fellows. He was estimable alike as husband, father, friend of his friends, brother of his brothers; he wanted only wealth to make hundreds happy after his own heart." Jahn then goes on to show the influence of Freemasonry upon Mozart's compositions as illustrated in "Die Zauberflöte" and many other works. Even this brief reference to the scope of the chapter sufficiently shows the thoroughness with which Herr Jahn does his work. In fact each phase of the subject as it appears opens up, so to speak, a complete world, full of varied interest and worthy of separate study.

Turning to what we have called the second division of the work, we find all the musical forms in which Mozart's genius asserted itself treated elaborately. Operas, masses, orchestral and chamber music are criticised with plentiful use of music type, and the temptation is great indeed to follow Jahn into these disquisitions. The general reader would, perhaps, seek first for information concerning such points as the authenticity of the so-called Twelfth Mass, and Mozart's share in the "Requiem." The first of these is dismissed in a foot-note as something "given out in his name in which he had little part." On the other hand, the vastly more important second subject is treated at due length, and apparently cleared up for good and all. It appears that the "Requiem" and "Kyrie" were written out in full score by Mozart—"there can be no doubt about that," says our author. The "Dies Iræ" was sketched, with the voice part complete and ample indications for filling in the instrumental parts, as far as the words "Indicandum homo reus." The "Domine Jesu Christe" and "Offertorium" were also left virtually finished like the "Dies Iræ." This, as far as can positively be known, is all of the work with which Mozart had to do; but Herr Jahn conjectures, and in his analysis gives reasons based on the score, that Mozart may have detailed his plans to Süssmayr, or perhaps left some small scraps of paper on which he had jotted down ideas. Scraps of some kind certainly came into his possession after Mozart's death. Mozart's widow, anxious to obtain the price of the work from the famous unknown, gave the MS. to Eybler for completion, as a document here duly quoted goes to prove, and when he abandoned the task, transferred it to Süssmayr. So far, all was straightforward, assuming that Madame Mozart did not intend to palm off the music of another man as that of her late husband. Now, however, complications began. Süssmayr copied out all that Mozart had left incomplete so that two handwritings might not appear on the same page; then filled in the blanks of the score, and composed the remaining numbers. The MSS.—Mozart's and Süssmayr's—were then put together and handed over to the agent of Count Walsegg, who, curiously enough, had commissioned the "Requiem" under such mysterious circumstances in order to pass it off as his own. Count Walsegg, intending to deceive others, was deceived himself. Süssmayr's handwriting closely resembled Mozart's, and he perceived no difference, and therefore saw no reason for suspicion. All this, with much more, is set forth minutely by our author, who quotes an array of authorities imposing enough to carry conviction with their very names. In the minuteness here displayed we have an example of Herr Jahn's uniform method. He takes nothing for granted himself, and does not expect us to do so. His extended analyses of the master's great works must, as far as they convey opinion, be taken as opinion and no more; but he shows himself an intelligent and learned critic, and commands our respect even where he fails to influence our judgment.

As already intimated, these volumes are valuable for the light incidentally thrown upon a host of persons and things surrounding the central figure. Examples in proof are scarcely required. As may be imagined, crowds of figures, most of them more or less known to fame, pass before the reader; while Mozart's relation to his predecessors and their art is clearly shown, as far as consonant with the scope of the work. There remains to add that the volumes are adorned with several portraits of Mozart, taken at different periods, and one of his father, and that various appendices add materially to the value of the work. These include a notice of Mozart's sister, another on arrangements of his church music, and a third on the master's portraits, while a fourth gives a complete catalogue of his works. A specially compiled and copious index delights the eyes of students; and last, but far from least, the translator has reproduced Jahn's German in clear and excellent English, such as it is a pleasure to read. Need we add that these volumes should find a place in every musical amateur's library.

Ein Lebensbild Robert Schumann's. Von Philipp Spitta. [Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel, 1882.]

THIS is a separate publication, in the original German, of the article "Schumann" contained in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," to which most of our readers will naturally turn in preference, although there is a freshness and a directness in the author's diction which must inevitably lose somewhat in even the best of translations. In its present form the essay is published as one of the interesting series of musical discourses ("Sammlung musikalischer Vorträge") edited by Paul Graf Waldersee, to which many eminent writers, chiefly German, have already contributed, and which is still in progress. In a short preface Herr Spitta—the well-known Berlin professor, and author of the standard biography of Johann Sebastian Bach, reviewed in this journal some time since—mentions some of the reasons which have led to the separate issue of his article in German, which here occupies about a hundred pages of exceedingly clear type. "I should never have thought," the author says inter alia, "of publishing this little work had I not been enabled to add some new information here and there to that furnished in Wasielewski's excellent book on Schumann. A considerable number of unpublished letters were at my disposal, as also some musical autographs of the composer, from which I was able to gather several fresh facts. A personal intercourse, moreover, extending over some years, with intimate friends of Schumann during his lifetime, had afforded me an opportunity of collecting characteristic details from verbal tradition." Accordingly, some interesting data concerning the composer's career, both in its public and private aspects, are published here for the first time, while the author's enthusiastic appreciation of Schumann's individuality and artistic importance imparts a sympathetic warmth to the "Lebensbild" which he has drawn, and renders it most attractive reading. The book, like its predecessors of the same series, is most artistically "got up," and we take this opportunity of drawing the attention of our readers to these publications generally, which have already reached their thirty-eighth number with the present volume.

Transcription of Mendelssohn Bartholdy's Prayer from the Opera "Melusine."

Transcription of Mendelssohn Bartholdy's Song of Love. Arranged for the Piano by S. Kahlenberg. [B. Williams.]

WE have often called attention in this journal to the fact of musical publications being issued—sometimes with and sometimes without the name of the arranger—in which the notes of many of our eminent composers are made to serve a purpose utterly foreign to that intended by their authors. Words, for example, have been fitted to Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words"; themes by Beethoven set to commonplace verses by commonplace poets; and pianoforte works by classical writers transposed, altered, and even added to, without any intimation that they have been in the slightest degree tampered with. In every one of these cases, however, we are enabled to trace their origin; and all we have to complain of, therefore, is the tacit admission of a pernicious custom in music which certainly would not be tolerated in literature. The "Prayer" in the arrangement before us is a garbled version of the March of Priests which commences the second act of Mozart's "Zauberflöte"; but as we will not do the "transcriber" of the piece the injustice of supposing that he could so far transcend all the offences above mentioned as to sign a great artist's name to music which he never wrote, we must presume that he has not only discovered an opera by Mendelssohn called "Melusine," but that in this work the composer has wilfully taken a March by Mozart as the subject of a Prayer. This matter requires clearing up forthwith; and as the "Song of Love" is also known only to the "arranger" of the music, we trust that he will without delay inform us by what accident he lighted upon works which have so long eluded the research of the most ardent lovers of Mendelssohn's music.

That Day. Song. Words by Frederick E. Weatherly. Music by F. Paolo Tosti.

I will suffer silently. Words by J. Enderssohn. Music by L. Denza. [Ricordi.]

SIGNOR PAOLO TOSTI is rapidly making his way as a song-writer in this country, through the agency of the Milan publisher's London establishment; and although the composition before us has but small musical pretence, it is so simply written for the voice, and so sympathetically accompanied, as to ensure its acceptance both with singers and listeners, to whom we cordially commend it. The name of the author of the poetry of the second song (which is spelt "Enderssohn" on the title-page and "Henderssohn" inside) will scarcely, we think, be immortalised by the verses he has supplied for musical illustration; but the composer has produced a really refined and expressive ballad, which will most assuredly earn popularity with all who love melodious and unaffected specimens of this class of music. Both these songs are published in four keys, so as to render them available for any kind of voice—a proof that, unlike the writers of a past age, the composers have not thought out their vocal phrases in any particular register.

Yellow Jasmine. From the Suite "The Language of the Flowers." Composed by Frederic H. Cowen. Arranged for the Violin and Piano by Berthold Tours. [Metzler and Co.]

MR. COWEN'S charming orchestral Suite "The Language of the Flowers" (so successfully performed at the recent Birmingham Festival) is certain of a cordial reception wherever it is heard; and we heartily welcome, therefore, this number (which received an enthusiastic encore at Birmingham) in a shape easily presentable in our drawing-rooms. Mr. Tours has very skilfully adapted the piece, retaining all the salient points, and reproducing, as well as his means would permit, the many beautiful orchestral effects with which the composition abounds. We recommend this arrangement with the utmost confidence to those who have, as well as to those who have not, heard the work from which it is transcribed.

Tell me where is Fancy bred. A Part-Song or Glee for four voices. Poetry by Shakespeare. Composed by Ciro Pinsuti. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS song was composed expressly for an amateur performance of "The Merchant of Venice" at St. George's Hall in April last, and pleased so much as to be enthusiastically encored. It is now published for male voices (as it was originally sung), and also transposed and arranged for mixed voices. The spirit of Shakespeare's verses has been thoroughly caught by the composer, who, we need scarcely say, evidences in all his writings the sympathy of a poet with the skill of a musician. Choral Societies will, we are certain, be extremely gratified with this latest addition to the rapidly increasing stock of part-music which has already been enriched by so many high-class compositions from Signor Pinsuti's pen.

Blue-Beard. A Humorous Cantata, for Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra. Words from "Dean's Panoramic Pantomime Toy Tale Book." Music by Edmund Rogers. [Weekes and Co.]

"BLUE-BEARD" has been a favourite subject for musical setting. Few instruction-books for the pianoforte in past days were considered complete without the "March from 'Blue-Beard'"; and those who can remember the late John Parry's inimitable musical burlesques for voice and pianoforte must recall with pleasure his laughter-moving legend of "Blue-Beard," the accompaniment to which, under his fingers, expressed as much the events of the story as the words themselves. It is possible that Mr. Rogers may have had an unconscious reminiscence of this piece in composing his Cantata; for, without even hinting at the discovery of any plagiarism in the work, we find some of the scenes strongly reminding us of the manner in which they were treated, both vocally and instrumentally, in Mr. Parry's composition. The Cantata, however, now before us may really be termed an Operetta, for it has a regularly developed overture, with solos, concerted pieces, and choruses of sufficient pretension to justify their being sung upon a stage, with the accessories of scenery and dresses. The music has throughout a very large amount of merit; and much of it is really full of genuine humour. Amongst these we must mention Blue-Beard's solo, "Darling, I'm going away"; the chorus "Behind that blue curtain"; and the scena, recitative, and aria, for soprano and bass, "There's a voice." All these are full of character, and comic without a tinge of vulgarity.

Twenty Original Voluntaries for the Organ or Harmonium. By Arthur Henry Brown.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE instruments for which this collection of pieces has been written have both suffered so much from a flood of "arrangements" that original compositions must always be welcome, provided their quality is such as to satisfy the musician. At the same time, the characteristics of the organ differ so greatly from those of the harmonium that music intended for the one or the other is likely to be satisfactory to neither. As may be supposed, Mr. Brown's Voluntaries have no pedal obligato, and are, generally speaking, unambitious in design and moderate in difficulty. They are in various styles, but the composer has been most successful in movements of a soft, tranquil kind. No. 1, "Andante pastorale," No. 7, "Andante," No. 14, "Communism," and one or two others, are marked by a vein of pleasing melody; but the pieces for loud stops are somewhat thin and ineffective. Mr. Brown does not often venture upon eccentric harmonic progressions, and perhaps the most singular and unsatisfactory effect is in No. 5—an Offertoire in A—where, at the sixteenth bar, there is a close in B flat, returning at once to the original key.

Hymn-tunes sung in St. Paul's, Lorrimer Square.

Twelve settings of the Magnificat, and Six Settings of the Nunc Dimittis.

Edited by the Rev. James Baden Powell.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE editor of these publications was for ten years Precentor of St. Paul's, Lorrimer Square, a church well known for the ritualistic nature of its services. The hymn-tunes are twenty-seven in number, of which fourteen are from Mr. Powell's own pen. The remainder are by various composers, and the greater number are here published for the first time. They are for the most part unexceptionable, though perhaps in one or two instances approaching somewhat the character of the part-song. The hymns to which they were set—taken from the "People's Hymnal"—are given in full. The settings of the Magnificat, may best be described in the editor's own words. "The verses are set alternately to the plain-song, and to a harmony. The harmonies are also alternate, 'Fauxbourdon' and plain. The 'Fauxbourdon' harmony is to be sung by a few voices only; the plain four-part harmony by all the voices, the treble taking the plain-song." Here we have some of the devices by which the gothic severity of the Gregorian tones is made tolerable if not agreeable to modern ears. It may be said that the Rev. Mr. Powell's definition of his harmonies as "plain" is correct; chromatic progressions absurdly out of keeping with the old melodies are carefully avoided. Six settings of the "Nunc dimittis" in the same style are appended.

Original Compositions for the Organ. By Dr. C. G. Verrinder. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is a series of six little pieces, the whole comprising only fourteen pages of music. It may be said that organists should be able to extemporise voluntaries of this description; but some who are good players have not the gift of improvisation, and Dr. Verrinder's trifles may therefore fulfil a useful purpose. They vary considerably in style but very little in merit, perhaps the most pleasing of the set being No. 3, Melodia in A. Executants of modest pretensions will find them well within their means.

FOREIGN NOTES.

ACCORDING to an announcement made in the Bayreuther Blätter, the annual repetition of the "Parsifal" performances at the Bayreuth theatre is now secured. The same journal also contains the following statement: "The master, wishing to show his gratitude to the former members of the 'Patronat-Verein,' and being mindful, moreover, to ensure in a new form their continued unity, has arranged that by an annual subscription of M20 to the Bayreuther Blätter the subscribers will, at the same time, obtain the right of admission to one of the annual Festspiel performances. By the concession thus granted to the readers of that journal, Richard Wagner desires to manifest the great importance which he attaches to the continuance of the spiritual unity of his adherents, as represented by the Blätter, the significance of which he intends to increase by further contributions to the pages of that periodical." The curiously involved phraseology of the lengthy and not very logical document, of which the above is an extract, renders it somewhat difficult to arrive at its true import which, however, may be summed up as follows, viz.: that the Festspiel performances will in future be of annual recurrence; that by the annual subscription of M20 subscribers become entitled to a ticket for one of such performances, in addition to the receipt of the journal in question; that in the event of the subscriber being unable to make use of his ticket, the sum of M12 will be refunded to him; finally, that by this arrangement Richard Wagner desires to show his gratitude to the former members of the "Society of Patrons," though in what way the latter are to be specially benefited by it, seeing that the subscription of M20 is open to any one, it is difficult to discern. What appears more clear, however, is that the new proposal will, at any rate, ensure the increased circulation of the poet-composer's press organ, the Bayreuther Blätter.

Three representations of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy have been announced to take place under the direction of Herr Angelo Neumann, at the Victoria Theatre of Berlin, between the 21st and 31st ult. The demand for tickets for some time previous to the performances is said to have been an extraordinary one, and the undertaking of the energetic impresario seems likely to be crowned by an unprecedented success. The present, as our readers will remember, is the second time of the production of the Tetralogy in the German metropolis.

According to the recently published statistical report of the activity of the Hamburg Opera during the last eight years, there have been no less than 268 performances of operas by Wagner given by that enterprising institution during that period, viz.: 76 performances of "Lohengrin," 56 of "Tannhäuser," 31 of "Walküre," 29 of "Der Fliegende Holländer," 23 of "Rienzi," 21 of "Die Meistersinger," 13 of "Rheingold," 11 of "Götterdämmerung," and 9 of "Siegfried."

A correspondent writes to us from Munich: "Fräulein Marianne Brandt, one of the representatives of the part of Kundry in 'Parsifal,' is just now singing at the Hof-theater. Her splendid performances in the parts of Leonora ('Fidelio'), Ortrud ('Lohengrin'), Adriano ('Rienzi'), and others have drawn crowded houses and obtained universal applause. The projected private performance here of 'Parsifal' is announced to take place in May next.

An interesting collection of autographs recently sold by auction at Munich included those of Haydn, Mozart, and Weber, which realised the following prices, viz.: M102, M52, and M52 respectively."

Another valuable collection of autographs of musicians and poets was recently placed under the hammer by the firm of Liepmannsohn, of Berlin. It comprised letters, &c., from the pens of Beethoven, Cherubini, Spontini, Meyerbeer, Gounod, Tartini, Weber, Mendelssohn, Zelter, Rossini, Schumann, Wagner, and many other composers, besides those of numerous literary celebrities, including Charles Dickens. Amongst the most interesting numbers sold were: A Symphony of Mozart's for M1005, Beethoven's setting to "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" from "Egmont" for M500, three manuscripts by Mendelssohn M100, M125, and M400 respectively, an autograph by Meyerbeer M195, and one by Spohr M105.

Mr. E. D'Albert, who has lately been giving Concerts in various German towns, has met everywhere with a most enthusiastic reception.

The Leipzig Signale says: "Of the many new operas which have appeared during the last few years, a very small number only have succeeded in establishing themselves permanently on our lyrical stage. Among them Bizet's 'Carmen,' Goetz's 'The Taming of the Shrew,' Goldmark's 'Die Königin von Saba,' Brüll's 'Das goldene Kreuz,' and Nessler's 'Der Rattenfänger von Hameln,' take the first rank. The four last-mentioned works, although not everywhere produced with equal success, possessed at least sufficient vitality to become either at once embodied with the respective répertoires, or at all events to be performed from time to time. Of Wagner's 'Nibelungen Tetralogy' 'Walküre' alone has so far succeeded in becoming a 'répertoire-opera' on the comparatively few stages where, as yet, the entire work has been produced."

The Hoftheater at Hanover recommenced its performances, last month, with Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide."

The first performance at Leipzig of Rubinstein's Opera "Die Maccabäer" is to take place on the 4th inst. The same work is likewise shortly to be produced at the Dresden Hoftheater.

The well-known concerts of the "Euterpe" Society of Leipzig were announced to be resumed on the 24th ult.

Herr Jean Becker, the eminent violin virtuoso and former leader of the famous "Florentine Quartet Party," has opened an academy for the teaching of his instrument, at Mannheim. The three talented children of the artist, who have hitherto accompanied him on his concert-tours, viz., Jeanne, Hans, and Hugo, will henceforth form an instrumental trio, and continue their artistic travels through the civilised world.

Johannes Brahms has, it is stated, just completed a new trio, a string quartet, and the "Parzenlied," from Goethe's "Iphigenie," for chorus and orchestra.

The Darmstadt Musik-Verein, for many years under the able direction of Herr C. A. Mangold, celebrated, last month, the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation with a performance of Handel's "Alexander's Feast."

We have once before drawn attention in these columns to the excellent monthly publication entitled Pädagogische Erfahrungen beim Klavier-Unterrichte, issued under the auspices of Herr Aloys Hennes, the eminent professor of the pianoforte at the Xaver Scharwenka Conservatorium of Berlin. This interesting periodical will, we are now informed, be published at the end of the present year in book form, and will prove a valuable compendium alike to pupils and teachers of the instrument, as illustrating practically the special and well-tryed method adopted by the professor. We may add that an English translation of the professor's well-known Klavier-Unterrichtsbücher, edited by H. Mannheimer, has been published by Novello, Ewer and Co.

The following, according to the Wiener Signale, are the works to be produced during the present season by the Philharmonic Society of Vienna: Ciaccona (S. Bach, instrumented by Raff); Overtures "Coriolan" and "Leonore," No. 2; Symphonies No. 2, 3, and 8 (Beethoven); "Romeo and Juliet," three scenes (Berlioz); Serenade No. 1 (Brahms); Overtures "Faniska" and "Der portugiesische Gasthof" (Cherubini); "Legenden" (Dvorák, first performance); Suite No. 2 (Esser); Serenade No. 2 (R. Fuchs); Overture "Im Hochlande" (Gade); Symphony "Ländliche Hoch-geit" (Goldmark); Two Symphonies (Haydn); Suite No. 1 (Lachner); Symphony No. 3 (Mendelssohn); Symphony, "Jupiter" (Mozart); Symphony in G minor (Raff, first performance); Symphony, D major (Schubert, first performance); Overture "Genoveva," Symphony No. 1 (Schumann); Symphony, C minor (Spohr); Overture "Richard III.," Symphony No. 2 (Volkmann); Symphony No. 6 (Bruckner, first time); and Pieces for String Orchestra (Kässmayer, first time).

At the Paris Grand-Opéra, a highly gifted singer, Madame Engalli, made her début last month on that stage in the character of Amneris in Verdi's "Aida," and was received with great favour. The lady has already a considerable reputation on the stage of the French capital, where she made her first appearance some years ago in Massenet's opera "Paul et Virginie," and a brilliant career is said to be in store for her at the national establishment in question.

The following operatic works were produced during the past month at the Paris Grand-Opéra, viz., Gounod's "Faust" and "Le Tribut de Zamora," Halévy's "La Juive," Verdi's "Aida," and Thomas's "Françoise de Rimini." At the Opéra-Comique the principal performances were Thomas's "Mignon," Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette" and "Phlémon et Baucis," and Auber's "Fra Diavolo."

The classes of the Conservatoire were opened on the 2nd ult., the examinations for the admission of new pupils having commenced on the 18th ult.

The excellent concerts conducted by MM. Pasdeloup, Colonne, and Lamoureux respectively recommenced, the first named (Concerts Populaires), on the 15th, and the other two (of the Château and Château-d'Eau), on the 22nd ult., at Paris.

M. Arthur Pougin has resigned the chief editorship of La Musique Populaire, a music-journal founded by himself, and has been succeeded by M. Alphonse Baralle, a well-known Parisian critic. The journal referred to has in its recent numbers furnished a detailed analytical account of Wagner's "Nibelungen" opera-dramas, there being increasing signs in the French musical press generally of the interest taken in the doings of the poet-composer.

A volume from the pen of the Paris musical savant, M. Edmond Hippeau, has just been published under the title of "Parsifal, et l'opéra Wagnérien" in which the characteristics of the style of the Bayreuth master are analysed.

Massenet's opera, "Hérodiade," which had met with such a brilliant success during last season at the Théâtre de la Monnaie of Brussels, has been again brought forward at that establishment this season with the same result. The composer is said to be completing a new opera in four acts, entitled "Manon Lescaut," which is to be first produced at the Paris Opéra-Comique.

An interesting article on "Liszt as an Author" from the pen of M. Adolphe Julien appeared in a recent number of the Guide Musical of Brussels.

At the Brussels Conservatoire Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" is shortly to be performed under the direction of M. Gevaert, a French translation of the text having been supplied for the purpose by M. A. Samuel.

In consequence of the unfavourable financial result of last season, the Concerts Populaires of Brussels will be discontinued.

At the National Theatre of Prague Dvorák's opera "Dimitrije" was produced last month for the first time, and was most enthusiastically received, the first and fourth acts more particularly having created a marked impression. The libretto of the work is from the pen of Madame Czerwinka.

Under the heading of "Music as an aid to Labour," a correspondent writes to us as follows: "The Epoca of Madrid states that the Government having refused to permit the opening of the Royal Theatre, which should have taken place on the 7th ult., pending the completion of certain alterations of a precautionary nature in case of fire, workmen with a taste for music were selected, and certain of the band were employed to stimulate their labours with a brisk march. When the orchestra had struck their last chord, and the workmen their last blow, the Government inspectors on their re-entry were received to the strains of the March from 'Le Prophète.' The same night (8th ult.), the season commenced with 'Les Huguenots,' which, however, was somewhat coldly received by a very thin house, a circumstance with which, says the Epoca, the religion of the hero may have had something to do."

At Lyons the phenomenal tenor voice of a journeyman blacksmith, named Desflages, has attracted so much attention that the municipality of the town have granted him the necessary means for the training of his rare gift.

A new operetta entitled "Los Hijos de Madrid," composed by Senor Cereceda, was recently produced at Saragossa with much success.

At the Euterpe Society of Barcelona a symphonic poem in five movements, entitled "La Primavera," by the Maestro Rodoreda, was performed for the first time, and met with an enthusiastic reception.

The Florentine orchestra, consisting of seventy members, amongst them twelve solo instrumentalists, is just now engaged upon an extensive concert-tour in Austro-Hungary and Germany, under the direction of the Maestro Enea Brizzi.

The ceremony of unveiling a monument erected to Bellini at his native town of Catania has been postponed for a year in order, it is said, to combine with it the inauguration of a theatre, now in course of construction, which is to bear the name of the composer of "Norma."

The unveiling of a statue of Spohr, which was to have taken place at Cassel last month, has likewise been postponed until April next.

In Marianne Schönberger-Marconi, whose death is announced, on the 9th ult., at Darmstadt, at the extreme age of nearly ninety-eight years, one of the most remarkable contralto singers of her day, the acknowledged rival of a Catalani and a Pasta, has passed away. Marianne was born at Mannheim during the classical period of the Mannheim stage, where, as a child of nine years, she commenced her artistic career, her father being an Italian by birth, engaged as a contrabassist in the orchestra, and her mother a German. The fame of her splendid voice having reached the ears of Cherubini, then the director of the Vienna Opera, he succeeded in engaging the young artist for that institution where she achieved a series of triumphs. As Madame Schönberger she subsequently extended her fame over all the principal countries of Europe, where her assumption of tenor parts in the leading operas of the period created an almost unexampled sensation. For many years past Madame Schönberger has lived in simple retirement at Darmstadt, where she was universally respected.

At Turin died, at the age of twenty-eight, the composer Alessandro Riberi.

The death is also announced at Bologna, at the age of fifty-four, of the Maestro Ulisse Parisini, a composer of Church music of some merit.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

SINGING IN STATE SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The valuable letters which appear from time to time in your widely circulated journal respecting the merits of the different methods for teaching singing are read with interest in this part of the world; and thinking your readers might be glad to know how this colony (Victoria) has so far established singing in the State schools, I send you the following particulars.

Singing is systematically taught to Classes vi., v., iv., iii., either by the "Numeral" or the Tonic Sol-fa methods, and these classes are inspected and examined in accordance with the Programme of Instruction issued by the Department of Education. The examination consists of "Elementary Knowledge," "Sight-singing," and "Song-singing"—the staff notation being that by which the "tests" are given. Some of our teachers employ the "Numeral" and some the Tonic Sol-fa methods, and the Department is satisfied to give the grant for results judging by the staff notation. Our classes number from 50 to 180, and are "failed" unless 50 per cent. succeed in passing the standard of Programme.

There are about 36,000 children receiving Programme instruction subject to examination and inspection, and these are taught by 33 professional singing masters, and about 80 staff teachers. As a rule the staff teachers instruct the junior classes iii. and iv., and receive a grant of £10 per annum. The singing masters receive salaries of £425 to £200 per annum. The colony is divided into districts, and each singing master has charge of a district. Each master is expected to give six lessons of forty-five minutes' duration per diem. Teachers' classes are held in the principal towns and districts, and examinations take place half-yearly for candidates desirous of obtaining the "Licence to Teach," or the "Certificate of Competency."

The following particulars may serve to illustrate what can be accomplished by our children. The poet laureate's new national song "Hands all round" was placed in the hands of our eight metropolitan singing masters on May 9, with a request that a muster of 5,000 children should sing it on May 24, her Majesty's birthday, together with a suitable programme of national songs of all nations. These children were brought together, and sang the song in admirable style without any previous full rehearsal, and elicited the warm applause of an immense audience.

Singing is regarded in our State schools as the most popular subject of instruction, and as long as we obtain good singing we waive the choice of method of teaching.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

J. SUMMERS,

Government Inspector of Music.

FORMATION OF A MUSICAL CONSERVATOIRE IN MAURITIUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Those who take interest in musical education will no doubt learn with pleasure that our small island of Mauritius is following the example given by the mother-country in establishing a Conservatoire which will be connected with the Royal College of Music of London. At the second meeting of the Managing Committee, held on the 28th inst., under the presidency of our popular and esteemed Colonial Secretary, the proposed statutes were adopted; and before long, with the assistance of Government and the municipality, the classes will be opened to all members of our community. This, in promoting the science of music, will be a boon for the colony, for it will have in view the extension of musical tuition to the poorer classes of the population.—I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,
Port Louis, Mauritius, August 31, 1882. G. L.

WARNING TO THE PROFESSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Kindly allow me a short space in your valuable paper to warn my brother professors against a man who surreptitiously obtains professional cards, and then presents himself as the person named thereon. By some unknown means he became possessed of my card, and with it called on a well known West-End professor, representing himself to be organist at a private chapel at Mount Edgumbe, with a well-made-up story, which, from inquiries afterwards, was proved to be utterly false. The letter written to him, under his assumed name, was received by me, which thwarted his designs, whatever they may have been. He is described as being short and dark, with a short beard and an unprepossessing appearance, between twenty and thirty years of age.

By inserting this you will, I am sure, benefit the profession, and oblige—Yours very truly,

LIVESEY CARROTT.

STRATFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I thank you for your notice of this Festival in your October number. As I have received letters making further inquiries about it, will you allow me to say that I shall be happy to forward a programme to any of your readers who are interested in this scheme for encouraging the study of music? The idea is not original. It is merely an attempt to naturalise the Welsh Eisteddfod in England.

I am, sir, truly yours,

J. S. CURWEN.

The Rev. A. W. Snape, M.A., was the preacher.

CASTLE HOWARD.—There was a Harvest Thanksgiving in the Private Chapel on Sunday afternoon, the 15th ult. ENNISKILLEN.—A special Thanksgiving Service was held in the Parish Church, on the 1st ult., in honour of the recent victory in Egypt. The church and military choirs were amalgamated, under the direction of Mr. Arnold, Organist. There was full choral service, Barnby's Tallis, ferial use, being used. The Psalms for the day were sung to chants by Dr. Dearle, B. St. J. B. Joule, &c. The Service was Jackson's (of Exeter) in F, and the Kyrie was adapted from Mendelssohn's Elijah. The anthem consisted of a selection of choruses from Handel's Judas Maccabæus, ending with the trio, duet and chorus, "See, the conquering hero," with band, organ and joint choirs, which created a profound impression on the vast congregation.

FOLKESTONE.—The Sacred Concert given by Mr. H. S. Roberts at the Wesleyan Chapel, on the 17th ult., was in every respect highly successful. The principal vocalists were Miss Law and Miss Beare, both of whom were warmly applauded in all their vocal pieces; and mention must also be made of a new composition by the Concert-giver, "The Harvey Memorial March," for the organ and an orchestra of ten or twelve stringed instruments (ably led by Mr. J. HULME.—M. Coutélier having arranged for a series of Pianoforte Recitals to be given at his house in Moss Lane, the first took place on the 9th and the second on the 16th ult., Mr. J. Greaves (who was well received) being the pianist.

Swift presided at the piano, and the Rev. J. Edgell conducted.

Martin, Mr. Edward Hall, Mr. Edwin Frith (vocalists), Mdlle. Hélène de Lisle (solo violin), and Mr. Mayor (pianist). The programme consisted of popular music, which was well rendered and warmly received.

LITTLEHAMPTON.—An Organ Recital was given at the Parish Church on Wednesday, September 27, by Mr. J. Forbes Carter, Organist and Director of the Choir. The performance included compositions by Handel, Mendelssohn, Batiste, Guilman, and Spohr, and Freyer's Variations on a Choral. There were several hundred persons present, and a collection in aid of the Organ Fund realised a good sum.

MELBOURNE, DERBYSHIRE.—The Glee and Madrigal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Wilson, gave a performance of Handel's Jephtha on Tuesday, the 10th ult. The principal solo parts were sustained by Mr. A. D. Coleridge, Miss Haines, Mr. C. G. Airey, and Miss Wadham; Miss Hunter and Miss A. M. Haines taking the minor parts. The string band was led by Mr. F. W. Davenport. The choruses were given with feeling and accuracy. The room was crowded, and the audience very appreciative. It is proposed to repeat the Oratorio during the season, Jephtha never having been heard in Derbyshire before.

MELBOURNE.—Two Concerts have been given by the Metropolitan Liedertafel Society, conducted by Mr. Julius Herz. The first, on August 2, was given in the Town Hall. In addition to the part-singing of the Liedertafel, Miss Martina Simonsen sang Mozart's "Gli angeli d'inferno," and Mrs. Cuder gave Meyerbeer's "Ah! mon fils." MUCH BIRCH.—On Michaelmas Day a Festival Service was held in the Parish Church to celebrate the Harvest Thanksgiving and the opening of a new organ erected by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield. In place of the anthem, Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art great," was given, and the service was brought to a close with Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus. The choir had been strengthened by contingents from neighbouring choirs and from the Hereford Choral Society; and under the leadership of Mr. Charlesworth, Choirmaster of the Herefordshire Choral Union, the music was very successfully rendered. Mr. Foster presided at the organ, and his performance showed how admirably the instrument was adapted for the church, which is very small. The organ has two manuals, and possesses one or two peculiarities of construction which will render it easy of management by the performer.

NEWARK.—On Saturday evening, the 21st ult., Mr. F. R. Dobney gave a Concert in the Town Hall. Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Maybrick, M. Buziau, and Mr. Sydney Naylor were the artists, and an attractive programme was provided.

NEWBURY.—The Amateur Orchestral Union, established in 1879, has continued to make good progress. It now numbers thirty performers, including several ladies. On September 25 two Concerts were given in the Town Hall, when excellent programmes were well rendered. Mr. W. D. Eatwell conducted. The members of the Newbury Choral Society for Men's Voices sang the Gloria in excelsis, O Salutaris, and Agnus Dei, from Gounod's Second (Orphéonist) Mass, Mendelssohn's "Sons of Art," "Thou comest here" and "If we may call on thee" (from Edipus at Colonus), conducted by the Rev. C. A. Treherne. Mr. Alexander Walton, Mus. Bac., F.C.O., was the accompanist.

NEW SEAHAM.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in Christ Church, on Sunday, the 8th ult. Sermons were preached in the morning by the Rev. U. T. Allen, M.A., Vicar of Dalton-le-dale, and in the evening by the Rev. H. J. Milton, M.A., Master of Serburn Hospital. The music was extremely well-rendered by the choir. The anthem was "O praise God in His holiness," composed by Mr. J. Birkbeck, Organist of the church.—On Monday evening, the 9th ult., a Service of Song, entitled "Harvest Thanksgiving," by J. S. Curwen, was given by the choir and some of the scholars of the Sunday School with great success. The offertory will be devoted to the enlargement of the choir vestry.

NEW SWINDON.—A very successful Evening Concert was given under the direction of Mr. G. Whitehead, Organist of the Parish Church (Old Swindon), on the 18th ult., at the Mechanics' Institute. The instrumentalists were Mr. W. Frye-Parker (violin), Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (violin), and Mr. G. Whitehead (piano); Miss Lucia Carreras, Miss Marian McKenzie, and Mr. C. E. Ellison, vocalists. Fesca's Trio (No. 2, Op. 12) for violin, violoncello, and piano was very ably rendered; and Messrs. Frye-Parker and Whitehouse contributed some excellent solos on their respective instruments. Mr. Whitehead played a "paraphrase" of Liszt's, besides officiating as accompanist. The vocal music was highly appreciated, and the encores numerous.

OLDHAM.—The Organ Recitals have been continued at St. Thomas's Church during the month, the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth, respectively by Messrs. Wilson, Alexander, W. H. Thorley, Stevens, and Clifton, having been especially well attended.—The second Popular Concert took place in Henshaw Street Coffee Tavern on the 5th ult.—The Equitable Co-operative Society began its season on the 17th ult., when Pattison's Ancient Mariner was given, the principals being Mrs. Taylor, Miss Dutton, Mr. S. Jackson, and Mr. F. Gordon.

OSWESTRY.—Mr. Henry Leslie presided at a lecture by Mr. J. S. Curwen on the 20th ult. He said that he had been for some months carefully comparing the working of the two systems, Tonic Sol-fa and Old Notation, in the village choirs under the Oswestry School of Music, and he must say that Tonic Sol-fa had carried all before it. Whether it was that Tonic Sol-faists had only one scale to learn, or whether it was that intervals were thoroughly learnt from the modulator, he did not know, nor did he care. A system which produced such results must be a good system. He judged systems by their fruits. What could the Old Notationists be about to allow the Tonic Sol-faists to have it all their own way in Oswestry? He should like them to bestir themselves and win the laurels from the Tonic Sol-faists.

PAISLEY.—The first of a series of Mbnday Evening Concerts took place on the 9th ult., in the George A. Clark Town Hall, when Mr. H. A. Lambeth and his Balmoral Choir gave a miscellaneous selection of solos and part-songs. The programme included Gounod's "There is a green hill far away" and "Ave Verum," Mendelssohn's "O rest in the Lord," and Cowen's "The children's home." Mr. H. A. Lambeth conducted.—At the second of the Monday Evening Concerts, on the 16th ult., Signor Foli was the vocalist. Mr. J. Barratt, Mus. B., who acted as accompanist, also contributed an organ solo.

PORLOCK.—A Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held on the 8th ult., with an orchestra of about eighteen instruments. Handel's Overture to Samson and the March in Josua were well played by the band. The anthem, Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," was excellently performed, the solo being sung by Walter Hook, a member of the Chardstock choir. The hymns were accompanied by the orchestra, the music having been arranged by the Rev. W. Hook, who conducted throughout. After the blessing had been given, the rector (the Rev. W. Hook) announced that a selection of music would be played by the orchestra, and all were invited to stay and listen. The invitation was accepted by nearly the whole congregation; and the first movement of Beethoven's Septet and the slow movement of the same composer's Second Symphony were performed. The successful result of this service shows that even in a small parish, with work and energy, a good choir can be organised, and good music presented to the people.

PLYMOUTH.—A very successful Concert was given at the Mechanics' Institute on the 4th ult. The vocalists were Madame Edith Touzeau, Miss Kate B. Hearder, and Messrs. Hearder and Morris; solo pianist, Mrs. Hy. Reed; Conductors, Signor Brizzi and Mr. F. N. Löhr; accompanist, Mr. C. Clemens. The encores were numerous, and the artists highly appreciated.

READING.—A Concert of Chamber Music was given in the New Town Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 18th ult., by Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt, Organist of All Saints' Church. Mr. Tirbutt had obtained the assistance of Miss Catherine Penna (vocalist), Mr. Alfred Burnett (violin), Mr. W. H. Hill (viola), and Mr. Edward Howell (violinello), and a thoroughly classical programme was admirably rendered. String trios by Mozart and Beethoven and Mozart's G minor Pianoforte Quartet were, perhaps, the most interesting items, but Schumann's Phantasie-stücke for pianoforte and violin and the vocal solos were also warmly applauded. Mr. Tirbutt was highly successful in all his pianoforte music.

ROCHDALE.—The seventh Annual Concert by the members of the Orpheus Glee Club took place at the Public Hall, on the 17th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. Miss Fannie Sellers and Mr. C. Lenton Holden were the principal vocalists. Miss Sellers, who made her first appearance in this town, received several enthusiastic encores, and Mr. Holden (principal alto of Norwich Cathedral) gave his songs with excellent taste and judgment. The members of the Club sang a selection of glees and trios from Martin, Bishop, Ware, &c., in a manner that reflected much credit upon themselves and their Conductor, Mr. John Towers, of Manchester, who had evidently bestowed much care on the preparation of the pieces.

ST. LEONARDS.—A series of Concerts, arranged by Mr. J. Stuart, commenced on the 16th ult., in the Royal Concert Hall. The vocalists were the Misses A. Marriott, D'Alton, E. Millar, B. Holt, Madame Jenny Pratt, Mr. Frank Boyle, and Mr. Thurlay Beale; Miss Lucy Riley proved herself an accomplished violinist, and Mr. Marshall, besides accompanying, contributed some pianoforte solos. A feature in the programmes was the performance of M. Kiviere's orchestra, and solos on the piccolo, cornet, and flute were well played by Mr. Booth, Mr. McGrath, and Signor Bertoncini.

SALISBURY.—Miss Aylward gave a Concert of Chamber Music at the Assembly Rooms on Wednesday evening, September 27. The programme included Raff's Trio in G, Rubinstein's Salonstücke, Beethoven's Trio in B flat, and a Sonata by Grieg for violin and piano. The vocalist was Miss Marian McKenzie, and the instrumentalists Miss Aylward (piano), Mr. A. Burnett (violin), and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (violinello); accompanist, Mr. Augustus Aylward. Most successful Concerts (morning and evening) were given here on the 13th ult. by Mr. Augustus Aylward, when the following artists were engaged: Madame Carlotta Patti, Madame Evans Warwick, Mr. Percy Blandford, Mr. Joseph Lynde and Signor Vergara; Signor Papini (violin), Monsieur Ernest de Munck (violinello), and Signor Tito Mattei, Pianist and Conductor. The vocalists were warmly received, especially Madame Patti, who is a great favourite in Salisbury. Signor Papini and Monsieur de Munck were encored in their respective solos, and Signor Tito Mattei was recalled after each performance. The Concerts gave the greatest satisfaction to a large audience. Mr. Augustus Aylward has forwarded a cheque for £40 to the Secretary of the Royal College of Music, being the proceeds of the recent Amateur Concerts which were given for the funds.

SEVENOAKS.—On Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., a Choral Society and Singing Class was established at St. John's, a district hitherto entirely destitute of musical associations. Forty members received their first lesson from Mr. George E. Blunden, of Lewisham, the present Organist of Sevenoaks Parish Church, who, although he has accepted another appointment at Highgate, will continue to direct the class. On the following Tuesday fifty-eight members were present. We wish Mr. Blunden and his Society all the success they deserve.

SHEFFIELD.—Mr. Henry Coward's Historical Cantata Magna Charta was performed for the second time at the Albert Hall on the 9th ult. The band and chorus numbered 300 performers. Mr. J. W. Phillips presided at the organ, Mr. W. Moxey at the pianoforte, Mr. John Peck led the band, and Mr. Coward conducted. The solo vocalists were Miss Clara Samuell, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. J. Bridson. The performance was highly satisfactory.

SOUTHGATE.—Harvest Festival Services were held at St. Michael's, Bowes Park, on Wednesday, September 27, and Sunday following. At evening, on the Wednesday, the music consisted of Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat, and anthem "O clap your hands," both by Dr. Stainer; Smart's Te Deum in F being sung before the Benediction. The choir, numbering forty voices, was in every respect satisfactory, singing throughout with the greatest ease and precision. Mr. G. C. Martin ably presided at the organ. The music on Sunday, the 1st ult., was similarly festal in character, the service in the morning being Smart in G, and, in the evening, Field in D—anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land," by Dr. Stainer.

SOUTHPORT.—The first of Mr. J. S. Watson's Subscription Concerts took place on Friday evening, the 13th ult., at the Cambridge Hall. The artists were Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Maybrick, vocalists; solo violin, M. Victor Buziau; Conductor, Mr. Sidney Naylor. These Concerts, which are now entering upon their eleventh season, are well patronised and appreciated.

SOUTHWELL.—The Lay Clerks of Southwell Minster gave their Annual Concert on Tuesday, the 24th ult., before a numerous and appreciative audience. The vocalists were Miss H. Johnson, Mr. A. Earrow, Mr. E. Marriott, Mr. E. Longmore, Mr. H. Sunman, and Mr. Binley Shaw. Miss Calvert played two pianoforte solos, Mr. A. Marriott, Organist of the Minster, officiating as accompanist. The Concert was in every respect a decided success, the part-singing of the Lay Clerks being a special feature.

SWANSCOMBE.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in All Saints' Church, on the 1st and 8th ult. Appropriate sermons were preached by Rev. H. R. Wakefield, the Vicar. Special Psalms were sung from the "Cathedral Psalter"; the usual hymns; Responses, by Tallis; Te Deum, by H. Smart; and anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Dr. Stainer). At evening service Battley in G was used. The voluntaries, selected from the works of Lefebure-Wély, Mendelssohn, Gounod, &c., were excellently rendered by Mr. F. H. Jarvis, the Organist. The choir sang admirably.

UPPER TOOTING.—The Harvest Festival was celebrated at Holy Trinity Church on Sunday, the 8th ult. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Rev. Charles Burney, Archdeacon of Kingston, and that in the evening by the Rev. J. Hasloch Potter, the Vicar. The choir, which was largely augmented, rendered a full Cathedral Service very effectively, under the direction of Mr. A. F. Clement, the Organist and Choirmaster.

WALSHAM-LE-WILLOWS.—On Tuesday, the 24th ult., a Festival of United Choirs, numbering 105 voices, took place in the Parish Church of St. Mary's, under the direction of Mr. Fred. R. Lyne, the Organist. The service, which was entirely choral, was well intoned by the Rev. Robert Read, Rector of Stowlangtoft, the sermon being preached by the Venerable Archdeacon Chapman. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Wesley's Chant Service in F, and the anthem to the 150th Psalm (Weldon). The attendance was very good, in spite of the bad weather, and the whole of the music was excellently rendered. The offertory was in aid of the funds of the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Society.

WALTON-ON-THE-HILL.—The annual Harvest Festival Service took place in St. Peter's Parish Church on Sunday, the 1st ult., in the presence of a crowded congregation. The church was tastefully decorated with fruit, vegetables, flowers, wheat, &c. Appropriate sermons were preached at each service by the rector, the Rev. Henry J. Greenhill, M.A. Both services were fully choral, the anthem being taken from the 24th Psalm, "The earth is the Lord's," which was rendered in a very efficient manner. The musical arrangements were under the direction of the newly appointed Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. John E. Fimister, who presided at the organ in a masterly manner.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—Mr. Robert Parker, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral Church, gave his annual Concert on Friday, August 25. The performance consisted entirely of classical music, the orchestral items of which were played by a complete and well-drilled orchestra, under Mr. Parker's direction. The overtures were Mozart's Zauberflöte (played for the first time in Wellington), Mendelssohn's Son and Stranger, Rossini's William Tell, and Beethoven's Ruins of Athens. From the last-named work were also performed the Turkish March and the Chorus of Dervishes, all the numbers making a marked impression on the audience. Mr. Parker performed two movements from Mozart's D minor Concerto, with the complete orchestral accompaniment; and the Allegro and Andante from Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat were admirably played by Messrs. Allpress, Isherwood, King, Schwartz, and Cazeau. The fine chorus "Thou comest," from Mendelssohn's Œdipus, and the Steersman's Song and Chorus from Wagner's Flying Dutchman (both with band accompaniment) were very effectively given, and unaccompanied part-songs by Leslie, W. Macfarren, and Sullivan were sung by a small choir of amateurs with remarkable taste and finish. Vocal solos were contributed by Mrs. George Cotterell. The Concert was in every respect a marked success.

WICKER.—The new organ, erected in the Congregational Church by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, was opened on the 5th ult., by Dr. H. Keeton, Organist of Peterborough Cathedral. Dr. Keeton's playing was of a high order, and the music selected for his Recitals displayed the instrument to the greatest advantage.

WOOLWICH.—The first annual Harvest Festival was held in Holy Trinity Church, on Wednesday evening, the 18th ult. The choir sang Goss's Anthem "O taste and see," and, after the sermon, Barnby's Chant Te Deum in B flat, after which Dr. C. J. Frost gave an Organ Recital.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. F. Ponsford Dean to the Parish Church, Ashby-de-la-Zouch.—Mr. F. W. Deake, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Upper Holloway.—Mr. Joseph Firth, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's Church, Waterloo, Blyth.—Mr. Henry G. ORGAN PEDALS TO PIANOFORTES.—TO ORGAN STUDENTS and ORGANISTS.—In reply to numerous inquiries, and for the information of Organ Students and Organists generally, HENRY J. RUMMENS begs to state that the principle of his PEDAL ATTACHMENT is perfectly unique, and is the only one that guarantees (among other advantages) a perfectly even and always-struck note, while the pedals need not be struck but pressed down, as in playing the organ. It also secures to the pianoforte absolute immunity from any extra wear and tear whatsoever, as the hammers strike the strings with one degree of force which cannot possibly vary, even with the heaviest pedalling, a sine qua non to the possessors of valuable instruments.

The Attachment (including an iron roller-board) is sent connected to the pedals, and all ready for placing under the piano.

On receipt of remittance of £5, with customer's own set of pedals, they will be returned in a few days fitted with the Attachment, all complete. Satisfaction guaranteed, or the money refunded.

Special terms to persons who have purchased pedals and worthless actions (so-called) and who require a really good Attachment to their pedals.

PATENT ACTION

FOR

ATTACHING ORGAN PEDALS TO A PIANOFORTE,

Which Action he has, after continued study, brought to perfection, and gained the approval of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Patents.

TESTIMONIAL.

Winchester, October 24, 1882.

Dear Sir,—I have looked over the drawings of your Patent Lever Action for Attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes, and consider it a great improvement on other Actions I have seen. All Organ Students will find it invaluable. Yours truly,

W. HUTT,

Mr. AINSWORTH.

Organist of Winchester College.

Ainsworth's Patent Lever Action is manufactured from the most durable material only, and will last as long as any Pianoforte.

Ainsworth's Patent Lever Action is the easiest and most convenient to attach, as it is placed under the keyboard and will adjust itself to any Pianoforte.

Ainsworth's Patent Lever Action is perfectly noiseless in its working, as it is carefully finished, and all the moving parts supplied with noiseless cushions.

Ainsworth's Patent Lever Action draws down the keys with the greatest ease and in the most natural manner, thereby ensuring absolute immunity from any extra wear of the Pianoforte and an accurate response to the lightest pedal touch.

Ainsworth's Patent Lever Action will never get out of order, as it is a perfect and substantial one, the adjusting parts not being made from leather or wood (which are very liable to wear out), but from a composition which is very neat and durable.

The Inventor and Patentee being an Organist, and having used and thoroughly tested his Invention, can most confidently recommend the same to those desiring real good pedal practice at home.

N.B.—Ainsworth's Patent Lever Action will be sent on trial, free of charge, to any member of the musical profession or trade (having a view to purchase), on receiving a satisfactory reference.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1882.

OPINIONS OF THE LONDON AND PROVINCIAL PRESS

ON

A. R. GAUL'S CANTATA
"THE HOLY CITY"

COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR THE ABOVE FESTIVAL.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Altogether, a good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul.

"The Chorus, 'Thine is the kingdom,' proves that he knows how to write for imposing effect as well as for simple musicianship. 'Let the sea make a noise,' &c., belongs to the successes of massive choral writing, and the entire chorus with its fugal conclusion, 'Let the heavens rejoice' gives evidences of grand design and adequate musicianship.

"The scriptural texts have been chosen with much judgment."

STANDARD.

"'The Holy City' is a healthy, straightforward work, with plenty of vigour and spirit about the writing. It is not of the 'new-fangled' school.

"From first to last Mr. Gaul exercises his undeniable talent in a thoroughly legitimate direction, and gladdens the ears of his auditors with plenty of tonic and dominant.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Mr. Gaul is a local composer creditably known in the metropolis. It will be a matter for surprise if the Cantata, 'The Holy City,' should not augment his reputation wherever it may be heard, inasmuch as it is a right spirited work, evincing the gift of melody and an excellent knowledge of effective choral writing."

MORNING POST.

"Mr. Gaul has given to the world pieces of sacred music which have attained a reputation beyond the narrow circle of provincial fame. In his 'Holy City' he has also shown that he can write like a thorough musician in other and more severe styles. The air and chorus ('A new Heaven and a new Earth') with its pianissimo 'Sanctus' is a splendid idea. As a whole the Cantata is a good specimen of earnest musicianship and well-used means."

ACADEMY.

"There is a great deal of good and skilful writing."

MUSICAL TIMES.

"'The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."

DAILY NEWS.

"The work is throughout the production of a thoroughly trained and earnest musician. The Orchestral introduction—illustrative of contemplation—is melodious, and contains some good orchestral writing. The pieces for solo voices evince a command of agreeable and flowing melody, and are well suited to the respective voices."

ATHENÆUM.

"We must first recognise the genuine musical feeling shown by the composer.

"The vocal writing is excellent, and shows good command of the resources of counterpoint. To sum up, 'The Holy City,' though not a great, is a musicianly and pleasing work which does credit to its composer."

GUARDIAN.

"Melodious, smooth, and well written from beginning to end."

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"The work is throughout characterised by dulcet, graceful melody. The choral numbers show Mr. Gaul at his best; we remark here the sure practised hand of the writer, who has already made himself not a little famous by this class of work."

FIGARO.

"The Cantata is eminently creditable and the words admirably chosen."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"'The Holy City' has been received with every mark of approval—approval richly deserved, and if London should ever be made the scene of such music meetings as are held triennially at Birmingham, Leeds, and Norwich, Mr. Gaul may be said to have earned the right to be represented. The composer has in him a pure melodic vein, on which he has freely drawn in giving the approximate musical expression to the beautiful sacred poem-hymns incorporated in his word-book or libretto."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

"Everything is carefully rounded off and finished in form and outline, and the cultivated musician is evident alike in the part-writing for the voices and the command of orchestral resources."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land.

"We think highly of 'The Holy City' music for its vein of pleasing melody, and for the good disposition of the voice parts in the choruses. The instrumentation has evidently received careful attention."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"From title-page to the final chorus there is such perfect organisation, genuine melody, and musical consistency in the just apportionment of subject-matter, that the Cantata is certain of a popular career."

NORWICH DAILY PRESS.

"To name any of the particular pieces for special commendation would be to name the whole, for every one portrays an earnest and thoughtful mind, as well as scholarly design."

NORWICH MERCURY.

"The general impression of the music is eminently pleasing: this arises from the perfect smoothness and elegance of Mr. Gaul's style, and the unimpeded flow of natural melody."

MANCHESTER COURIER.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."

LIVERPOOL DAILY COURIER.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."

NOW READY.

DEDICATED TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS
THE PRINCESS OF WALESPSYCHE
A DRAMATIC CANTATA

(The Words from the Danish of LOBEDANZ)

COMPOSED BY

NIELS W. GADE

Octavo, paper cover ... .. 2s. 6d.
 „ paper boards ... .. 3s. od.
 „ scarlet cloth ... .. 4s. od.

Full Orchestral Score in the Press.

TIMES.

"The music of Herr Gade is in perfect keeping with its subject. It is graceful and melodious rather than powerful, and the lyrical portions gain prominence over the tragic motives of the story, which other masters might have emphasised. The music assigned to the heroine, more especially, is marked by a freshness and fluency of conception, which show that the youthful innocence of 'Psyche' most immediately appeals to the composer. . . . Herr Gade's music will be appreciated wherever refinement and grace combined with sound scholarship are valued."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Its music from first to last was intelligible, and charged with the grace and beauty of the school that, having had Herr Gade as a pupil, now claims him as a professor. . . . From beginning to end we are conscious of that happy union of the classic and the romantic which Mendelssohn and Schumann, each in his degree and manner, so conspicuously illustrate. . . . I cordially endorse the enthusiastic verdict of the Birmingham audience, for, though Herr Gade's Cantata does not achieve the oft-times questionable feat of marking 'a new departure,' it is a thing of beauty that should live long to be a joy."

DAILY NEWS.

"The vocal and orchestral combinations in this (the closing) scene, as indeed throughout the Cantata, are masterly in the command of dramatic effects and contrasts."

STANDARD.

"Herr Gade's 'Psyche,' last night, was a legitimate success, and in this world the musical world has been enriched with something likely to endure."

MORNING POST.

"All that a sympathetic mind could suggest to clothe the story with becoming musical raiment has been done with skill and taste. . . . The Cantata, as a whole work, will be as gladly welcomed by Choral Societies as 'The Crusaders' of the same composer. . . . There is some very pleasing writing both for voices and orchestra."

ATHENÆUM.

"We think 'Psyche' likely to be one of the most popular of the composer's works. It presents no excessive difficulties to the executants, though it undoubtedly requires finished orchestral playing; but even without orchestra it will be found effective, and is well suited for choral societies of fair acquisitions."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"The second part begins with an exquisite little scherzo, leading to another trio, 'The birds in playful throng,' with chorus for the same voices (soprano, alto, and tenor), than which it would be impossible to imagine anything more tuneful and charming, the instrumentation here being simply masterly. . . . The composer conducted, was warmly greeted, and was made the hero of an enthusiastic ovation at the close. In short, a perfect triumph was gained."

GUARDIAN.

"The music is always graceful and pretty, and admirably constructed. . . . It need hardly be said that Mr. Gade was heartily applauded at the close of the performance; and without doubt 'Psyche' must be recorded as one of the great successes of the year 1882."

MIDLAND COUNTIES HERALD.

"The choral writing is very good, especially at the close of the second and fourth parts, whilst the instrumentation is as bright and elegant as we had a right to expect from this gifted composer."

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

ABRAHAM

COMPOSED BY

BERNHARD MOLIQUE.

Octavo, paper cover, 3s.; paper boards, 3s. 6d.; scarlet cloth, 5s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"'Abraham' comes to us a second time with perfectly intelligible and graceful speech; moreover it is the speech of a master who knows the spirit as well as the form of his artistic language, and can commend himself to the mind as well as the ear. Every number in 'Abraham' vouches for this, and it will be a marvel if the reward of so much merit does not come sooner or later in full measure. . . . In the performance of the selection from 'Abraham,' Hereford has rehabilitated a master upon whom neglect has unjustly fallen."

DAILY NEWS.

"The composer's thorough musical training, his command of orchestral and choral effects and contrapuntal resources, and his forcible declamatory writing, renders the work a good specimen of constructive art. . . . It was a step in the right direction to revive an artistic work which has long been unjustly ignored; and which offers so welcome a contrast to the immature and crude manufactures which under the name of novelties so often pass as compositions in these days."

GRAPHIC.

"'Abraham' may be Kapellmeister's music as certain of our advanced instructors insist; but if so we can only retort that Kapellmeister's music is very fine music, and that it would be well if more of such music were vouchsafed to us just now. . . . That more of 'Abraham' will be heard ere long may be taken for granted. . . . Had he written nothing more than 'Abraham,' where the keenest sense of musical expression and a perfect mastery of counterpoint (without a knowledge of which no musician can give fluent utterance to his ideas), and an unmistakable dramatic instinct are apparent, he would take high rank among composers."

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

THE

AN ODE FOR MUSIC

BY

WILLIAM COLLINS

SET TO MUSIC FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA BY

ALICE MARY SMITH

(Mrs. MEADOWS WHITE).

Octavo, paper cover, 2s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Firmness, vigour, and strength mark the treatment of conceptions which are massive rather than graceful and elegant. . . . I welcome Mrs. Meadows White's 'Ode to the Passions' as the production of undeniable talent, and a worthy addition to the musical things which, being English, give Englishmen cause for pride."

DAILY NEWS.

"The Cantata displays much musical taste and intelligence, with a considerable aptitude for the use of orchestral combinations, and the work will certainly not diminish the artistic reputation gained by Mrs. Meadows White's previous compositions."

STANDARD.

"Mrs. White's work is honest, straightforward, and legitimate in every acceptance of the term; she aims at producing no sensational effects, but achieves that which is infinitely better—a work which will grow upon the auditor and student alike as a pleasing and highly finished art-product."

ATHENÆUM.

"A work of great merit, and quite worthy of its position in a festival programme. It should prove an exceedingly useful addition to the repertoire of Choral Societies."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"Possesses merit of no ordinary calibre. It is a well-conceived and powerful setting of Collins's poem."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"The 'Ode to the Passions' is, on the whole, a well-written and effective work, and worthy of far more applause than it received."

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

JASON

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

For Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra,

THE POEM WRITTEN BY

WILLIAM GRIST

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Octavo, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

TIMES.

"Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata, 'Jason,' which was the most important feature of to-night's concert and the only absolute novelty of the entire Festival, is not unworthy of so prominent a position. It is not only the most extensive choral work attempted by the young and promising composer, but it also illustrates the new development of the English school of music, which has been coincident with the growing taste for the higher aspects of the art in this country, supply meeting demand in this as in other cases. Mr. Mackenzie is in every sense a modern composer. There is in his music no trace of the slavish imitation of Mendelssohn which, for years after the death of that great composer, impeded the progress of any national or independent growth of musical art among us. . . . How the composer has accomplished his task of illustrating the action I cannot for the present explain at such length as the music deserves. I may, however, say in summary fashion that Mr. Mackenzie's 'Jason' contains more clever writing and more genuine inspiration than are to be found in any English Cantata produced during recent years, with the sole exception, perhaps, of Mr. Cowen's 'St. Ursula'."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"An orchestral intermezzo, 'On the waters,' represents the voyage from Hellas to Colchis. This is a charming number, orthodox as to form, and as poetic in spirit as though the composer of 'Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage' had written it. Indeed, Mendelssohn could not have been far from Mr. Mackenzie when he conceived this fresh and breezy music."

STANDARD.

"The Cantata of 'Jason' is not only his most pretentious, but also his most successful work. Its bright, melodious numbers will, in all probability, soon become popular. 'Jason' is described as a dramatic Cantata for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra. It is exceedingly clever in construction, and the orchestration is peculiarly picturesque in places."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"'Jason' is a composition characterised by vivid imagination, grace, and power, and it marks a further advance upon the road on which Mr. Mackenzie has already made such satisfactory progress. The Cantata left a great impression upon the audience, and the composer was heartily greeted at the conclusion from all parts of the hall."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"It may be premature to express so decided an opinion, but I am inclined to think 'Jason' is the finest Cantata ever penned by an English composer. It is not only scholarly in a high sense, but is written with a freedom of resource and a command over the various forms of expression not often equalled. The choruses are splendid, the melodies generally striking and unconventional, and the orchestration is exceedingly rich and varied."

IN THE PRESS.

AN ARRANGEMENT OF THE WHOLE WORK FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO BY BERTHOLD TOURS;

ALSO

THE TIMES.

"To sum up, Gounod's 'Redemption' may be classed among its author's noblest productions. It is a work of high aim, written regardless of immediate popularity, and therefore all the more likely to take rank among the few permanent additions which sacred music owes to modern composers. Its success at Birmingham was even more brilliant than might have been expected."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The climax came with M. Gounod's music to the Ascension Chorus, 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates,' or, as the present English version runs, 'Unfold, ye portals everlasting.' Here, by the use of simple harmonies in great masses, and by the employment of every orchestral resource, the composer stirs and excites the dullest feeling. The ensemble was magnificent, and the audience, for once ignoring regulation, burst into long and loud applause."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"The orchestration is throughout worthy of M. Gounod's previous reputation as a consummate master of the art. The varied instrumental effects preserve from tediousness the passages assigned to the two Narrators, which are mostly in monotone. An exquisite theme—or leit-motiv—recurs frequently as typical of the Redeemer; and always brings the suggestion of benign holiness."

GUARDIAN.

"That the 'Redemption' is a great work which must at once take its place among the classics of musical literature cannot be doubted."

GRAPHIC.

"M. Gounod, in the plan and development of his Oratorio, speaks for himself; and this, enhanced by the abundant melody and rich harmonic treatment that distinguish it from end to end, invests the whole composition with a sustained tone of originality, telling its own tale in a way not easy to misconstrue."

DAILY NEWS.

"The music, while occasionally somewhat secular in tone, is throughout earnest and serious, yet full of melodic grace and charm, and all the richness of those varied harmonic progressions which belong to the modern period of musical art. . . . The orchestration is throughout that of a skilled and practised master of the art. . . . 'The Redemption' must rank as a masterpiece of its kind, especially in the orchestral treatment, which is a marvel of musical colouring."

MORNING POST.

"The hand of the experienced musician is recognisable in every bar, and the composer may justly call it 'Opus vitæ meæ' and be proud of it."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The work was listened to with the most complimentary attention, the composer himself suppressing any attempt at applause, but after the powerful air for soprano, 'From Thy love as a Father,' the audience broke out again and again, in spite of the endeavours made to quell the demonstration. At the close of the performance the composer received a perfect ovation both from the audience and the performers."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"That it is a great work cannot for a moment be doubted, and in well-nigh every sense it is worthy the genius of Gounod, who has been justified in writing on its score, 'Opus vitæ meæ,' if he means by this that it is to be considered the finest sacred work of his life. To say that 'The Redemption' will take a high place in the domain of oratorio is not to assume too much."

MIDLAND COUNTIES HERALD.

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of
LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON's Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicsellers throughout the World.

J. & J. HOPKINSON

Invite attention to the following Testimonials:—

I have had occasion to test HOPKINSON's Pianos in London and in Paris, and I am bound to declare that with regard to power, evenness of tone, and equality of touch, I have found them of rare excellence.

They are Instruments that all Pianists ought to appreciate, for they allow them to give expression to their feelings, and to play with the most delicate nuances.

PARIS, July 23, 1878. (Signed) CH. GOUNOD.

I have played at the Paris Exhibition on Messrs. HOPKINSON's Pianos, and I say with pleasure that the quality of sound has completely satisfied me, as well as the elasticity of touch, which leaves nothing to be desired.

(Signed) ANTOINE DE KONTSKI.
July 30, 1878.

I have had the opportunity of trying the excellent Pianos of Messrs. HOPKINSON, whose instruments have the qualities I esteem in a Piano; "they have a soul," which permits the performer to communicate the poetic feeling in his heart, and in the spirit necessary to forget himself in his performances.

PARIS, July 30, 1878.

(Signed) D. MAGNUS.

The Grand Pianos of HOPKINSON, London, are very remarkable. They are equal to those of the best Houses already known. All the qualities which can be demanded by an experienced virtuoso—vigour of attack, openness of sound, possibility to give the necessary shade to the music, and to produce effects of extreme delicacy—are found in HOPKINSON's Pianofortes. They possess also a sonority of a crystalline nature, which gives them a certain charm, and characterises their own personality.

(Signed) NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,

Director of the Conservatoire of Moscow.

PARIS, August 3, 1878.

I state with pleasure that the Grand Pianos of Messrs. J. and J. HOPKINSON of London, which I have had the opportunity of hearing and of trying myself, are remarkable for their fabrication, and that they rival those of the best Houses of Paris and London for their wonderful power and elasticity of touch.

I should wish no other for my personal use, and to accompany me in my concerts.

(Signed) CH. NILSSON.

THE MUSICAL REVIEW,

TO BE PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

---

The First Number will appear on Saturday, January 6, 1883.

THE MUSICAL REVIEW is started for the purpose of supplying the want long felt not only in England, but in the musical world generally, of a comprehensive weekly record of the progress of Musical Art in all its branches. The recent development and the extensive spread of English musical taste, and the amount and variety of music performed every year amongst us to supply that taste, have made London one of the musical centres of the world, where the currents of the Art, as represented by the leading talent of all countries, converge; and it is here, therefore, that a central organ of music may most fitly be published. THE MUSICAL REVIEW accordingly will be free from the narrowness of national or party prejudice. While giving due prominence to English Music, it will consider that music as a part of the great artistic movement which is not confined to one country, and of which the separate developments in France, or Germany, or Italy, or Russia, are only so many subdivisions, to be judged by the same standard of absolute merit.

THE MUSICAL REVIEW will not be made the organ of a party, much less of commercial interest of any kind. For this the Editor holds himself personally responsible.

In furthering the interests of Art and Artists for the sake of Art alone, in combining due reverence for the classical models with ready appreciation of all that is hopeful and truthful in modern music, THE MUSICAL REVIEW will endeavour to follow the example of Schumann's Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. Like that model of periodical literature, it will also endeavour to attract the interest of cultured musical amateurs, no less than that of professors, by avoiding abstruseness of treatment as far as a thorough discussion of the subject will allow.

The contents of THE MUSICAL REVIEW will consist of Leading Articles and shorter notes on topics of the day, full accounts of Musical Performances in London, and summaries of the more important events in the Provinces. Foreign Intelligence will be a special feature of the journal, and correspondents of ability in the musical capitals of Europe and America have been secured. All important musical publications and books on music will be treated by competent writers, and independent essays and articles on musical subjects will be contributed by leading musicians and critics both in this country and abroad. The tone of the new journal may best be indicated by the proverbial saying, "Fortiter in re, suaviter in modo." The unflinching truth will be spoken, but in no instance will personal susceptibilities be hurt without need. Only in the repression of incompetence and arrogant mediocrity will it be thought necessary to have recourse to the severer modes of criticism.

GOUNOD'S "REDEMPTION."

THE extraordinary interest created by this new work is not likely to be confined to a desire for the contemplation of its many beauties during performance. The plan which M. Gounod had in view during its composition furnishes us with materials for thinking; and we are not surprised therefore that a writer already well known by his works on "The Philosophy of Music," and "Musical Development," Mr. Joseph Goddard, should have given us the result of his study of an Oratorio which so great an artist as M. Gounod has declared to be the work of his life. This pamphlet, entitled "Reflections upon Ch. Gounod's Sacred Trilogy, 'The Redemption,'" should receive a cordial welcome, for not only is it earnestly and truthfully written throughout, but the design of the composer is carefully and minutely analysed. We can give but a faint idea of the pamphlet by the few quotations the space at our disposal will permit us to make; but those we have marked strike us as evidencing much acuteness of judgment. Speaking of the melody typical of the Redeemer, he says that M. Gounod intends to illustrate one aspect only of the subject—the human aspect. "He approaches the Saviour as a child—sees only the qualities of intense love, tenderness and graciousness, and these qualities are expressed vividly in this eloquent melody which, as it consists of just detached phrases, lends itself easily to expansion by modulation, without perceptible break of outline; and as its lineaments thus appear in new keys, they seem to possess ever increasing brightness and intensity of expression." The music illustrating the incidents of the crucifixion is thus described:—

There is this peculiarity in the literary treatment of the subject: the principal incidents are depicted as actually occurring, but the narrative is interrupted occasionally by poetic apostrophe. The points where the realistic attitude gives way to the poetic, are, at the choruses, "Forth the royal banners go," "The reproaches," "Beside the Cross remaining," with the solo "While my watch I am keeping"; the choral, "Lord Jesus, Thou to all bringest light and salvation," and the final chorus, "For us the Christ is made a victim availing." The portions treated in a realistic spirit are, the Condemnation, the going to Calvary (excepting the choral portion of the march), the Crucifixion, Mary at the foot of the Cross (excepting the chorus and solo terminating this scene), the episode of the two thieves, the death of Jesus, and the Centurion. These two generally different literary attitudes produce corresponding differences in the music. In speaking of the music we will refer first to that accompanying the realistic part of the text, as this covers more ground; and secondly, to that expressing the rhapsodic part. The music, then, to the realistic part consists principally of a very plain style of recitative, a tempo, accompanied by subtle harmony, of simple song, consisting of generally even-measured sounds, which may be almost described as earnest speech in musical effect, of purely dramatic chorus, and of independent orchestral music. The musical illustration of the descriptive portions of the recitative is often most graphic and suggestive. As examples may be cited, "The blood is also gushing 'neath the scourge," where the accompaniment suggests poignant suffering, the voice-part expressing intense pity and sorrow; also, after the words "They extend on the Cross the Saviour's sacred limbs"—which are recited amid surrounding silence—a passage occurs for the orchestra, which has an almost painful suggestiveness. To the words, "From His feet, from His hands that are torn by nails," the music is both sympathetic and solemn, whilst at the context, "The blood drops on the ground," it involves a chromatically ascending passage of common chords, each having its third major. The unnaturalness, so to speak, of this progression, together with the absence of dissonance, seem to fitly illustrate tragedy the more dreadful that it is ordered.

Mr. Goddard takes the true view of the "March to Calvary," and draws attention to the fact of the obvious suggestion of "cruelty and taunting" in this composition, and the contrast of the choruses expressive of christian compassion, of worship and praise. Having also eloquently commented upon the movement representing "Darkness," he says:—

We now come to the numbers in this part where the composer, taking the attitude of poetic apostrophe and contemplation, gives freer play to the pure musical impulse, and, in doing so, attains, in our opinion, the highest effect. These numbers are—the chorus, "The reproaches"; the quartet and chorus, "Beside the Cross"; the solo, "While my watch I am keeping"; the chorals, "Lord Jesus" and "For us the Christ is made a victim availing." All of these are compositions of that rank to which only lofty genius can attain. Clear in form, chaste in melody, graphic in harmony, and deep with moral import, "The Reproaches," "Beside the Cross," and "For us the Christ," are particularly impressive. The first is the voice of a great remonstrance, rising to the utmost fervour, but never departing from composure, and in the closing accents of which is the calm and solemn acceptance of self-sacrifice. The second, a short but expressive "Stabat Mater," is one more musical utterance of that poignant but personal grief on which the Roman Church dwells so much when regarding the Crucifixion.

The "Hymn of the Apostles," he reminds us, is intended to be ecclesiastical, and is thus "not a free, full expression of religious enthusiasm, but the musical celebration of certain articles of Faith." In this light of course it is absolutely necessary that this important portion of the work should be considered; for instead of taking the opportunity of displaying his exceptional musical powers, the composer, ruled by the desire of adapting his means to the end in view, intentionally endeavours to recall a style associated with the Catholic liturgy. "In the Beatitudes," the writer says, "M. Gounod carries musical expressiveness to a height rarely attained by the greatest composers, and never surpassed":—

In the first chorus, "O come to Me," the strains thrill with intense sympathy, intense solicitude—reflecting vividly the feelings of "the unhappy," whilst the construction, though rich in subtle effects, is still all chaste in form, as it is all true in spirit. The next chorus, commencing to the words "They are blessed, the poor in spirit," is warmer in tone and of soothing effect. If the emotional keynote of the previous chorus is sympathy, that of the present one is consolation. Whilst as true in expression as the former, the expression in the latter case admits of a sweeter and more open melody. The result is an effect of elevated spirit and kindling beauty such as in this region of music—music appealing to the religious sentiments—no composer has excelled. We feel that words are more than ever vain in speaking of these two choruses; they would alone render the "Redemption" a boon to Art.

Pointing out that the musical setting of sacred words should be considered—and is in this work considered—a "religious duty," the author concludes his pamphlet with the following sentence:—

The art instinct and the moral instinct may be, and probably are, different things. Still, it cannot be denied that the highest power of art-effect becomes unfolded when art is applied to the expression of moral beauty. It would seem, therefore, that the complete appreciation of such art-effect, can only occur where both artistic sensibility and moral sympathy are united. We think, then, that among other respects in which the "Redemption" is an important work, not the least is this—it demands moral sympathy as well as artistic. Here M. Gounod sets a guiding example. And this leads us, in conclusion, to record our belief that in the future, this, what we may term, moral preparedness, will be universally considered to be an indispensable condition for true participation in the beauty of all great art.

We have had much pleasure in directing attention to Mr. Goddard's thoughtful and well-timed little Essay; and trust that for the better understanding of the subject upon which it treats, it may be extensively read. It seems somewhat strange, however, that Mr. Goddard in the course of his pamphlet does not dwell upon the text of "The Redemption," which assuredly the composer considered nearly, if not quite, as important as the music itself. It has been remarked that the text of this work approaches sublimity in its treatment, and, indeed, it would be difficult in the whole range of Oratorio to find its equal. The skill with which Mr. Troutbeck has translated this, then, claims warm recognition, and, after a careful study of the English text, we unhesitatingly award him the praise he fully deserves. It has been proved in many instances that the success of a work in this country has depended largely upon the English words, and some portion of the popularity "The Redemption" has so rapidly achieved may therefore doubtless be attributed to the same cause.

MARTIN GERBERT:

PRIEST, PRINCE, SCHOLAR, AND MUSICIAN.

By FR. NIECKS.

NICOLAI, who corroborates the authorities just quoted, remarks of the inner constitution of the monastery that the inmates of the latter consisted of six classes: (1) of young people who were educated there and trained for their future vocations; (2) of teachers in the various scientific branches of their calling; (3) of priests who administered to the neighbouring filial churches; (4) of persons whose duty it was to attend to the temporal concerns; (5) of the old and sick who enjoyed their deserved rest and nursing; and (6) of lay-brothers who carried on the necessary trades and performed the various household offices. To form, however, an adequate idea of the magnitude and importance of this religious community, we must take note that, besides the members who resided at St. Blaise, there were others living more or less far away from it, teaching at gymnasia or in universities, acting as pastors or provosts in different parts of the territory belonging to the monastery. And I may here remark that this territory was not at all insignificant. It was divided into thirteen parishes and twenty-five bailiwicks; comprised thirty-five boroughs and villages, besides hamlets and isolated farms; had a population of 11,600 serfs; and yielded a revenue which left the monastery, after all expenses were paid, a clear profit of 100,000 florins annually. For these statistics, which will help us to understand better what the author of "A Journey to St. Blaise" is going to tell us, I am indebted to Joseph Bader. To resume, then, our professor's account: "A great number of fratres conversi, or laici, are here, who, indeed, have taken the vow and wear also the black dress, but are not priests, nor do they ever become such. They wear, to distinguish them from the priests, small moustaches, manage the household matters, have not studied, know well and practise in the monastery their trades, are printers, composers, bookbinders, apothecaries, joiners, &c." With regard to what is here said about the lay-brothers, I may remark that the prince-abbot seems to have encouraged the pursuit of the trades as much as the pursuit of the sciences—to have spent money as liberally in buying tools and mechanical instruments as in buying books, manuscripts, maps, medals, and the like. He very frequently paid the apprentice-fee for youths to enable them to learn a useful art.

And now we come to what Nicolai, notwithstanding all the highly remarkable things that were to be seen at St. Blaise, declares to have been the most remarkable object—namely, the Prince-Abbot Martin. "The prince likes to live in one of the upper storeys; his rooms announce rather the learned and ever-busy man than the man of rank. They are large and roomy, in order that, when interrupted in his work by strangers or persons from the monastery who wish to speak with him, he may at once walk about with them and take a little exercise. Only about Advent and Shrove-tide he lives for the sake of self-contemplation for a short time in the monastery." At other times he resided in the abbey, which was separated from the monastery by the choir of the church. According to the necrologist, the prince-abbot adhered inviolably to the order of the day, which he had fixed once for all: devoting the three first hours to prayers and religious exercises; assisting daily, even when travelling, at two masses; passing afterwards all the time which his administrative duties left free—often seven hours a day—at the writing-desk or in the library. "As for the government of the little ecclesiastical state," says our professor, "the prince keeps a few secular officials, who live in special buildings beside the convent and have their meals at court. With them he holds every three weeks conferences, causes letters and accounts to be laid before him, and works himself much with them. Immediately under him stands the father grand-cellarer. The father chief-accountant examines all the accounts of the provosts, bailiffs, superiors, and stewards, and, according to the tax, receives a ducat for it from every accountant as soon as the account has been checked and he has sent them the absolutorium, which the prince himself signs. This ducat the chief-accountant spends for the natural history cabinet. . . . As Count of Bonndorf the prince keeps three soldiers, privates, who relieve each other in standing guard at the portal. For his attendance a valet, a young hussar, a coachman, and an outrider are appointed." Indeed, Prince-Abbot Martin, like all truly great men, did not care much for outward show. Although he had rich pectoralia—one with emeralds, the other with diamonds, gifts of the Empress Maria Theresa—he generally wore only a simple gold cross on his breast.

Nicolai, in describing the prince-abbot, says that there was "something hearty, something modest and courteous, and yet very dignified, about him; something serene, jovial, and yet very decorous, in his face, in his carriage, and in his whole being." And he adds: "After the example of this noble abbot also the canons have formed themselves. They are all learned men, and in all of them one notices the serene, courteous, candid, and hearty manner, combined with the same decorum and propriety, which distinguish their superior." In the same strain writes Professor Sander of the secular servants of the prince, whose courteous, obliging, generous, and humane character, he says, they imitated; whence it came that the subjects were not heard to grumble or complain. The account in Schlichtegroll's "Nekrolog" confirms Nicolai's and Sander's statements, and makes the portrait still more lifelike by adding some further touches. We learn from it that Gerbert was beneficent to the poor, a lover of peace, and in friendly intercourse and correspondence with men of different religious confessions. Here are some of the most interesting parts of this characterisation: "The serene and affable mien of Gerbert announced already the inner calm of his mind and his universal benevolence. There was nothing pharisaical about him, but much dignity; nothing Jesuitical, but much refinement. His pleasing exterior, no doubt, did much to prepossess people in his favour. Many persons who made his acquaintance spoke of their intercourse with him with enthusiasm. His modest manners incited one to love modesty; the moral expression of his physiognomy recommended to one morality; his imposing appearance taught one to respect order, difference of rank, and subordination. He was a model of genuine humility, and his sensibility of heart was such as I have as yet rarely found in a monk. Gerbert loved to animate his social conversations with playful allusions and a certain kind of witty ambiguity; but this was always done in a way which showed that he had enjoyed manifold intercourse with cultivated society. His behaviour in company was throughout placid, gentle, and affable, although he had only by a careful self-education conquered his naturally hot temperament."

The example of the prince-abbot's wit quoted by the necrologist is not exactly distinguished by brilliancy: it shines at best only with a mild radiance. But the kindly tone of the voice and the smile on the face went, no doubt, for something in the effect it produced. "I am myself an artist," said the great man on one occasion; "for I have spent a great deal of money in apprentice-fees." (Ich bin selbst ein Artist; denn ich habe gar vieles. Lehrgeld gegeben.)

"Two chief traits in the character of the prince-abbot were the great simplicity of his mind, which distinguished all his actions, and the burning zeal for religion, as he conceived it from his point of view. But, not to judge him wrongly in the latter respect, we must bring home to our mind his whole position—then we shall find his religious convictions quite reconcilable with the rest of his discernments and studies, and understand how it was that he lacked sometimes a freer view in his judgments on men and in religious matters." Not to misunderstand these remarks, we must keep in mind the fact that the prince-abbot was in correspondence and had intercourse with men of various beliefs and tendencies, whom he admired and loved, and whom he knew how to inspire with the same sentiments. Besides the friends that have been introduced in my narrative, I mention also Professor Schöpfli and the librarian Lamey, of Strasburg, the historian Johannes Müller, and Gluck. It will be interesting for musicians to learn that with the latter Gerbert was in friendly intercourse, and that the two men esteemed each other reciprocally.

Thus far I have said little in answer to the question—which of course suggests itself first and foremost in connection with a man who has distinguished himself by his writings on music—namely, What sort of a musician was he? Much is not known regarding Martin Gerbert's musical education and accomplishments, but the little that is known shall now be placed before the reader. In an earlier part of this biographical sketch it has already been stated that Martin's school and home education in his native place, Horb, included a careful grounding in music; and also that he sucked in the love of music with his mother's milk, and applied himself from early youth to the acquirement of this art, even when severer studies occupied him. Gerbert reports, in the "Lexicon der Tonkünstler," that Martin Gerbert's love of music was enkindled to a high degree by the frequent opportunities which he had of hearing in his school-days the excellent musical establishment of the Duke of Würtemberg at Ludwigsburg, and of himself taking part in the singing. Fétis writes in the same strain. Considering the position of Martin's parents, the distance from the place where he passed his school-days to Ludwigsburg, and other circumstances, I cannot help doubting the correctness of these statements, although I am unable to contradict them. But, whatever our doubts may be, it is impossible to doubt Gerbert's love of music; indeed, it was so great a passion with him that, as he himself confessed, he could only with difficulty keep it within bounds. His writing on sacred music was a compromise between artistic inclination and priestly duty. Gerbert cultivated, however, the art practically as well as theoretically. Already as a youth he showed himself a good performer on the organ; and it has been said of him that he played and composed with great ability. Some offertories of his—written for voices with instrumental accompaniments, and in the prevalent style of the time—were published at Augsburg. After he had farther advanced in the study of the old church music, he looked with regret on these achievements of his younger years, holding, as may be read in his "De cantu et musica sacra," that church music was a kind of sacred eloquence, whose sole end was to teach and move, and not merely to delight. Writing to Pius VI., to whom he dedicated (1776) his "Vetus Liturgia Alemannica," Gerbert calls chant and church music the chief promoters of devotion, and laments their growing degeneracy in Germany, which he attributes to the fashion of imitating the Italians in a worldly taste instead of following the example of the papal chapel, where nothing but that music which alone is worthy of the church—i.e., that of the human voice—is admitted.

Even if there were no other evidence we might gather from these few remarks that genuine church music had a home at St. Blaise, and modish frivolities found the doors closed. The abbot soon abolished the custom of giving a trumpet-flourish at the transubstantiation and of singing an air after it. On the other hand, he introduced the Gregorian chant, which he had learned to admire, and the manner of execution of which he had noted down, during his stay in Rome; and when the service-books were destroyed in the great fire, he, assisted by some of the monks, set himself to compile a new one, which was printed in the monastery. Its title is "Graduale romano-monasticum pro choro Monasterio S. Blasii, &c." Von Böcklein's "Beyträge zur Geschichte der Musik" contains some curious notices of the abbot and the musical doings at St. Blaise. "The now reigning prince," this writer says, "loves the sciences more than music, although he knows well enough how to appreciate its value. His sole aim is to form scholars of his people, among whom he shines like the moon among the stars. This man of world-wide fame is indeed an enemy to the so degenerated and vitiated church music of to-day, and rightly so; for really the blasphemous nuisance which at present for the most part prevails should be everywhere rigorously banished from our temples." Particularly interesting is Von Böcklein's account of the consecration of the new church of St. Blaise, by Bishop Maximilian, of Constance, a ceremony which had been postponed till September 21, 1783, in order to celebrate the anniversary of the first Charta regia in possession of the monastery, which was granted by Emperor Otto II. in the year 983. I may note, en passant, that the first mass was said in the church as early as St. Martin's Day—the name-day of the abbot—of November, 1781. "At the consecration of the new church of St. Blaise," writes Von Böcklein, "a new choral (the antiphon 'Ecce sacerdos magnus') was sung—the organ, trombones, cornets, trumpets, and kettle-drums, as well as some harmonic bells, accompanying alternately. It was a kind of music such as I had never heard in Germany, and very like the Gregorian chant at St. Peter's in Rome." Gerbert, whose endeavour it had been for years gradually to restrict the number of instruments used in divine service, at last proposed in 1787 to the chapter, and obtained their consent—although not without some reluctance—to banish all instruments except the organ. Thenceforth nothing was heard in the church of St. Blaise but Gregorian chant or simple four-part masses with organ accompaniment. The above-mentioned antiphon, "Ecce sacerdos magnus," performed at the consecration of the new church, was by the prince-abbot himself; and it is reported that the playing of Father Schell, the "magnificent organist," contributed much to the imposing rendering of the composition. But probably the only composition of Gerbert's known to any one of the present generation is the one appended to the "De cantu et musica sacra": a Mass ("Missa in coena Domini," consisting of an Introitus for two choruses and "basso principale" ad libitum; a Kyrie for two choruses and "basso principale"; a Gloria for two choruses, "organ. in Imo. choro, organ. in IIdo. choro," and "organ. princip."; a Graduale, a Credo and a Sanctus for two choruses and "basso principale"; a Benedictus for three solo voices and one chorus; an Agnus Dei for two choruses; and an Ad Communionem for two solo parts without accompaniments of any kind.

In musical craftsmanship and learning the prince-abbot cannot be compared with Padre Martini. And his inferiority is apparent not only in considering him as a composer, but even in considering him as an historian. Nevertheless, it will hardly be disputed that his contributions to the history of music have afforded more furtherance to this study than those of the musically more expert and learned Italian monk. This might have been different if Padre Martini had lived long enough to complete the fourth volume of his "Storia della Musica." But death interrupted his labours before he had reached the point where a history of music deserving the name becomes possible. We can never have a history of Hebrew and of Greek music, because of Hebrew music no genuine specimens whatever, and of Greek music only a very few and insignificant ones, have come down to us. Therefore nothing is to be expected but a history of theories, and a history of art must be something more than that.

Martin Gerbert gave to the world as many as thirty theological and devotional works and twelve historical ones, all of which were printed at St. Blaise. The former are now obsolete and forgotten, but the latter, and among them especially those that treat of music, have still a high value. The most precious of the non-musical historical works are the "History of the Black Forest" ("Historia nigrae sylvae ordinis S. Benedicti coloniae"), the "Codex epistolaris Rudolphi I.," and some other contributions to the history of the house of Austria. His "Iter alemannicum, accedit italicum et gallicum" interests the musical student because of the accounts it contains of libraries, of manuscripts, books, medals, &c. Besides the two Latin editions of this work—both, like all the other literary publications of Martin Gerbert, printed at St. Blaise—which appeared, the one in 1765, the other in 1773, there exists also a German edition, the lengthy title of which may be worth while translating: "Travels through Alemannia, Italy, and France, which were undertaken in 1759, 1760, 1761, and 1762, and by the noble author himself supplemented and improved by many additions, special notes, and beautiful engravings of antiquities, and translated from the Latin, also provided with two indexes of places and noteworthy objects, by J. L. K. [Köhler]." Ulm, Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1767." Martin Gerbert informs the reader that he was induced by his friends and by those to whom he owed obedience to publish this selection of the most interesting entries from his diary. The "Vetus liturgia alemannica" and the "Monumenta veteris liturgiae alemannicae" lie of course likewise within the range of the musico-historical student's hunting-ground.

The first of the two chief and purely musical works was published in 1774. Its full title is "De Cantu et Musica Sacra a Prima Ecclesiae Aetate usque ad Praesens Tempus, auctore Martino Gerberto, Monasterii et Congreg. S. Blasii in Silva Nigra Abbate S. Q. R. J. P. Permissu Superiorum. Typis San-Blasianis, MDCLXXIV." In this history of chant and sacred music from the earliest time to the second half of the eighteenth century, which is a rich mine of various information, the author describes the rise and development of sacred music: discussing the ritual employment of music, service-books, celebrated authors, notation, polyphony, mensura, instruments, &c.; and concluding the second and last volume of the work with a book concerning sacred music from about the fifteenth century to his own time. This liber iv. consists of six chapters, which treat respectively of "the chant and ecclesiastical music of the later age;" "the use of chant and music [cantus et musica] among the heterodox;" "concerning the chant and music of the modern Greeks, Russians, &c.;" "the art and institution of chant and sacred music in the latest age;" "authors of sacred music in the posterior age up to the present time;" "the old music compared with the more recent one."

The second of the two chief and purely musical works of Martin Gerbert was published ten years later, in 1784. Its full title runs: "Scriptores Ecclesiastici de Musica Sacra Potissimum. Ex variis Italiae, Galliae et Germaniae Codicibus Manuscriptis Collecti et nunc primum Publica Luce Donati a Martino Gerberto, &c. [as above], MDCCLXXXIV." The importance of the "Ecclesiastical writers on music, chiefly sacred, collected from various Italian, French, and German manuscript codices, and now for the first time published" (this latter statement is not literally true: some of the treatises had already been published), is best shown by an enumeration of the contents, which are as follows:—

Gerontikon S. Pambronis—Monacho qua mente sit psallendum—Instituta patrum de modo psallendi—S. Nicetius—Cassiodorus—Isidorus Hispalensis—Alcuinus (Flaccus)—Aurelianus Reomensis—Remigius Altisiodorensis (Rémi d'Auxerre)—Notker Balbulus—Notker Laboe—Hucbald—Regino of Prüm—Odo of Clugny (Cluniacensis)—Adelbold—Bernelinus—Anonymus I., II., and III.; and three treatises on "Mensura Monochordi," by Boethius, Guido, and Otter, of Ratisbon—Guidonis Aretini opuscula de musica—Berno of Reichenau—Hermannus Contractus—Wilhelmus Hirsaugiensis—Theogerus Metensis—Aribo Scholasticus—Joannes Cottonius—Bernard of Clairvaux—Gerlandus Chrysopolitanus—Eberhardus Frisingensis—Anonymi de mensura fistularum in organis—Engelbert of Admont (Styria)—Aegidius Zamorensis—Franco of Cologne—Salomo (Elias)—Marchettus of Padua—Joannes de Muris—Arnulphus de S. Gilleno—Joannes Keckius—Adam of Fulda—Constitutiones capellae pontificiae—and, lastly, two short fragments on the church chant of the modern Greeks.

Gerbert's style—he wrote all his works in Latin—has been characterised as "somewhat diffuse and confuse." Herr Bader adduces in excuse of the defect the "multitude of thoughts and reflections" which came crowding upon the mind of the author whilst at work. Ambros, after describing Martini's "Storia della musica" as "a work full of learning, heavy and precious as gold, but already rather removed from our time on account of its form and lengthy ragionamenti;" giving, indeed, the impression of a dust-covered museum where the most precious antiquities stand awkwardly huddled together in ill-lighted rooms," remarks that Gerbert's "De cantu et musica sacra" was "a similar museum full of precious things." The unattractiveness of their style and form is no doubt one of the reasons why Gerbert's books are so little read; another is their being written in Latin; and the last, but certainly not least, reason is their great rareness and consequent costliness. Gerbert is, indeed, one of the most eminent of those authors who are often quoted and seldom read—a fact which is made most glaringly evident by the different readings in which, for instance, the title of the collection of mediæval writers on music appears in some of the best encyclopædias and in esteemed historical works. Thus one reads of "Scriptores de musica sacra potissima;" of "Scriptores de musica sacra potissimi;" of "Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra, potissimum ex italiae, galliae et germaniae codicibus manuscriptis collecti." &c.; and of other variations which, out of regard for the preciousness of space, I abstain from transcribing. To be sure, some of these mistakes are slips of the pen or misprints, which, however, are afterwards as religiously copied as the more exact information given by these authorities.

Seeing that Martin Gerbert's works are less for those who read than those that write history, it may not be inadvisable to inquire what these latter say about them. Hawkins got Gerbert's "De cantu et musica sacra" when he had already printed the fifth volume of his history (published in 1776), and consequently could not take advantage of it. But, in mentioning this fact in the preliminary discourse, he praises the "great learning, judgment, and candour" evinced by the author of this "most valuable work," and felicitates himself on finding his "sentiments on the subject, particularly on the church composers and the corruptions of the church style, confirmed by the testimony of so able a writer." Burney was more fortunate than Hawkins, for, as the second volume of his history did not appear till 1782, he had the benefit of Gerbert's "De cantu et musica sacra," although the "Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum" came too late also for him. Burney mentions Gerbert in his history only en passant, and without noteworthy comment; to learn something of the relation in which they stood to each other we must go to Vol. II., pp. 317-319 of "The Present State of Music in Germany, the Netherlands, and United Provinces." Forkel gives one idea how Gerbert's contributions to the history of music were appreciated by those who at that time were workers in the same field. After expressing in the preface to his history (Vol. I., 1788) his indebtedness to Hawkins and Burney, he proceeds: "But most welcome of all was to me the considerable collection of writings which the prince-abbot of St. Blaise published in 1784, and by which he enabled also the musical historian who could not undertake long journeys in search of unprinted materials to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the nature of the art as far as this is possible without practical examples." Forkel's sentiments show themselves still more distinctly in his "Allgemeine Literatur der Musik" (1792), which, "as a testimony of his veneration and gratitude," he dedicates "to the most reverend Prince Martin, Abbot of St. Blaise, &c., author of the excellent work 'De cantu et musica sacra,' and editor of the musical writers of the middle ages, whereby musical literature has been so much enriched." In the course of time historians began to temper their praise of the learned monk with criticism. The noblest kind of criticism was that of Goussemaker, who complemented and continued Gerbert's collection of mediæval writers on music by the publication of more than sixty additional treatises ("Scriptorum de musica mediæ ævi novam seriem a Gerberta alteram collegit nuncque primum edidit E. de Coussemaker, 1867-1876"). Fétis, although not backward in recognising in "De cantu et musica sacra" curious details on the mediæval notation, origin of mensurable music, and instruments, especially the organ, yet regrets that Gerbert's special musical knowledge was not more extensive and his reasoning in many parts of the book rather that of a scholar than that of a musician. Still severer strictures the Belgian historian gives vent to with regard to the "Scriptores ecclesiastici," a collection into which he thinks were admitted some treatises devoid of interest, and others incorrectly copied or copied from incorrect manuscripts. The article "Franco" ("Biographie universelle des Musiciens") contains a most withering criticism of Gerbert; Fétis going even the length of saying, "In truth, it seems that Gerbert did not understand what he was transcribing. With regard to the examples in musical notation, the evil is much more grave, for many examples do not correspond at all with the text, or the music has been placed wrongly, the clefs have been changed in several places, and the parts have been inverted, so that the highest became the lowest," &c. Nevertheless, Fétis does not hesitate to state that "the publication of this collection may be considered as one of the greatest services which have been rendered to art." Coussemaker, in his new series of mediæval writers, as well as in "Les Harmonistes des XII<sup>e</sup> et XIII<sup>e</sup> Siècles," and in "L'Art harmonique aux XII<sup>e</sup> et XIII<sup>e</sup> Siècles," expresses himself even more eulogistically. In the last-mentioned work he says of Gerbert's collection that it "has opened a new era in the history of the art, in enabling the learned to study it in the original sources."

And if we now visit the place where the works which have been such precious gifts to historical inquirers were planned, composed and printed, where Martin Gerbert lived—learning, teaching, praying, meditating, and governing—for more than fifty years, what do we see? The Government secularised, the monastery occupied by operatives and State officials, the church despoiled of its splendour. At first, in 1802, the territory of St. Blaise was to be given to the Knights of St. John in compensation for losses sustained; but finally, in 1805, it was, by the Treaty of Pressburg, divided between Baden and Würtemberg. Two years later, on June 25, 1807, a decree was issued suppressing the monastery, whence the monks had already in the preceding year departed. They stayed till 1808 at the Abbey of Pyrhn on the Ens, and then settled at St. Paul's, in Carinthia. In this way the monastery became disposable for manufacturing and official purposes. The time was also deemed opportune for stripping the church of its most precious ornaments; not only were the marble columns which supported the cupola removed and the organ carried off to Carlsruhe, but even the copper roof was taken down. To make bad worse, a fire broke out in 1874, and totally destroyed the noble edifice—which, indeed, was subsequently rebuilt, and still serves as the parish church, but which is now less like its former self than ever. In short, the picture is a sad one, we turn from it willingly, not, however, without a sigh. Sic transit gloria mundi.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XII.—ROSSINI (continued from page 594).

THE year 1819 was a busy one with Rossini. Having produced at Naples his "Ermione," the cantata "Parthenope," and a second cantata in honour of the Austrian emperor's visit, as well as the pasticcio "Eduardo e Christina" at Venice, he turned his attention to the works of Sir Walter Scott, hoping for a subject among the tales, romances and poems which were then entrancing Europe. His choice fell upon "The Lady of the Lake," and in a very little while Tottola was ready with the libretto of "La Donna del Lago." Rossini was moved by his fresh and poetical theme to unwonted efforts, some critics going so far as to say that "La Donna del Lago" is the Italian "Tell." However this may be, it is certain that the master here drew more fully upon his resources, and enlarged very materially the scope of his expression. The work must now be considered as out of date, if not unworthy of present hearing, yet it is worth while to repeat what a contemporary critic, M. Azevedo, has said of it. If we believe the following testimony, then we must also hold that the world is neglecting a treasure indeed:—

"There is not in the repertory of Rossini, and consequently in the entire musical art, a marvel that can equitably be placed above the first act of 'La Donna del Lago.' There all is genius. What can one rank, in effect, before the scene of the lake, 'O matutini albori,' where the true poetry of a tranquil country painted in sound is only equalled by the expression of the heroine's tender melancholy? or before the superb and pathetic air 'O quante lagrime,' with its syncopations, which are like sobs? or the chorus, so fresh and characteristic, 'Inibaca donzelli'? or the all-powerful finale? In this finale Rossini has shown in an astonishing manner that the most difficult combinations cannot affect his inexhaustible inspiration. All, no doubt, is calculated in such a piece, since the motifs of the different characters have, at a given moment, to mingle and be simultaneously heard. Nevertheless, the calculation involved by the process does not appear. The march of the mountaineers to battle, with sound of trumpet, considered in itself, is one of the most frank, characteristic and picturesque things known. The combative and savage ardour of these warriors is there depicted in lines of flame. . . . As for the hymn of the bards, it is the sublime carried to its highest power. What inspiration, what grandeur, what superhuman force vivify this immortal page! Let us not attempt to describe it, since success is impossible. All these things which, taken separately, bear, each in its way, the mark of the most free, the most happy inspiration, finish by combining themselves, and in so doing producing an effect at once musical and dramatic, or, if you like, epic, of a sonority, warmth, truth and clearness which we cannot describe in words."

So far M. Azevedo; but the world worships other idols just now, and "La Donna del Lago" stands in a temple whose altar is neglected, and whence the smell of incense has departed. It is true that the opera failed on the night of its first performance, but such a catastrophe in Italy has little necessary connection with the question of merit. The fact was that the Neapolitans detested the impresario, Barbaja, because of the favour in which he stood with a king and court whom they detested still more. Political feeling at that moment was working up to boiling point, and we shall presently see that it led to revolt and the flight of the monarch from his capital. Under such circumstances it is not surprising that the people refused to discriminate. They thought to annoy the king by doing his favourite a bad turn, and they could only injure Barbaja by hissing his operas as fast as they were produced. On the night of "La Donna del Lago," therefore, the audience were prepared to seize the smallest occasion for uproar. During some time no such opportunity presented itself, but when the tenor, Nozzari, coming on at the back of the great stage, attacked a note falsely, the waters were let loose. "I recall," observes Stendhal, "the sudden cry of the pit, and its joy at having a pretext for hissing. A menagerie of roaring lions released from their cage—Æolus unchaining the winds in fury—nothing can give an idea, even an imperfect one, of the rage of a Neapolitan public offended by a false note, and finding good cause to satisfy an old hate." This was not all. "Nozzari's air," continues Stendhal, "was followed by the appearance of a number of bards, who came to excite the martial ardour of the Scottish warriors. Rossini had had the idea to struggle with the three orchestras of Don Giovanni's ball; he had divided his musical scene into two parts—that is to say, the chorus of bards, and the military march accompanied by trumpets, which, after being heard separately, were brought together. The day (October 4, 1819) was a gala day; the theatre was illuminated, the court was not present, and nothing restrained the gaiety of the young officers, who, having been drinking freely to the health of the king, occupied their privileged places in the parterre. One of these gentlemen, at the first sound of the trumpets, began imitating with his cane the noise of a galloping horse. The public seized the idea, and in an instant the parterre was full of fifteen hundred schoolboys doing the same thing with all their might." Stendhal adds of Rossini, "il se trouva mal," and Azevedo interprets the remark as "fainting," apparently in order to deny it on the master's own authority, but, as he well says, "one might faint for less without being accused of weakness." All through the first and second acts this scandal went on, but when Mdle. Colbrand, the prima donna, came forward to sing the final rondo, the house listened, applauded, and, with true Italian caprice, ended by demanding that Rossini should come before the curtain. At that moment, the master was in Mdle. Colbrand's box, complimenting the lady upon her singing, and there came Signor Gioja, secretary to the superintendent of theatres, magisterially ordering Rossini to obey the summons of the public. Rossini, as may be supposed, was in no very good humour. The public had annoyed him, and Signor Gioja came as their mouthpiece and representative. What did Rossini do thereupon but give the functionary a blow that nearly knocked him off his feet, hurry downstairs, jump into a waiting carriage, and start for Milan. Stendhal says that on the journey and at Milan the master reported "La Donna del Lago" as having been praised to the skies, and his latest English biographer, Mr. Sutherland Edwards, repeats the story, which, we are bound to say, is not out of harmony with the spirit of grim humour Rossini loved to indulge. On the other hand, M. Azevedo remarks: "We know not from whom Stendhal and his friends obtained this information; but we are sure, having evidence worthy of all belief, that, on arriving in Rome, the composer answered an acquaintance who had asked about the new work, 'You might have heard it hissed here.'"

At the second performance the Neapolitans were in better temper, and, conscious of having perpetrated an injustice, applauded "La Donna del Lago" as much as, on the previous night, they had hooted it. Before dismissing the story of this opera let us add that it fairly represents the very great reforms Rossini had wrought in Italian lyric drama, little by little, as his own ideas expanded and as a singularly prejudiced and violent public were ready to receive them. In "La Donna del Lago" we have a chorus which is necessary to the dramatic ensemble, and plays a distinct part in its working. We have recitatives accompanied by the orchestra, not with mere chords, but independent motivi intended to assist the expression; we have an enlarged orchestra, a military band on the stage, the bass voice given a foremost position, and the musical ensemble developed to an extent altogether unknown in Italy. To say that German opera had anticipated all these things is to take but little from the credit due to Rossini. Had he been no more than a flippant pleasure-lover, with a talent for improvisation, he would have contented himself with writing the music his countrymen loved and running no risk. Instead of this, he was always making experiments more or less dangerous in presence of so conservative and inflammatory a public, and he as much deserves the credit of an operatic reformer as any man to whom that distinction is accorded.

Rossini's business in Milan was to write "Bianca e Faliero"—libretto by Romani. For this he received £100. The new opera, first represented on December 4, 1819, was not an unqualified success, for the reason that Rossini had worked into it much of his old music and indulged largely in more or less precise reminiscences of himself. This the Milanese resented, and took up a severe attitude. Yet "Bianca e Faliero" was played for six months! and the explanation of facts so contradictory indicates the enormous influence Rossini could wield at will over his countrymen. In the opera was a duet for female voices which took the public taste, and also a quartet—the only number specially written, according to Stendhal—which drove them wild with delight. The Milanese were never tired of the quartet, and it is a fact almost inexplicable to less ardent natures, that for six months they heard this music twice every night—once in the opera and again in a ballet. There is, perhaps, no other case on record of a lyric drama, objectionable as a whole, being kept on the stage during half a year by a single piece. Rossini, we may here add, subsequently transferred both the duet and quartet to the second act of "La Donna del Lago." From Milan the master hastened back to Naples, where the composition of "Maometto Secondi," for the Carnival of 1820, awaited him. The libretto of this opera was written by the Duke of Ventignano, a noble personage whose passion for stage-writing exceeded his ability. Still, he was a duke, and his position enabled him to contend against even a worse misfortune—that of being credited with the "evil eye." Rossini might have been supposed free from this curious superstition of his countrymen, but it is on record that Barbaja had great difficulty in persuading him to collaborate with the unfortunate nobleman. The master consented at last, and while writing with one hand kept the fingers of the other on the table in the position which is supposed to be preventive of mischief. M. Azevedo, after stating these strange particulars, adds: "All the acquaintances which Rossini then had in the beautiful Parthenope—and they were very numerous, we may be sure—wished to see the master working in his guarded attitude. He received quietly the long procession of the curious, ceaselessly using the pen with the right hand and making the horns with the left. He gave no respite to this left hand save when composing ritornelli and other passages of purely instrumental music, with which the poetry of the suspected jettatore had nothing to do. To what excess the fear of the 'evil eye' can be carried, and how human weakness finds its place even in the greatest things! Who could suspect, in hearing 'Maometto,' that grand score, where antique Christian sentiment struggles with the savage heroism of Mussulmans, producing one of the finest contrasts of dramatic music in its highest development—who could suspect that this work was composed by a trembling man making horns with his fingers to conjure away the effects of an evil eye?"

In July, 1820, a revolution broke out in Naples, and the king fled from his capital. To celebrate this event Rossini composed music for or adapted something previously written to the words of a patriotic hymn, and, having done this, considered his duty to the new government performed. The authorities, however, were not of this mind. Every man had to enrol himself in the National Guard, and Rossini, who once evaded the conscription, found all his efforts to keep out of the ranks of war useless on this occasion. He proved an indifferent soldier. Although his moustaches were permitted to grow, he could not even give himself a martial air, while his awkwardness, real or feigned, was such that after nine days of drill the chiefs permitted him to retire. This we must regard as fortunate, because the Austrians came down upon the Neapolitans in a little while, and so effectually frightened them that it is said their infantry, running from the field of battle, reached Naples before the cavalry. Violent exercise of this sort would have been out of all harmony with the rules of Rossini's life, if, indeed, his career had not come to a sudden end by a pursuing bullet. The rest of the year 1820 was spent in unaccustomed idleness, but the Carnival of 1821 saw the master at Rome, where he produced "Matilda di Shabron," for the banker Torlonia, who had opened the Tordinone Theatre under the name of Teatro Apollo. The production of this work, which has been called "more brilliant than dramatic," led to a struggle between Rossini's admirers and those of the school he had supplanted. Hisses and applause struggled for mastery, and, after the performance, a "free fight" in the streets left the superiority of physical force with the Rossinists by way of climax to their victory in the house. The chef d'orchestre, strange to say, was no other than Paganini. How this came about we are told in the following terms:—

"When at Rome, Rossini regularly had a little repast at two o'clock in the morning, cutlets and Orvieto wine being its principal features. Paganini, who loved the master, and felt not the least antipathy towards cutlets and Orvieto wine, profited by the convenience of the hour to look in in passing, and shake his friend by the hand. Touched by this action of the great virtuoso, and by the punctuality of his visits, Rossini never failed to invite him to partake of supper without ceremony, and Paganini, equally without ceremony, never failed to accept. Once, however, he found Rossini in a contrary mood. Bosso, the chef d'orchestre of the Apollo, had fallen ill, and this untoward event would retard the first performance of 'Matilda di Shabron' at a time when the composer was expected at Naples. What was to be done? Friendship, cutlets, Orvieto wine, all joined to move the illustrious violinist, who, as a rule, was not conspicuous for feeling. Without saying a word to Rossini, he sought the impresario of the theatre, and promised to conduct the first three performances of 'Matilda.' He would only go to the last rehearsal; but then he placed himself at the desk, and conducted, at first sight, in an admirable manner."

On again reaching Naples, Rossini found the theatres there in difficulty. Political events had done them great harm, and, as the public gaming-tables which Barbaja farmed had been suppressed, that enterprising speculator looked round for another field of operations. Doing this he came to a bold resolve—he would procure a new opera from Rossini, and produce it in the Austrian capital with the best members of his company. Thus "Zelmira" came into being, the libretto, taken from a tragedy by Belloy, having Tottola as its author. "Zelmira" was performed at Naples on several occasions before the troupe left for Vienna, but Rossini took formal leave of the southern city with a cantata, "La Riconoscenza," specially written for that purpose. The day following (December 28, 1821) he started from Naples to Bologna, and there married Isabella Colbrand, the artist who had "created" the principal part in all, or nearly all, his operas written for Barbaja. The nuptials took place in the private chapel of Cardinal Oppizoni, Archbishop of Bologna, and among the witnesses were Rossini's parents, as well as the chief interpreters of his works, Nozzari, Davide and Ambrosi. Twenty days were spent in the country, and then the wedded pair started for Vienna.

Rossini met with a hearty welcome in the Austrian capital. The charm of his music had gone before him, and amateurs were ready to receive him with open arms. "The calm Germans," we read, "seemed to transform themselves into passionate Italians when celebrating the advent of the great composer. Sere-nades, cheers, recalls at the theatre, public manifestations of every kind, receptions at the court and at the houses of distinguished personages, with all the honours due to genius, marked the stay of the master in the Austrian capital." Readers of musical literature know how bitterly this was resented by a section of Viennese musicians and amateurs, having neither perception of, nor sympathy with, anything outside the form of art they most affected. The sin of the multitude was to them as the sin of the Israelites who bowed down and worshipped the gods of their heathen neighbours. No words were too fierce to characterise it, and none too hard to fling at the genial Italian, who for years past had been doing his best to form Italian taste on a model as like that affected by Germans as the temperament of his countrymen would allow. All this, however, did Rossini more good than harm. The public were prepared to admire him in any case, and when he was abused they admired him more than ever.

"Zelmira" having been performed with immense success, a Rossinian fever set in and raged unchecked. "Matilda di Shabron," "Elisabetta," "La Gazza Ladra," and "Ricciardo e Zoraide" followed each other in rapid succession, and at the moment, intoxicated by popular adulation, Rossini dreamed of becoming the Napoleon of his craft—giving laws to the world of opera. He visited Beethoven during his stay in Vienna, Carpani introducing him, but the interview must have been the reverse of satisfactory on both sides. Neither properly understood the other, though Rossini admired the great symphonist, and Beethoven held the popular Italian in respect as "a man of talent" and "a very melodious composer." It is said that the Italian master was quite disconcerted by Beethoven and his surroundings—the unkempt figure of the deaf giant, the miserable room, the litter, dirt and disorder.

His work in the Austrian capital done, Rossini returned to Bologna, intending to write no more for Italian theatres, but to make conquests farther afield. In this mood he received an invitation from the manager of the Venice Fenice to compose an opera for the Carnival season. Without absolutely refusing, he took steps which he thought would lead to the same end, by demanding the sum of £200—an amount of unexampled largeness. To the master's surprise his terms were accepted, and Rossini found himself bound to add one more work to his Italian repertory. With this new obligation resting upon him he proceeded to Verona, at the invitation of Prince Metternich, and was treated with high distinction by the sovereigns and plenipotentiaries there sitting in congress. To celebrate the occasion he produced several cantatas, which were performed with all imaginable splendour and solemnity as part of the official rejoicings. From Verona he travelled to Venice, and there completed "Semiramide," his last and greatest Italian opera, of which he said, "It is the only one written at leisure. My contract gave me forty days"; adding, "But I did not occupy forty days in writing it." Before the production of this work its composer again came in contact with some, at least, of the mightinesses he had left at Verona. The Emperors of Austria and Russia halted at Venice on their way home, and Rossini conducted two concerts given in the palace. At one of these their majesties requested the master to sing. He did so, choosing the cavatina in "Figaro," whereupon both monarchs smiled their thanks. The Russian added a diamond ring; the Austrian thought a smile sufficient.

"Semiramide" was produced at the Fenice on February 3, 1823, the title rôle being taken by Signora Rossini-Colbrand, Arsace by Signora Mariani, Assur by Signor Galli, Oroë by Signor Mariani, and Idreno by the English tenor, Mr. Sinclair, who had more to do, including a couple of airs, than the Idrenos of the present day. Strange as it may seem to us now, "Semiramide" met with a moderate reception. It appears to have been too "heavy"—that is, too fully developed—for Venetian taste. The large choruses and extended ensembles were far away from the ideal opera of the City of the Doges; and what certain amateurs now scoff at as trivial or mere noise was resented as too weighty and far too "German." Rossini keenly felt the treatment of a work on which he had rested great hopes, as he had lavished all in skill, and it determined him never again to compose for Italian audiences.

After the production of "Semiramide," Rossini and his wife returned to Bologna, and there they received the offer of an engagement at the King's Theatre, London, then under the management, not of Mr. Ebers, as has been stated, but of Mr. Benelli. The arrangements were that Rossini should set to music and produce an opera entitled "La Figlia dell' Aria," in return for which he was to receive £240; the services of his wife as prima donna being also secured. With this new campaign in view, the master left Bologna, and arrived in Paris on November 9, 1823. Not due in London for some weeks, Rossini had ample time to accept the hospitalities of the French capital, which were offered to him without stint. Attending a representation of his "Barbiere," he was led upon the stage amid enthusiastic acclamations; and later in the evening a band of wind instruments gave him a serenade. Voices were, of course, heard in opposition, but these only stimulated enthusiasm. Finally, a banquet was held in honour of the composer, at which a remarkable company assisted. Rossini sat between Madame Pasta and Mdle. Mars; Madame Rossini had as her neighbours Lesueur and Mdle. Georges; and at the same table were Boïeldieu, Hérold, Garcia, Martin, Panseron, Horace Vernet, Bonjour, and Auber—truly a noble gathering, in itself a tribute to the illustrious guest. The "flow of soul" seems to have been worthy the occasion and those who took part in it. Talma read a French translation of a sonnet by Biagioli, entitled "La Nascita del gran Rossini"; Lafond persisted in ennobling the distinguished stranger by calling him "M. de Rossini"; Lesueur proposed his health, saying, "His ardent genius has opened a new route, and marks a new epoch in musical art"; and then everybody proceeded to toast everybody else—Lesueur proposing Gluck, Martin Grétry, Rossini Mozart, Mehul Boïeldieu, Hérold Paisiello, Auber Cimarosa, and so on. The result was that Scribe and Mazères brought out a one-act vaudeville at the Gymnase, on November 29, and called it "Rossini à Paris, ou le Grand Dîner." The master went to see it, and came away saying, "If that is the national music, I have only to pack my trunks. I could not succeed in that kind of thing." Nevertheless, it pleased the anti-Rossinians in the small way which suited them. A little later Rossini was elected a foreign associate of the Academy—it is said, by the painters and architects, against the votes of the musicians—and on December 7 he quitted Paris on his way to London, after directing a public concert for the benefit of Panseron, who wished to relieve a conscript brother from military service and could not otherwise obtain the means. The master had then made up his mind to return. He shrewdly appreciated the position open to him in the French capital, and estimated at their full value the overtures of M. de Lauriston, minister of the King's household. Those overtures, implying, as they did, the removal of Paër from his place at the Italiens, he was too magnanimous to accept, and, at the same time, far too sagacious to overlook the fact that whenever he chose to take up his residence in Paris the ball would be under his foot.

"ELIJAH"

A COMPARISON OF THE ORIGINAL AND REVISED SCORES

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. 10—The Recitative, "As God the Lord," with which this number begins, was, like the preceding chorus, almost entirely rewritten. True, the opening bars for the voice are the same in both versions, but in the original the scoring is for horns and trombones, not, as now, for strings. The strings enter at the words, "Three years this day fulfilled," and thence the recitative runs thus:—

Brass.

The rest of the introduction must be quoted in full to exhibit all its variation from the printed score:—

Clars. & Bassoons. Horn. cres.
Strings.

pp Vlns.

The first three bars of this passage are given note for note, with the same disposition of instruments, at the entrance of the voice; and, at the words "O show this people," we come upon further variation:—

Wind.

me, O hear me, Lord, and an - swer

Thence to the end, hardly a trace of the air as it is now known to us can be discovered:—

me, and show this peo - ple that Thou art

Lord God, that Thou art Lord God, and let their hearts a - gain be turn - ed, and let their hearts a - gain be turn - ed, O

Lord, O Lord, and let their hearts

a - gain be turn - ed.

It should be pointed out that the frequent arpeggios are an obvious anticipation of those in the succeeding quartet, "Cast thy burden."

No. 15—Quartet, "Cast thy burden." The original version of this quartet differed materially, words and music, from that now used. As the orchestral accompaniment is the same in both cases, it will suffice to quote the vocal parts from the MS. in order to show the extent and character of the changes made:—

Più Adagio.

Re - gard Thy ser - vant's pray'r While an - gels bow be -

- fore Thee, And worlds around Thy throne, In strains of praise a -

- dore Thee, O help him in his need, Thy gracious ear ac -

- cord, Je - ho - vah, Sa - ba - oth, Cre - a - tor, God and Lord.

No. 16—Recitative and Chorus, "O Thou who makest." Up to the fifteenth bar of the chorus, "The fire descends from Heaven," Mendelssohn contented himself with a very trifling alteration. The conspicuous phrase—which is now, except when first heard, given in vocal harmony, was originally a solo in every case. But at bar 15, the composer interpolated no fewer than ten bars, including the imitative passage beginning—which is now a conspicuous feature of the number. A change was made also in the impressive phrases immediately leading to the choral. At first they stood thus:—

The flames con - sume his off' - ring.

a - do - ring, a - do - ring,

The choral itself opened as follows—

The Lord is God, the Lord is God, He is the Lord our God, A - lone He is God, but thence to the end we have it now as originally written.

No. 17—Air, "Is not His word like a fire?" This number does not appear in the MS., nor, at the time when the copy was made in Germany, did it form part of the oratorio, "The fire descends from Heaven" and "Woe unto them" being numbered consecutively. We must conclude, therefore, that "Is not His word?" was an idea of the composer conceived and carried out between the copying of his score and—as the words occur in the Birmingham programme—its first performance.

No. 18—Arioso, "Woe unto them that forsake Him."—No change.

No. 19—Recitative and Chorus, "O man of God, help thy people." The recitative for Obadiah, with which this number opens, was added after the production of the oratorio, as it is not found in the MS., nor does the text appear in the Birmingham book of words. Passing on, no change is noticed till we reach the first choral echo of Elijah's prayer, "Open the Heavens," which was originally accompanied, as was the following similar passage, by three trombones. In the Prophet's second solo, "When the heavens are closed up," we find a noteworthy alteration. The original setting of "Yet if they pray," &c., was as subjoined:—

Yet if they pray and con - fess, con - fess Thy name,

Turn from their sins when Thou dost af - flict them,

turn from their sins when Thou dost af - flict them.

It may also be observed that at the response of the Youth, "No, there is nothing," Mendelssohn originally made his orchestra burst in with seeming petulance before the conclusion of the answer, and a half-bar before the Prophet again speaks. This half-bar of accompaniment he, with fine taste, removed. The impassioned ascent of the solo voice to F on the words "Be not silent unto me" is also an afterthought, the passage standing thus in the MS.:—

No. 20—Chorus, "Thanks be to God." One would like to know that this masterpiece of choral effect, this gigantic inspiration, came from the pen of the composer as we now have it. The fact is so. As the chorus stands in the MS. it stands in the printed score, not a note having been touched.

THE very large portion of the public interested in musical education will learn with pleasure that Dr. John Stainer, the well-known organist at St. Paul's, and late Principal of the Training School for Music, South Kensington, has been appointed by the President of the Council Inspector of Music in the Training Colleges and Elementary Schools of the Kingdom. This important post, which Dr. Stainer will assume at the beginning of the coming year, is at present occupied by Dr. Hullah, who after a long and energetic career which has nobly identified his name with musical progress in this country, will then retire on a well-earned pension. In the present phase of the question of musical education in Great Britain, the appointment of Dr. Hullah's successor was a matter of some consequence. Names have been mentioned which, had they been selected, would have been, any one of them, a pledge that the office of Inspector of Music would have been worthily filled. No one, however, will be inclined to impugn the final judgment of the Council. Dr. Stainer enjoys one advantage, less common in the past than it is likely to be in our day and in the future. He is not only a Doctor in the faculty of Music, but a graduate in Arts in the University of Oxford. He thus represents a new and pleasing feature in the musical profession—the raising of the status of the professor. Such an advantage would be of little account were it merely a question of ordinary social standing as decreed by so-called society. The question of status is much more a matter of widening the views of the profession generally. Music, as we all know, is made only by music. No cultivation that is not musical, can be more than a subsidiary aid to the musician. Still it is precisely in questions of musical education where that breadth of view which general cultivation should engender, is most needful. Musical cultivation alone has a tendency to breed superstitions, as well as the idea that whatever is established is best, whether it be a system of notation or an artistic reputation. That Inspectors of Music may reasonably, in some cases, not be musically educated, is from the fact that if they have fads of their own they are not likely to be musical fads, and everything will gain a fair hearing. But, alas! as Dr. Hullah is never weary of telling us, the great point for inspectors of elementary schools is not simply to know whether the singing is more or less insufferable in intonation, but whether a particular singer is singing sol or fa. To have this little but indispensable knowledge is the reward only of long training from our youth upwards. As a theorist and practical musician Dr. Stainer's abilities are so well known, that it is only in virtue of his reputation for liberal-mindedness that we can venture to draw attention to his recent appointment as a subject of public congratulation. It would be an affected reticence on our part to pass over in Dr. Stainer's appointment the possibility that it may be distantly connected with the proposed Royal College of Music—a designed institution which has in some sense sprung from the South Kensington Schools. If it be so, we are quite sure, for one thing, that the appointment was unsolicited by Dr. Stainer; and for the rest, it is of good augury that from elementary teaching upwards the illustrious movers of the proposed Conservatorium are using their influence to secure the best ability, and will in unanimity work for the radical reform of musical education in this country. Their crowning effort must be to secure the formal intervention of the State in subsidising not only the College, but a national lyric theatre, without which the native art is not likely to rise above successful imitation, and for the simple reason that in all countries there have been only two great popular nurseries of the musical art—the Church and the theatre. In England, the second, from a musical point of view, has never existed; and the first, from the nature of our ritual, is always limited in scope and tendency.

AMONG the musical revivals of the day, that of the vocal compositions, and more especially the "ballads" for one voice, with pianoforte accompaniment, of Karl Loewe, is undoubtedly one of the most interesting. After being disregarded and almost forgotten during a number of years, these highly characteristic productions have reappeared of late with increasing frequency in German concert programmes. A "Loewe-Verein" has, moreover, been formed some six months ago at Berlin for the purpose of rescuing from oblivion the masterpieces of this genial composer, and, to judge from the interest which the musical public is manifesting in the performances of this society, the success of its efforts seems already assured. Loewe occupies an almost unique position as a composer of the German Ballade. Unlike the Lied, which is essentially lyrical, the Ballade combines in itself something of the three leading elements distinguished in poetry, viz., the epic, the dramatic, and the lyrical; while for its subject matter it takes special delight in the supernatural and the mysterious. With a singular dramatic fire and pathos Loewe united a power of "local colouring" for which, as applied to the miniature framework of the ballad, he is probably unsurpassed. His "ballads," indeed, are dramatic "pictures in little," where the pianoforte performs the part allotted to a modern operatic orchestra in illustrating the situation or the psychological aspects of the subject. The speedy popularity gained by his compositions some fifty years ago, both in Germany and elsewhere, was, however, owing as much to the composer's eminent gift of interpreting them as to their own intrinsic merits. Karl Loewe as a concert or drawing-room-singer was a celebrity much sought after in those days. People were wont to smile through their tears, or experience an agreeable sensation of terror in listening to his powerful declamation, and watching the ever-changing expression of his features. There was an artistic earnestness and enthusiasm underlying all his performances which, the writer has been frequently assured by earwitnesses, rendered each particular one an inspired effort of creative genius. Hence, not unnaturally, there were few singers in his own day who cared to rival the composer in the interpretation of his songs, and when he grew old (he died in 1869, at the age of seventy-three) Loewe, as a composer, found himself superseded, almost forgotten. The flood of Schubert and Schumann's exquisite lyrics had swept across the land, and the more or less sentimental Lied, which everybody sang, had pushed aside for a time, the vigorous and psychologically interesting Ballade of Loewe, which required a singer and a musician like himself to render justice to it. But their turn seems to have come once more, and their undoubtedly great merits are likely to meet with the universal recognition which is their due. Man kann es auch anders machen ("the thing can be done in a different way, too") Loewe had drily observed to a friend who had expressed a doubt as to the wisdom of the former in undertaking to set to music Goethe's "Erlkönig," after Schubert's already celebrated setting of the same poem. As a matter of fact, Loewe's "Erlkönig" may well bear comparison with Schubert's immortal composition. It is, however, "done in a different way"; and unlike anything else in the entire range of German song are his numerous other "ballads," among which we will only mention "Elwershöh," "Der Heinrich," "Der Mutter Geist," as typical of their class. The present revival in Germany of these remarkable compositions adds an interesting feature to concert performances, where they will probably ere long also be met with in this country.

OUR readers may remember that some time ago we drew attention to an advertisement for a turnkey at a prison, who must possess a knowledge of music, and also to one for a gardener who could sing, and a waitress who would be called upon to accompany at the pianoforte. These advertisements did not announce in what manner the artistic talents of those who were chosen to fill the vacant situations were to be utilised; and therefore we were left to imagine that the turnkey might be required to sing his prisoners to sleep, the gardener to take part in a domestic choir, and the waitress to accompany the after-dinner songs of those who frequented the restaurant where she was employed. But our "Foreign Notes" last month convey to us a piece of information which definitely proves not only the value of an aptitude, at least, for music in working men, but how this faculty is to be made to help them in their daily avocations. In the Epoca of Madrid we are told that Government having forbidden the opening of the Royal Theatre until certain alterations of a precautionary nature in case of fire had been made, "workmen with a taste for music were selected, and certain of the band were employed to stimulate their labours with a brisk March. When the orchestra had struck their last chord, and the workmen their last blow, the Government inspectors on their re-entry were received to the strains of the March from 'Le Prophète.'" Now we all know how soldiers, when they become wearied on a march receive renewed vigour from the inspiring strains of the regimental band; and even in a walking-match we have seen men apparently ready to drop from exhaustion suddenly assume an elastic step, and brace themselves up to increased exertion, merely because the music recommences, after a brief rest. Let working men, then, cultivate music, for we have brought forward evidence that, so far from taking them away from work, it will bring work to them. It is true that in England we do not yet build houses to the accompaniment of a "brisk March"; but there may be a good time coming, and it is as well to be prepared.

A NEW edition of Hamilton's well-known "Dictionary of Musical Terms," lately forwarded to us from Messrs. Cocks and Co., cannot but make artists reflect upon the absurdity of covering pages of music with directions as to how a performer is to interpret passages which we should imagine sufficiently speak for themselves. Undoubtedly the speed, and even the general character of a composition, should be indicated at the commencement by the words Adagio, Andante, Allegro, Presto, &c.; but nothing can be more ridiculous than the use of such terms in the course of the piece as Lusingando, Amoroso, Con timidezza, Con dolore, Piangendo, &c. When Beethoven was asked the time of some of the movements of his Symphonies, the composer replied that any person who found it necessary to put such a question ought not to conduct or play his works; and if this is true as to the time, it need scarcely be said that there is still greater reason why it should be true as to the feeling of the music. If we search through Beethoven's Sonatas we shall find no indication that one passage is to be played "with timidity," another "with sadness," and a third "with zeal," although in the book above-mentioned all these directions appear, with hundreds of others which are constantly scattered about in modern compositions. The truth is that as the worth of our music has decreased, the words showing us how it is to be performed have increased; so that the mind, instead of being led to the study of form and development, is intent upon giving sudden and exaggerated "effects" to isolated passages. A professor was once asked by his pupil the signification of the word "Lusingando," and being told that it meant "flatteringly," he was immediately requested to illustrate how the eight bars thus marked would be played, first in the usual manner, and afterwards "flatteringly." We do not know whether this enquiring student consciously or unconsciously placed her master in a somewhat awkward position.

IN our remarks upon the English edition of Jahn's "Mozart," just published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., we drew attention to the fact that nearly all the "monumental" biographies of the great masters of music have, till now, remained sealed books to the mass of English readers. We also interpreted this state of things as indicating not so much lack of enterprise, as want of interest among the public. Wherever, in such a keenly competitive land as ours, there are indications of a demand, provision for supply cannot fail to be made. Having these facts before us, we see matter for twofold congratulation in the appearance of Jahn's "Mozart" and kindred works. We are glad, first of all, that English amateurs can go to the best authorities; and, next, that the provision of those authorities in the vernacular affords proof of growing interest in musical men and things. The publishers of "Mozart" will soon give occasion for a renewed expression of this feeling, since it is their intention to issue an English edition of Spitta's "Bach"—a work of even greater research and larger dimensions than Jahn's. It will appear in three volumes—the first in February next, the second and third as soon after as practicable. We anticipate for this biography a special welcome, not only because Bach's name is held here in reverence, and his genius appreciated not less than in Germany, but because such biographies as are now accessible contain little better than meagre and unsatisfactory details concerning the personal life and artistic career of a man whom we would fain know intimately. Spitta, as students of musical literature are aware, has exhausted his subject, sparing neither time nor labour to that end. What there is to say of Bach, in the domain of biography, he has said once for all; and English musicians will rejoice that such a store of information and such a source of interest is about to be placed within their reach.

THE question of abolishing an orchestra altogether at a theatre not devoted to opera has often been debated; and it seems probable that in the course of time some unflinching reformer may boldly hazard this step, at least as an experiment. Meanwhile, however, it is evident that many attempts will be made to compromise the matter with the public, and in such a transition time it becomes somewhat amusing to note the changes which are gradually being effected at various theatres in the metropolis. At one establishment announcements were made that selections from the works of the best composers only would be performed during the evening, and this, of course, supposing the existence of an orchestra, was a step in the right direction. At another theatre the performers were entirely removed from the sight of the audience; but the conventional theatrical programme was heard through a grating; and at a third the players were presumed to be hidden, yet the slide of a trombone made its appearance at certain intervals, and a bow, seemingly guided by no human skill, moved continually over the strings of a violoncello. Now a moment's thought must convince us that the first-mentioned of these innovations is the only one which met the question, for practically the lessee decided that there should be an orchestra, but that the music should be good. On the other side we have really at present had no opportunity of fairly judging the result. Nobody has said that the orchestra at a theatre should be out of sight, but many have asserted that it should not be there at all. Wagner, who conveys his stream of sound by unseen means to amalgamate with his voices, thinks only as an operatic composer, and we believe that he is right; but to apply this theory to a non-operatic theatre is positive nonsense. If it is good for orchestral performers to be heard at a theatre it is good for them to be seen; but we should be glad if somebody would try the effect of doing without them altogether.

WHEN the dissolution of the Sacred Harmonic Society was finally resolved upon, apart from the regret that an Association which had done so much for the spread of sacred art in England should cease to exist, a widely-spread desire was manifested that the valuable musical library of the Society should not only be preserved intact, but that some arrangement should be made by which so unique a collection might permanently remain in this country. We are happy to say that both these wishes have been fulfilled, the library having been secured for the Royal College of Music.

M. GOUNOD ON MOZART'S "DON GIOVANNI."

The following translation of a paper read by M. Gounod at the recent Annual Séance of the Institut de France, in Paris, will doubtless be of interest to our readers:—

"It was in the month of January of the year 1832. In the admirable artistic troupe which at that period formed the personnel of the Théâtre-Italien, shone forth the ever-illustrious names of a Malibran, a Grisi, a Rubini, a Lablache, a Tamburini, and a host of others, constituting an ensemble rarely met with on the lyrical stage. I was then thirteen and a half years of age. I had completed my studies at the Lycée Saint-Louis, and had had the honour (for childhood also has such) to take part in the famous college banquet known there as Saint-Charlemagne—an honour which brought in its train, as a matter of course, one of those special farewell treats, called in college phrase sorties de faveur. I was passionately fond of music, and my mother, being well aware that no reward for my labours could afford me greater pleasure, informed me that she intended, that evening to take me to hear 'Don Giovanni' at the Italian. This announcement caused me such a thrill of happiness that I forgot eating and drinking over the matter; noticing which, my mother added, 'You must understand, if you do not eat you will not go to the theatre!' Under a threat of this description I should have been capable of heroically devouring anything they set before me. At any rate, I partook of dinner with exemplary obedience, and at length we found ourselves, my mother and I, on the way to the Promised Land! I felt as though I were about to penetrate into a sanctuary.

"We had scarcely entered the house when I was seized by a kind of holy fear, as upon the approach of some grand and awful mystery. I experienced, with an emotion confused and hitherto unknown to me, at once a feeling of anticipation and a dread of that which was about to pass before my eyes. We were in a box in the fourth rank. The fashionable resources of my mother, who was obliged to work in order to contribute to the education of her children, were not such as to enable us to aspire to a more expensive seat. However, as we had arrived in good time, we had obtained front places by right of first-comers. Although we had to wait a considerable time for the commencement of the performance, there was much to engage my attention meanwhile. The interior of the house, the chandelier—all the splendid surroundings, in short, produced already a dazzling effect upon me. At last the orthodox three raps are heard, the conductor raises his bow, a profound silence reigns in the house, and the overture commences.

"I refrain from describing what my feelings were from the moment the first chords were struck of this sublime and terrible prologue. And, indeed, how could I, when even now, after fifty years of an ever-increasing admiration, my heart beats more quickly in thinking of it, and my hand trembles in writing about it? All that I remember is that I fancied some divine being was speaking to me; I fell into a kind of painfully delicious trance, and, half stifled with emotion, 'Mamma,' I exclaimed, 'this is the true music!' I was literally beside myself. Oh, divine Mozart! hast thou, then, reclined on the bosom of infinite Beauty, as once did the beloved disciple on that of the Saviour, there to imbibe entire streams of that incomparable grace which distinguishes the great privileged ones? Have those words been pronounced over thy cradle too, which descended from on high upon the transfigured God-Man: 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased'? . . . For the bounteous Heaven had given thee everything—grace and power, abundance and self-restraint, spontaneous brilliancy and tender warmth, in that perfectly even measure which constitutes the irresistible power of the enchanter, and which has rendered thee the musician par excellence, the first, nay the only one—Mozart! . . .

"Don Juan! An entire human world! A gentle woman outraged and turned revengeful; a trembling daughter bending over the corpse of her assassinated parent; a grand seigneur libertine even to cynicism, and daring even to injure in the face of Divine justice; a wife rejected and treated with contempt; a peasant-girl fascinated by gallantry; a servile valet, frivolous and superstitious; finally, the figure of the statue of the Commendatore whose terrible accents freeze our very blood—Mozart has excelled in all this, and the sublime seems to come to him as readily as the comic. Mozart said of 'Don Juan' that he had composed it for himself and two or three friends. Profound words these, under the guise of a modest ambition! Intimate relationship is the quintessence of life, the tabernacle of all great conceptions—friendship, love, genius (that special form of ecstasy)—it brings us under the immediate influence of the Divine. Thus posterity has multiplied the two or three friends of 'Don Juan' as the stars of heaven and the sands of the ocean. Ah, young people, ye who reject and dread the teachings of the masters as a humiliating yoke to your timid individuality, which yet you are ready to give in tow of the first charlatan that crosses your path—I know you, and I am acquainted with your aims. It is effect you aim at, as some aim at being witty. It is not the art which you possess, it is your own self. You are far less anxious to be than you are to appear. You think of yourselves, and you seek yourselves with an eagerness which is but the nightmare of your own success. . . . For genius, like love, consists above all in abnegation. The laws of the Beautiful and those of the Good are the same; united in their absolute essence, the Good and the Beautiful are not distinguishable, as they are to us, except by their respective properties and their special relations to the diverse faculties of our understanding, wherein their united ray becomes divided as it were in an intellectual

There is no need to discuss these things at the present moment. The first will be found noticed under the head of Crystal Palace Concerts, while the second received attention when brought out in the Midland town. There remains, consequently, only to record the fact of performance, and to indicate its nature and results. That the Wagner prelude was well executed goes without saying, Herr Richter's skill and his enthusiasm in the cause of such music being a sufficient guarantee. It is no less a matter of confident assumption that the piece was heard with intense interest, if not, in many cases, with much sympathy. Widely different opinions have been expressed upon its merits by persons occupying various standpoints, like the knights who quarrelled about the shield; but the curiosity with which it was heard stood as high among the opponents as among the supporters of Wagner's theory. As much may be said regarding admiration of the performance. Mr. Stanford's work made an impression no less lively than at Birmingham, nor did those who heard it for the second time discover reason to modify their favourable opinion of music which, though modern in character, is, as much animated by a classic spirit as shaped upon classic forms. The composer was twice recalled, and the audience demanded and obtained a repetition of the pretty Intermezzo. They evidently thought the entire work "indisputably clever and interesting, if not also very pleasing," which is as far as the official analyst consented to praise this English music. Not less evidently, they went a good way beyond the official analyst, and they were right. The programme also contained the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" in F, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony—sufficient contrast in good sooth.

The second concert offered only one novelty—Brahms's pianoforte Concerto in B flat, and as that had been previously given at the Crystal Palace, our readers are referred to another column for an estimate of its merits and defects. This, nevertheless, is the place to say that the Concerto, admirably performed though it was, obtained a reception by no means warm. The people listened without enthusiasm, and applauded apparently for no other object than to encourage those who strove to place the work before them in an adequate manner. Mr. Dannreuther, as the soloist—if, indeed, the pianoforte-player be a soloist here—found his task specially ungrateful. It was difficult, and it led to nothing for which a pianist usually labours when taking part in a Concerto. Besides the composition of Brahms, the programme contained Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, the overture to "Euryanthe," the Prelude to the third Act of "Die Meistersinger," and the Prelude and Finale of "Tristan und Isolde." These are all so familiar at the Richter Concerts, that it will suffice now to record the fact of a successful performance, in which, however, there were degrees of merit. The Weber Overture had least justice done to it, but the Wagner music was played with jealous care. At both concerts Herr Richter was loudly applauded, the added emphasis of his reception arising, no doubt, from a sense of the noble generosity which made him prefer others to himself, and add to his own sacrifices that those of his subordinates might be lessened.

MR. GEAUSSENT'S CHOIR.

THE sudden advent of this Society last season from the comparative obscurity of a south-eastern suburb, and the unexpected merit of its performances, naturally led to pleasurable anticipation of future doings. Despite a miserable evening, therefore, many amateurs and connoisseurs attended the Concert given in St. James's Hall on the 23rd ult. The programme on this occasion could not be charged with lacking variety, and ranged "from grave to gay, from lively to severe" in the most eccentric fashion; being, moreover, comprehensive enough to include a church Cantata by Bach, and the last new "royalty" song. Mr. Geaussen, we presume, knows what he is about, and we shall not arraign his policy; indeed, we cheerfully credit him with a longing for the time when, well established as a public entertainer, he may act more independently of what is supposed to be the average taste.

Taking first those items in the programme which had genuine musical interest, Bach's Cantata "O Light Everlasting" claims precedence. This is one of the works recently published and made generally available by Messrs. Novello and Co.—a fact worth mentioning because amateurs must be well aware that as is the use made of Bach's sacred compositions already brought within easy reach, so is the prospect of the series being continued till nothing remains difficult of possession. "O Light Everlasting" is a work moderate in dimensions having regard to the general run of its class, but it exacts considerable care and skill in performance, while amply repaying both. It contains, besides two recitatives, a couple of choruses and an air for contralto. Of the choruses, the opening one is largely expanded, and developed with all Bach's mastery of contrapuntal resource, and with more than usual grace and elegance. The air is also interesting, though difficult, and, we should say, rather ungrateful to the contralto voice on account of the part of the scale it mostly employs. In the final chorus we have, according to Bach's frequent practice, greater simplicity of structure, with broader and more massive effects. Altogether the work is well worth hearing, and Mr. Geaussen deserves credit and praise for bringing it forward. His choir discharged their arduous task not perfectly, but commendably; and the elaborate accompaniment, as arranged for organ, was very well played by Mr. Sidney Naylor. Schubert's Psalm "The Lord is my Shepherd" stood next in order of interest, being sung with taste and effect by sixteen ladies of the Choir; and a picked body of eight gentlemen, supported by all their fellows in chorus, acquitted themselves well in Mendelssohn's Cantata "To the Sons of Art." These efforts were undeniably successful; at the same time it must be said that they were not finished to the last degree, nor even so meritorious as the singing in the unaccompanied pieces, with which more pains seemed to have been taken at rehearsal. Among the pieces just referred to were Hatton's "Indian Maid," Blumenthal's "Gather ye rosebuds," Macfarren's "Three Fishers," and Benet's "All creatures now." The execution of these was admirable, speaking well for the ability of the singers, and the training skill of their Conductor—promising, moreover, the highest excellence in time to come. Of the vocal solos mention was deserved by Miss Clara Samuelli, in "Waiting for the King"; Mr. Lloyd, in "Adelaide"; and Mr. F. King, in Benedict's "Rage, thou angry storm." A Duo-concertante for two pianos, the work of Mr. C. E. Stephens, represented instrumental music, the performers being the composer and Mr. Geaussen. A very musicianly and pleasing thing is this Duet—capitally written for the instruments, melodious, and full of constructive effects. We approve especially of the opening Allegro and the Finale—of the Allegro because its form and treatment are masterly, while the subject-matter is well chosen; of the Finale because it is all grace and sparkle. The work was well played, and received with great favour.

We observe that, at a Concert to be given on January 2, Mr. Geaussen will introduce Bach's grand Motett "Sing ye to the Lord," an octavo edition of which is in preparation by Messrs. Novello and Co.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S RECITAL.

THE twelfth annual Pianoforte Recital of this earnest and persevering artist took place on the 6th ult., at St. James's Hall, before a numerous and fairly appreciative audience. Whatever we may think of the chances of ultimate success of what Mr. Bache conceives to be his mission in this country, there can be no question as to the possession in a singularly high degree of the above attributes—viz. earnestness and perseverance—on the part of a pianist capable of sustaining from memory a programme of an hour and a half's duration, consisting of compositions characterised, for the greater part, by rhapsodical diffusiveness and pretentious incoherence, while taxing to the utmost the executive skill of the performer. Such, in fact, was Mr. Bache's achievement who on this occasion marked a further step in his propaganda for Liszt by confining himself entirely to works by the famous Abbé. A leading feature in the pianist's performance was his skillful rendering of the "Sonata" in B minor, dedicated to Robert Schumann, a "tone-picture" which to the initiated signifies the successful struggle of "an heroic spirit in a world full of strife," whilst to outsiders it would seem to suggest rather the unsuccessful struggle of an ill-regulated ambition after originality of thought and utterance, coupled with a complete disregard of those lines of beauty, both as regards form and conception, indelibly marked out with the hand of genius by the great masters. Indeed, with the exception of numberless and equally meaningless phrases, and a few not uninteresting, albeit somewhat affected leading themes, the elaboration of this rhapsody, misnamed a sonata, is to our thinking positively ugly, calling to mind not unfrequently in its progress the malicious remark attributed to Rossini, in reference to a work of another modern composer of, however, a far different stamp, viz., Si c'était de la musique, ce serait horrible. That Liszt can write both with originality of thought and poetic inspiration, none even of his pronounced opponents—among whose number we do not reckon ourselves—will deny, and the fact was again proved on the present occasion by three charming pieces, entitled respectively "Paysage," "Sonetto di Petrarca," and "Valse Oubliée," which were most effectively rendered by the concert-giver, as was the characteristic and specifically Lisztian "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 9, aptly surnamed "Pesther Carneval," with which the Recital concluded. Other numbers of the programme were the Prelude and Fugue on the name of "Bach," and the Etudes in D flat, and F minor, dedicated to E. Liszt. As an effort of thoughtful interpretation and executive skill, Mr. Walter Bache's twelfth pianoforte Recital must be pronounced entirely successful, and fully on a par with its predecessors. Mr. Arthur Oswald agreeably diversified the programme by singing two of the Abbé's Lieder, viz., "Die drei Zigeuner" and "In Liebeslust," to Mr. Bache's accompaniment.

THE LONDON CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

THE tenth annual festival of the London Church Choir Association, which took place at St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., attracted, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, a very large congregation.

In the early part of the present year the Association offered, as some of our readers may remember, a prize of ten guineas for a setting of the Te Deum, the umpires to be Doctors Stainer and Bridge, in response to which invitation forty-seven manuscripts were sent in for competition. The successful work, the composition of Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast, formed the principal novelty of the present festival, both the anthem and service having been heard on previous occasions; the hymn tunes and chants, however, were (with one exception hereafter alluded to) written expressly for the occasion, according to the rule of the Association. The advisability of this rule, as judged by its practical results, we have more than once felt inclined to question at past festivals, perhaps never more so than at that of which we are now speaking; for though nothing may be easier than to compose a chant or hymn-tune, nothing would appear, from the instances annually furnished at these gatherings, to be more difficult than to write a good one; it is, moreover, most improbable that certain deservedly-popular hymn tunes already wedded to particular words will be displaced by others much their inferior in merit.

Mr. Tours' service in D, composed for the 1879 festival, is somewhat chromatic for use by a choir numbering about 600 not highly-trained voices, and the *sol*i portions of the work hardly gain in effect by being sung in semi-chorus; the late Henry Smart's anthem "Sing to the Lord" (composed for, and brought out at, the festival of 1876), is a noble work, well worthy its author's name and reputation. The Association is to be congratulated on having called it forth, but on this occasion it by no means met with the justice in performance which it deserves. An agreeable contrast to the other hymn-tunes was afforded by the theme of Henry Smart's "Chorale with variations" for the organ, arranged, or rather transcribed, as a hymn-tune in the four real parts in which it was originally written, and sung to a hymn of 8-7's metre with excellent effect. Of the prize Te Deum, sung after the Offertory and before the Benediction, we can only remark that the music, although free from offence to the most critical listener, becomes somewhat wearisome from the want of interest and continuity of thought. It may also be said that, as there are but four short pages of eight-part writing out of sixteen, the work, although practically excluded from many choirs by its difficulty, scarcely fulfils the eight-part professions of the title-page. As a whole, the performance of the Te Deum was anything but good. The choir, which numbered 260 boys and over 300 men, was rough and unsteady, and gradations of tone were conspicuously absent; a lack of precision, moreover, combined with a want of attack, was painfully noticeable throughout. On two occasions, once in the Magnificat and once in the Te Deum, a decided difference of opinion between organist and choir caused a catastrophe to appear imminent. The principles of the Association are, doubtless, good; but they have before them a choice of one of two things, namely, either the employment of much less exacting music, or a much greater amount of rehearsal, one of which is absolutely necessary if they would ensure real success to their labours, or do lasting good by their efforts.

BRIXTON CHORAL SOCIETY.

THIS Society gave a performance of Handel's "Jephtha" in the Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 13th ult., with Mr. W. Lemare as Conductor; Madame Clara Suter, Miss Marian Burton, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Lewis Thomas being the solo vocalists. The beautiful airs with which "Jephtha" abounds were sung most acceptably by these artists—in some instances so as to deserve a special word of praise. We may cite by way of conspicuous example Madame Suter's expressive and touching delivery of "Farewell, ye limpid streams"; Miss Burton's energetic rendering of "Let other creatures die"; "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her, Angels," as given with much feeling by Mr. Kenningham, and "Freedom now once more possessing," to which the experience and skill in oratorio of Mr. Lewis Thomas gave all the significance possible. Of the work done by Mr. Lemare's chorus and orchestra we cannot speak in corresponding terms. The chorus lacked quality and seemed to have been but imperfectly trained, while the orchestra showed no adequate acquaintance either with their instruments or their music. Mr. Lemare knows perfectly well how to remedy the defects of the first before the next concert, but the improvement of the second will take time. We sympathise entirely with the conductor's efforts to gather round him the instrumental amateurs of the district; nevertheless, we must point out that an obvious policy is to keep them secluded till they are able to do themselves and their theme proper justice.

SAVOY THEÂTRE.

THE production of a new work by Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan concerns a musical journal in a limited sense only. Music here takes a very subordinate position, and is severely handicapped by the clever sallies and preposterous puns of Mr. Gilbert, which, although amusing enough in themselves, are not very congenial to the most serious of arts. Every credit is due to Mr. Sullivan for doing what, under such circumstances, he has done on this as on many previous occasions. Again he clings, with the desperate energy of a drowning man, to the few points of genuine sentiment vouchsafed by the author, and again he manages to wed pretty if not very original tunes to the, musically speaking, most irrelevant words ever put together. There is, moreover, nothing in his score that is absolutely commonplace or vulgar, if we except the close of the first act, which reminds one painfully of the typical finale (with cancan obbligato) of the French opera bouffe. To the general style of that entertainment Mr. Sullivan's music of "Iolanthe" is as superior as are Mr. Gilbert's words. The prevailing character of the score is sufficiently indicated by the above remarks, to which it is necessary to add only that the regulation number of "patter songs," sentimental ditties, short ensembles, and noisy march tunes, will not be looked for in vain by those who take a delight in such matters. Gilbert and Sullivan's joint productions have by this time established a type of their own, and of that type "Iolanthe" is an excellent specimen. The performance, carefully superintended by author and composer, was, in its way, perfect, and the enthusiasm of the public on the first night knew no bounds. Mr. Grossmith, Mr. Barrington, Mr. Temple, Miss Leonora Braham, and Miss Alice Barnett materially aided the success of the rendering. These excellent artists can scarcely be classed amongst vocalists proper, but many an operatic star might learn from them how to pronounce their words with unflinching distinctness, also how to suit intelligent dramatic action to those words.

MR. KUHE'S FESTIVAL CONCERTS.

THE annual series of Concerts given for the past eleven years under the name of "Mr. Kuhe's Brighton Festival," always took place, till the year now present, in the month of February. No doubt the manager had his reasons for choosing a time when the Sussex watering-place is not full of visitors; but, whatever their nature and force, he eventually saw better ones for making a change. November is now the favoured period, and on November 8 last, the first of five performances attracted a numerous audience to the Dome. There is reason to believe that Mr. Kuhe did not gain much by offering his Festival to Brighton en pleine saison. Fashionable visitors stayed away from the concert-room for the most part, and it is at least a question whether the residents were as disposed to attend as they had shown themselves to be when fewer matters engaged their minds. However, knowledge of this sort has to be bought; and it was natural to assume that better results might be looked for in November than after Christmas. The artistic resources provided by Mr. Kuhe were adequate, having regard to the comparatively small scale adopted. An orchestra, led by Mr. Carrodus, and entirely composed of London artists; a very fair chorus, numerically strong enough for balance; and the best available soloists—their names will subsequently appear—showed the resolve of the manager to lose no success for want of means. Unhappily his liberality was in part neutralised by that lack of sufficient general rehearsal which so often mars our English festivals. The works in the programme need not be mentioned here, and we only refer to them at this moment for the purpose of remarking that no important English novelty was included, as on so many former occasions. We decline to advance a reason for this, but find it exceedingly easy to understand Mr. Kuhe's action, in view of the conspicuous place occupied by English music not new.

The first Concert was devoted to Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" and Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, which were performed in the order named, greatly to the disadvantage of the instrumental work. On every account the Symphony should have stood first; and, indeed, it is difficult to explain the perverseness that placed it last. Mr. Sullivan conducted his music in person, languidly, as his manner is, and the performance was by no means up to the desired mark. However, the solo vocalists made amends for whatever the ensemble lacked, as will readily be understood when we mention the names of Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. F. King; Mr. Albert McGuckin also taking a part—that of Fabius. All these artists sang in their very best manner, the honours chiefly falling to Madame Albani and Mr. Lloyd, upon whom the most important and interesting task devolved. Particulars are uncalled for; enough that the Cantata was well received, and its composer recalled at the end of the performance. The Symphony had the advantage of Mr. Cowen's own direction, gaining much thereby, and being played in a manner distinctly meritorious if not altogether satisfying. The impression it made was not, as far as could be judged, proportioned to the merits of the work; this result being, in our opinion, attributable to two causes—first, the Symphony came after a long, and, in some respects, superficially attractive Cantata; next, the audience were left unprovided with a clue to the scenes which Mr. Cowen sought to suggest. The omission just stated had, no doubt, a serious effect. Tone-pictures do not interpret themselves, and it is the height of absurdity to offer them without an explanation of their meaning. It need scarcely be added that connoisseurs already familiar with Mr. Cowen's design enjoyed the performance to the full. The "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" closed the Concert.

On Thursday afternoon (the 8th ult.) Mr. Manns conducted what was called a "Classical Concert." We advise Mr. Kuhe to drop the word "classical" in future, since its effect upon the Brightonians seems the reverse of that which "Mesopotamia" had upon the old woman of story. At any rate, they did not find it "comforting," and stayed away with uncommon unanimity. On the other hand, those who did not stay away were well pleased and had some occasion so to be. The programme included the Overture to "Die Zauberflöte"—capitally played; the "Pastoral" Symphony—given no better than indifferently; the Entr'acte in G from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; Molique's Fandango for violin, superbly executed by Mr. Carrodus; the Introduction to Act III. and Dance of Apprentices from "Die Meistersinger"; and the Hungarian March from Berlioz' "Faust." These things need not detain us, the less because two others of greater present importance await notice; the first being Hiller's Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor—the most remarkable work of that class by the Cologne master, and certainly the one in which greatest vitality appears. It is difficult to explain the neglect of this important and beautiful composition, unless on the assumption that Hiller, as one of the chief among dii minores, suffers, like the planet Mercury, through being so near the sun. Mercury is lost in the blaze of the central luminary, and Hiller is so close a neighbour of the great masters that when we look at him we also see them. But, apart from such fancies, there can be no question that the Concerto in F sharp minor deserves better treatment than it gets. The solo performer was Miss Kuhe, who did herself and her work ample justice, playing with freedom and spirit, at the same time with correctness and expression. Her "singing" of the cantabile phrases in the slow movement appeared a little hard, and there were a few occasions in the midst of exacting passages when she seemed to flinch; but, on the whole, the young lady did very well, and deserved the hearty applause received. The second of the works above referred to was a Nocturne for orchestra by Mr. Frederick Corder, who wrote it specially for the occasion, and conducted its performance in person. As it has since been heard at the Crystal Palace, subject to better conditions than at Brighton, its merits are more fitly discussed under the head of the Concerts there given. Suffice it here that the Nocturne, though by no means well played, obtained a fair meed of applause. The vocalist was Miss Ella Lemmens, who made a favourable début in Brighton.

In the evening of this day took place a rehearsal of Gounod's "Redemption," under Mr. Randegger, to which the public were admitted on payment of half a crown each. A large number availed themselves of the opportunity, the Dome area being well filled; and as Mr. Randegger did not allow the presence of hearers to affect the discharge of his duty, there was no drawback to set against the advantage of the course Mr. Kuhe adopted.

Wednesday (the 9th ult.). Nulla dies sine lineâ, says the proverb. In point of fact, this day might pass without a line, since the work performed was "Elijah." Let us, however, record the fact that several young artists—Miss Robertson, Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Herwin Jones and Mr. Lucas Williams—were associated with Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley, and did promising work. We have rarely heard "Woe unto them" sung better than by Miss Dones. It should also be said that the performance, as a whole, was indifferent, this result being partly due to Mr. Kuhe's inexperience as a Conductor.

A "Popular" Concert for Mr. Kuhe's benefit took place on Friday (the 10th ult.); and in the word "popular" the public found their "Mesopotamia." They came in great numbers, and were rejoiced with a mélange of favourite songs and orchestral pieces. Few of these need detain us, and the few demand little more than simple mention as indicating a desire to present that which combines attractiveness and merit. Among the more important selections were Weber's "Concertstück," pianoforte solo by Mr. Kuhe, Dvorák's Slavonian Dance in D, a number from the ballet music in Rubinstein's "Feramors," and the Overture to "William Tell." These were all conducted by Mr. Randegger, and fairly well performed. An arrangement of pieces from Sullivan's "Patience," together with some songs and ballads, in which Madame Albani, Madame Sterling, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley took part, made up the balance of a liberal programme.

The concluding Concert was devoted to Gounod's "Redemption," which had been anticipated with very great interest by the amateurs of Brighton and adjacent towns. The performance was conducted by Mr. Randegger in his best manner, and, on the whole, fairly set the work before those who came eager to make its acquaintance. We need not insist upon the fact that, with comparatively limited resources, especially in the choral department, the effect produced could not rival that of previous representations at Birmingham, Bristol and Kensington. So far, something was left to desire, but the orchestra gave much satisfaction, and the principal vocalists, one excepted, did entire justice to their theme. This will be understood when we say that the leading soprano part was taken by Madame Albani and the second by Miss Santley; that Madame Trebelli impersonated the Virgin Mother and the Angel; that Mr. Santley delivered the divine words; and that Mr. Lloyd undertook the tenor narrative. In such hands the music was safe, and safe also were the effects for which those who had several times heard the Oratorio naturally looked. Madame Albani made her usual profound impression in "From Thy love as a Father," the solo of which could not possibly have been sung better; while the unaffected pathos of Mr. Santley and the unimpeachable judgment of Mr. Lloyd throughout an arduous task put their respective music in the best light. On the other hand, Mr. Lucas Williams, as the bass Narrator, was not beyond reproach, his intonation being sometimes more than doubtful, and his idea of the expression demanded ill-judged. The effect of the work upon the audience was obviously great. For some time after the performance began, faint attempts at applause were made, but the superior discretion of the majority soon prevailed, and only at the conclusion of each part did the house show by lively demonstrations how thoroughly it appreciated the deep religious significance and high artistic merit of the French composer's work. So the verdict of Brighton sustained that of Birmingham, Bristol and London, and made assurance of success for "The Redemption," if not doubly sure, certainly surer. This result was a fitting attendant upon the close of the week's proceedings. Mr. Kuhe has arranged to give a second performance of the work on the 3rd of February next.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

AFTER the sumptuous and ponderous fare provided at the Triennial Festival of August last, it would not have been very surprising to find Birmingham suffering from a musical surfeit this autumn; but our local caterers are evidently staunch believers in the maxim which affirms that "L'appétit vient en mangeant," and their provision for the entertainment of the musical public is even on a more lavish scale than usual. Although the season is yet but a few weeks old, we have already had more than a dozen important concerts, besides operatic performances by four distinct organisations—the Carl Rosa, the Royal English, the "Manteaux Noirs," and the D'Oyley Carte Companies—and musical fixtures in the near future loom "thick as leaves in Vallambrosa," or the masts of shipping below London Bridge.

As it would obviously be impossible within the limits of this communication to notice everything of interest that has occurred, the briefest mention must suffice for such of the earlier and remoter events as may be supposed to appeal to the sympathies of educated music lovers. Allusion has been made to the exceptional number and variety of the operatic performances which have thus far enlivened the musical season, including twelve by the Carl Rosa Company, but very few of these presented any special features of interest or excellence. The production of "Fidelio," with Madame Marie Roze in the title-rôle, the same lady's assumption of Lucrezia Borgia in Donizetti's work, and the first appearance here of Madame Valleria as Senta in Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" were the most noteworthy features of the Carl Rosa series, which, in a merely commercial sense, was one of the most successful that has been given in Birmingham for many years. On each occasion of Madame Marie Roze's appearance the house was filled to overflowing, and the remarkable histrionic talents of the accomplished lady, who laid Birmingham under such deep obligations by her singing at the recent Festival, were warmly acknowledged by the local press and public. Of the subsequent performances of the Royal English Opera Company, which comprises several former members of the Carl Rosa Company including Madame Blanche Cole, Madame Rose Hersee, Mr. Packard and Mr. Charles Lyall, the only one calling for mention was the production here for the first time in Birmingham, of Albert Lortzing's once popular comic opera "Czar und Zimmermann," under the title of "Peter the Shipwright." Its reception in Birmingham was not more cordial than that accorded it by the London public on its first production at the Gaiety Theatre, in April 1871, and it does not appear destined to take lasting root in this country, at all events without material condensation and revision. The "Manteaux Noirs" proved more successful, owing not so much perhaps to the intrinsic merits of the work, as to the fact that it introduced two Birmingham aspirants in the principal characters, Miss Emma Beasley as Girola and Mr. Arnold Breeden as Don Luis.

Of Concerts proper, the most important have been those of Messrs. Harrison, the Festival Choral Society, Mr. Stockley (orchestral) the Philharmonic Union, Mr. Short, the Musical Section of the Midland Institute, and Mr. Stratton, the two latter being strictly instrumental. At Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concert on October 19, the chief features of the programme were Beethoven's C minor Symphony, the Andante from Schubert's Symphony in C major and Beethoven's violin concerto with Mr. Carodus as the solo violinist. The playing of the band, which now numbers eighty performers, revealed a commendable advance, not merely in steadiness, unity, and precision, but in those higher qualities of refinement and expressiveness, which are always of slowest growth; and much credit is due to the beneficiaire for the successful zeal and assiduity with which he has laboured to create a local orchestra in Birmingham. On October 30, Mr. Short's Choir gave a performance of Haydn's Second Mass (in C), commonly distinguished in Germany as the "Pauken Messe," on account of the peculiar introduction of the drums in the "Agnus Dei," Van Bree's graceful Cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," and a new offertorium, "Benedic anima mea Domino," by Mr. Short himself—the latter a flowing well-written movement for bass solo, with choral accompaniment, which met with a warm reception from an evidently friendly audience. On the same evening, at Mr. Stratton's second Chamber Concert, an early manuscript string Quartet in G major, by Mr. Charles Lucas, the eminent English violoncellist, sometime Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, was produced here for the first time with a qualified success. The most satisfactory features of the Concert were Mendelssohn's C minor Trio for pianoforte and strings, and the beautiful string Quintet in D major of Mozart, to which full justice was done. Reference may appropriately be made here to the instrumental Concert given on the 4th ult. by the musical section of the Midland Institute, at which Spohr's grand symphony "The Power of Sound," composed in 1832, was produced for the first time in Birmingham. Its performance by Mr. Stockley's band was a very creditable one, and appeared to yield great gratification to the many music lovers present. Indeed, the reception accorded to the work was so flattering, that Mr. Stockley was induced to select it for repetition at his own Concert on the 30th.

The musical event of the month, however, was the performance of Gounod's "Redemption," for the first time since the Festival at which it was produced, at the second Concert of the Festival Choral Society on the 16th ult. The principals on this occasion were Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Mudie Bolingbroke, Mr. F. Boyle, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. F. H. Celli, and the band and chorus comprised 350 performers, with Mr. Stimpson as organist and Mr.

Stockley as conductor. The performance, though by no means perfect, was much more satisfactory and effective than might have been expected considering the resources available, and especially the absence of principals of the high rank of those who contributed so much to the éclat of the Festival performances; but the "Redemption" fortunately does not depend so much upon principals as the more familiar oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn, and the choral and orchestral portions of the work were rendered generally with a spirit and finish that left little to be desired. Miss Marriott sang the principal soprano music, and especially the beautiful Air in F "From Thy love as a Father" with considerable skill and good feeling, and Madame Bolingbroke impressed the audience favourably by her singing of "While my watch I am keeping." There were many points of excellence in the singing also of Mr. F. Boyle, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Celli, but the triumphs of the evening were reserved for the choir, the efforts of which throughout the work were deserving of the highest praise. The performance was chiefly interesting as showing that the exceptional executive resources employed at the Festival are not indispensable to an effective and even impressive rendering of the work. The charm of the "Redemption" certainly grows upon one with every hearing, and the closer the familiarity of the audience with its very novel forms and methods, the keener the gratification they evidently derive from it. On the occasion of this, its third performance in Birmingham, very general surprise and pleasure were expressed by those who had heard its previous renderings, at the many unsuspected elements of beauty and melody which they now found in it for the first time.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

So many concerts of average interest have taken place here this month, that it is not possible to mention them all. On the 10th ult. a Subscription Concert was given in aid of the Royal College of Music (vocalists, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Signor Runcio and Signor Poli; violin, Herr Poznanski, and pianoforte, the Chevalier de Kontski): on the 11th ult. the band of the 2nd Life Guards gave two concerts, and the People's Concert Society and Bristol Musical Association have given their usual Saturday Concerts, all these performances taking place at the Colston Hall.

On the 16th ult. Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy gave her first Classical Chamber Concert (Sixth Season) at the Alexandra Hall, Clifton, the programme being as follows: Quartet in E flat Op. 12, Mendelssohn; Trio in F, Op. 42, Gade; Solo, violin, "Ballade" A. Holmes; Quartet in D minor, No. 76, Haydn. Messrs. Henry Holmes (1st violin), M. Rice (2nd violin), W. H. Hill (viola), J. Pomeroy (violoncello) and Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy (pianoforte) were the executants.

The third and fourth Monday Popular Concerts (sixth season), took place on the 6th and 20th ult. respectively. The following were the principal items in the programme for the 6th ult., Overture "Paradise and the Peri," Sterndale Bennett; Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Schumann; Overture to "Guillaume Tell," Rossini; "Scenes Pittoresques," Massenet; and the March from "Tannhauser." Miss Aylward, who was the vocalist, displayed her flexible voice to advantage in "I rejoice in my youth" from Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist," and in "Annette's" song from "Der Freischütz."

Sterndale Bennett's Symphony in G minor was the pièce de résistance on the 20th ult., and went very satisfactorily; one diminuendo in the second part of the first movement could hardly have been surpassed anywhere out of London. Mr. A. P. Vivian played an effective flute solo, "Legende" by Brickdale-Corbett; and Miss Mary Beare, the vocalist, sang Rossini's "Bel Raggio" and Bishop's "Mocking Bird" with taste and refinement.

Notwithstanding the announcement that this was the last concert but two for the season, the hall was far from full, and this, unfortunately, has been the case at each concert this year. Nor is local indifference confined to the Monday Populars, for the Chamber Concerts are equally ill attended. Each of these series of concerts was well supported when they were first organised, but apparently the people of Bristol and Clifton, instead of appreciating the steady improvement in the former and the high standard of excellence maintained in the latter, grow yearly less mindful of the music in their midst. Most provincial cities would be proud of possessing a local orchestra capable of giving such concerts as those mentioned above, and equally proud of the local talent and energy which brings within reach chamber music of the same class as that of St. James's Hall. But it is not so with Bristol. Mr. Riseley is compelled this year to give only half the usual number of Monday Popular Concerts, on account of the difficulty of obtaining the Colston Hall, the only building in the place large enough for the purpose; and Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy is obliged to give her Concerts in the small hall in Clifton, because the Victoria Rooms, at which the Chamber Concerts have always taken place hitherto, are otherwise engaged, and in neither instance is the hall filled. Facts are stubborn things, and in the face of these facts a doubt arises whether the educated people of Bristol are capable of appreciating good music when it is offered them, or set any real value upon that native talent for the future advantage of which they are now making such strenuous efforts to found a scholarship in the new College of Music. But if either of these series of Concerts should at any time be abandoned by their promoters for want of support, Bristol will become (and deserve to become) as a contemporary lately remarked, "a by-word among musicians."

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

WE have to record another performance of Berlioz' "Faust" at St. George's Hall, Bradford, on October 27. The work had been previously given at the end of last season, and was repeated at the commencement of the present series of Subscription Concerts, when it proved an attraction no less powerful than on its former presentation. Mr. Charles Hallé's band occupied the orchestra as before, and being thoroughly familiar with the music the "Hungarian March" and "Ballet of Sylphs" created the greatest impression, and were repeated in answer to long-continued applause. The Bradford Festival Choral Society gave a satisfactory rendering of the choral numbers, despite a little deficiency in power of attack. The principals, Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Frederick King, more than maintained the reputation which they have gained in connection with the difficult music of the work, and Mr. Thornton Wood sang Brander's "tale of woe" in an energetic manner. Mr. Charles Hallé conducted with his customary skill.

On the 1st ult. two Concerts of Orchestral Music were given—one by the Leeds Orchestral Society and another by the Fitzwilliam Street (Huddersfield) Philharmonic Society. At the former the programme was not of a high order, nor was the instrumental music entirely satisfactory, if we except the pianoforte solos of Mr. Sidney Jones, jun., the son of the Conductor, which showed promise of future success. Vocal selections were contributed by Miss Eddison and Mr. Sugden. The Concert at Huddersfield was more interesting. The orchestra, under the conductorship of the Rev. W. Thomas, acquitted itself well in Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," and in the Intermezzo from Haydn's Military Symphony. A pianoforte quartet (Mozart's "Tema con variazioni") was included in the programme, and executed with considerable taste by Messrs. R. H. and J. H. Hayes, W. Scholefield, and J. E. Ibeson. The last-named gentleman also accompanied the songs given by Mrs. Henry Hirst and Mr. H. Beaumont.

No Yorkshire musical society has a higher reputation for chorus-singing than the Leeds Philharmonic Society (which supplies a most important contingent to the Leeds Festival Chorus), and this reputation was greatly increased on the 8th ult., the occasion of an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." We have seldom heard better chorus-singing at any similar concert; not only was there exhibited the tone and precision characteristic of Yorkshire choruses, but also a degree of refinement and expression rarely met with in this district. Special mention must be made of two numbers, "O, great is the depth" and "O, be gracious," which, though so entirely different in character, were both splendidly sung. The success of the chorus is entirely due to the excellent training of Mr. James Broughton, the chorus-master at the Leeds Festival, and the Conductor of the Society. The principals engaged were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Orridge, Mr. Frank Boyle, and Mr. Frederick King. The latter gentleman, however, disappointed the committee at the eleventh hour, and his place was taken by Mr. Bridson, who sang exceedingly well.

Mr. Charles Hallé appeared with his orchestra at the Huddersfield Town Hall on the 13th ult., and provided an excellent programme, in which were included Beethoven's Grand Symphony in C minor, a selection from Raff's Suite in E flat for piano and orchestra, the "Zauberflöte" and "Guillaume Tell" Overtures, and the Overture, Nocturne and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn). Mr. Hallé also played as a pianoforte solo three of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, and Mrs. Hutchinson sang some operatic airs. The Concert was, musically and financially, a remarkable success, and we are glad to hear that a similar one is to be given early in the new year.

On the 14th ult. the first of the present series of Leeds Chamber Concerts was given in the Albert Hall by the following artists: Herr Otto Peiniger (violin), Mr. Charles Ould (violoncello), Herr Ernst Pauer (piano), Miss Clarke (vocalist), and Mr. Charles Wilkinson (accompanist). The most important items in the programme were Beethoven's Grand Trio in B flat, Schubert's Trio in E flat, Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat for cello and piano, and Weber's Pianoforte Sonata in C. It would be difficult to select more interesting music, and the result was an excellent performance on the part of the artists and an enthusiastic reception on the part of the audience. We must make special reference to Herr Pauer's playing of Weber's Sonata, which was brilliantly rendered, notwithstanding the great variety of treatment which is requisite for an adequate representation of the composer's ideas.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society chose Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" and Beethoven's Mass in C for performance at their second Concert of this season, on the 17th ult. The Mass was far more successful than the Cantata, which apparently was not as well known; in neither work, however, did the Society come up to their usual standard of excellence. The soloists were all members of the Society, and the quartet "God is a spirit," sung by Miss Tomlinson, Miss Riley, Mr. Mellor and Mr. Owen, was one of the best efforts of the performance. Mr. Burton, the Society's Conductor, directed the orchestra, and Mr. Clough helped a somewhat unsteady band by a judicious use of the organ.

Amongst performances of a less important nature we may mention those of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" by the Armley (Leeds) Choral Society, and of Gade's "Crusaders" by the Ilkley Vocal Society, both on the 20th ult.—the latter under the direction of Mr. James Broughton, of Leeds.

We are glad to notice that Organ Recitals are now being looked upon with greater favour in Yorkshire than has hitherto been the case. For some time past Dr. Spark, the Borough Organist of Leeds, has been giving two Recitals each week on the Leeds Town Hall organ, the public being admitted free. The programmes have been judiciously chosen, and the audiences very large. Lately also Mr. Joshua Marshall, who occupies a similar position in Huddersfield, has been adopting the same course, and has, though at less frequent intervals, given some excellent Recitals on the fine instrument recently erected in the Town Hall of his borough. Finally, efforts are being made to obtain Concerts of a similar nature in Bradford; but there is not in this case an instrument available such as those in the Town Halls of the places we have mentioned.

Considerable interest is being evinced in the coming performances of Gounod's "Redemption" at Bradford towards the end of the season, and of Berlioz' "Faust," for the first time in Leeds, next January. A new Cantata by Dr. Creser, the Organist of the Parish Church of the latter town, entitled "Eudora," is also announced for a first performance at an early date.

OBITUARY.

WE have with deep regret to record the death, on the night of the 17th ult., and under painful circumstances to which we will not further allude, of Mr. Carl Engel, an honoured contributor to this journal, whose large attainments as a musician, indefatigable perseverance as an inquirer, clear insight into books in many languages, and extended and often intimate acquaintance with nearly all orchestral, historical, and ethnological musical instruments placed him as the first musicologist in Europe. He attained to no advanced age, being only about sixty-four years old, but at least half those years were spent in this country, and chiefly at Kensington, where he died. Carl Engel was a native of Hanover, and in early life enjoyed the instruction of Hummel. We believe that he resided in the family of a distinguished German nobleman before coming to this country; but his naturally reserved disposition led him to be exceedingly reticent about his early training and career, so that the education he had received and its corresponding environment could only be guessed at from his refined taste and kindly, genial manner. When Carl Engel married an English lady and settled in a recently-built house in the Addison Road, Kensington, it was to make that house, in the course of a few years, a museum, and at the same time a musical library, such as could hardly be rivalled, except in certain public institutions, either here or on the Continent; and, supplementing his choice library with his reading in the British Museum, he became the eminent authority and writer on musical instruments and their history he was known to be, establishing, in fact, a fresh departure in our musical knowledge. His rare instruments, bought when the command of a fortune was not needed for their acquisition, he made practical acquaintance with, for the most part. He played, and played well, the harpsichord and clavichord, the lute and the theorbo, and yet never neglected his pianoforte, on the desk of which might be seen the compositions of Chopin, of Rubinstein, and Brahms, as well as those of the older masters. He had himself composed pianoforte pieces, including a Sonata (published by Wessel, 1852) and a Method for the instrument (Augener, 1855). The first outcome of his archaeological studies was the publication of "The Music of the Most Ancient Nations, particularly of the Assyrians, Egyptians and Hebrews" (Murray, 1864), which was shortly followed, and in a general sense completed, by "An Introduction to the Study of National Music" (Longmans, 1866). Any one conversant with recent German musical literature will have observed how often Engel has been borrowed from—too often without the acknowledgment that was due to him. About that time he began that close connection with South Kensington Museum so much to the advantage of the musical instrument collection contained in that institution. Until about two years ago, when his wife died and he subsequently went abroad, he was the constant expert and adviser to the Department in all questions of purchase. A most important step was his being employed to compile the catalogue of the Special Exhibition of Ancient Musical Instruments, which took place in 1872. This admirable catalogue was followed by a "Descriptive Catalogue of the Musical Instruments in the South Kensington Museum," published in 1874, a masterpiece of erudition and arrangement, anticipating the valuable Museum Catalogues of M. Chouquet, Paris; M. Victor Mahillon, Brussels; and of the Messrs. Kraus at Florence. After the publication of this comprehensive catalogue he resolved to extend it by a survey of the musical instruments of the whole world—a work which in manuscript fills four thick quarto volumes, illustrated by upwards of six hundred drawings, he fortunately lived to complete and place in the hands of the South Kensington authorities, who, it is understood, with praiseworthy discernment and liberality, have agreed to publish it. While this, his magnum opus, was in progress, he was not so wholly absorbed by it but he could find time to write two volumes entitled "Musical Myths and Facts" (Novello, Ewer and Co., 1876), and to contribute many interesting articles to THE MUSICAL TIMES, of some of which "The Literature of National Music" (Novello, 1879) was a reprint. The articles upon his four clavichords have more than usual interest and value. They were published July, August, and September, 1879, and were followed by "Music of the Gypsies," May, June, July, August, 1880, and "Æolian Music," August and September, 1882. There remains yet to publish from the author's MSS., but in separate volumes, "The Musical Opinions of Confucius," "Vox Populi" (a collection of National Airs), and "Researches into the Early History of the Violin Family," the last being nearly ready. Within the last few years fits of nervous depression to which Engel was subject became intensified, and caused serious apprehension to those who knew and loved him. An illness which ensued upon the death of his wife unsettled him altogether, and he decided to try whether he could not reside for the rest of his life in the vicinity of the town of Hanover. To that end he sold his library at Puttick and Simpson's auction rooms and many of his musical instruments, reserving those which were more rare and choice for subsequent acquirement by the South Kensington Museum, where a portion of them had already been on loan. His favourite harpsichords and clavichords were given or sold to friends who would care for them for his sake, excepting the extremely curious "gebunden" clavichord, which was left in the charge of his friends, the Messrs. Broadwood, who still retain it. He kept only his favourite lute for his pleasure and consolation. He returned, however, to London, only a few weeks ago, intending to settle here again. The rest is known. His works survive him, and are his fitting monument.

The death of Adolph Gutmann at Spezzia, on October 22 last, should not pass without record, although, it may be, few English readers will identify his name. He was born at Heidelberg in January, 1819; and, having devoted himself to music, removed to Paris while still a young man in order that he might place himself under Chopin for the study of the pianoforte. Chopin did not accept every pupil who offered, but he took kindly to Gutmann, and in a little while the German became, not only his favourite scholar, but his personal companion. Gutmann's name appears several times in Karasowski's biography of the Polish master. On p. 292, vol. ii., of the English edition, he is named as amongst Chopin's "best pupils." On p. 307, we read, à propos to the composer's illness: "Through the efforts of the physicians, and the indefatigable attentions of Gutmann, Chopin at length somewhat recovered." He is mentioned again in connection with the last scene of all: "At length the last hour approached. His sister and his faithful pupil, Gutmann, never left him for a moment" (p. 318). Once more: "Resting his head on Gutmann's shoulder, Chopin, in a clear voice, repeated after the priest every word of the Litany. . . . Then he asked for some water, and when he had moistened his lips he inclined his head and kissed the hand of Gutmann, who was supporting him" (p. 320). Gutmann remained in Paris, exercising his profession for some time, and then settled in Florence, where, singularly enough, he devoted himself to painting, rarely touching the pianoforte even in private. He was the discoverer of a method of painting on silk, the secret of which he refused to disclose, though it is believed that he has left directions for its publication. His death was sudden. By the way, Dr. Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" does not even mention the name of Chopin's beloved pupil, one who was, in his time, a famous performer of that master's works.

With Gustav Nottebohm, whose death occurred on October 31, at Graz, a musician of merit and one of the most painstaking investigators in the field of modern musical history has passed away. The deceased, who was the pupil and friend of both Mendelssohn and Schumann, was born in 1817 at Lüdenscheid, in Westphalia, and had been for many years past a resident of Vienna, where he was held in great esteem as a teacher of the art, he having also published some chamber-music and pieces for the pianoforte. His name will, however, be handed down to posterity chiefly on account of his elaborate and eminently successful researches concerning the artistic development of Beethoven, among which, again, his elucidations of the hieroglyphical contents of the famous "Sketch-Books" used by that master take the first rank. Other scarcely less important publications from his pen are a "Thematic Catalogue of Beethoven's Works," "Beethoven's Studies,"

"Beethoven's Studies under Haydn, Albrechtsberger, and Salieri: From the original manuscript exercises," and similar original researches relating to the career of that master. A most complete "Thematic Catalogue of the Works of Franz Schubert" is likewise to be found among Nottebohm's published volumes, all of which are characterised by a singularly acute judgment, coupled with that eminent capacity for taking pains which is said to be one of the chief attributes of genius.

A LARGELY-ATTENDED meeting was held at the Mansion House on the 2nd ult., in furtherance of a meeting to send to India the National Anthem translated into the following fifteen languages:—Arabic, Persian, Hindustani, Bengali, Sanskrit, Hebrew, Kavarese, Marathi, Gugerati, Punjabi, Malay, Taniel, Tilugu, Singhalese and Burmese. By permission of the Governor General of India (the Marquess of Ripon), and with the sanction of the Marquess of Hartington, Secretary of State for India, an influential committee has been formed for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the movement. Mr. Edward Stanhope, M.P., presided, in the absence of the Lord Mayor, and made an eloquent speech in favour of the object for which the meeting was called. Canon Harford, the promoter of the movement, read a report of the committee, in which it was stated that £3000 would be necessary in order to carry out the project. Mr. D. Onslow, moved the first resolution, "That the nation at large be invited to co-operate in the movement, and enable the committee of the National Anthem for India Fund to carry on an enterprise which is beyond the capability of private effort." Sir Lewis Jackson seconded the motion, which was supported by Mr. Roper Lethbridge and Canon Rowsell, and passed unanimously. During the proceedings the National Anthem was sung in Hindustani by a choir of ladies and gentlemen who were in attendance.

A SPECIAL Service of Thanksgiving, intended partly as a Harvest Festival, but chiefly for the restoration and re-opening of the church under altered circumstances, was held at St. John's, Southwark (otherwise known as St. John's, Horselydown), on Friday the 10th ult. A fully choral evensong, at which a surpliced choir was assisted by a small string band, consisting of three first violins, two seconds, a viola, a violoncello and a double bass, commenced at half-past seven. In addition to processional and other hymns, Anglican chants for special psalms, and Tours' Evening Service in F, the whole of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was sung as the anthem, and rendered in a manner creditable both to the vocalists and instrumentalists, and particularly so to Mr. Richard Lemaire, the organist of the church. Mr. Lemaire, though only appointed to his post so recently as the past summer, has, nevertheless, evidently done excellent work already, and we congratulate him on his recent success: he occupied the post of conductor, the organ (a sweet-toned but decidedly old-fashioned instrument) being played by Mr. G. C. Martin, of St. Paul's Cathedral. An excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Baynes, of Folkestone. The church has been restored in a skilful and excellent manner, and is worthy of a visit to see what may be made internally of a most prosaic and unecclesiastical exterior. We understand moreover that a full cathedral service is now the rule both morning and evening every Sunday.

THE first annual meeting of the North London Tonic Sol-fa Union was held on the 26th October, in Barnsbury Hall, Islington. The proceedings consisted of speeches by the chairman and others, and the performance of a selection of part-music by the choirs, each choir also performing separately a few pieces, to show the result of one season's work in the several classes. The Union proposes advancing the cause of Tonic Sol-fa by banding together the numerous classes in North London, and giving united performances in different localities. There will be shortly a full Choral Festival at one of the Islington churches, when all the music will be specially written for the occasion by Tonic Sol-fa composers; and on Good Friday it is proposed to give a performance by the united choirs of some sacred Cantata or small Oratorio.

THE prospectus of the ninth series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts given by the Glasgow Choral Union announces that there will be this season twelve Concerts, which will extend over a period of ten weeks, and that the services of Mr. August Manns have been secured as Conductor. There will be four Choral Concerts, the first of which will be devoted to Berlioz' "Faust," the second to Handel's "Messiah," the third to Gounod's "Redemption," and the fourth to Handel's "Samson." At the eight Orchestral Concerts Symphonies by Spohr, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Haydn, Berlioz, Schubert and Cowen will be given; and the programmes will also include Concertos and other works by the standard writers. The principal artists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Mary Davies, Mrs. Hutchinson, Mdle. Elly Warnots, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Julia Gaylord, Madame Patey, Madame Bolingbroke, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. J. Maas, Signor Foli, Mr. Frederick King, Mr. Egbert Roberts, Mr. Henry Blower, and Mr. Santley; solo violin, Herr Joachim and M. Victor Buziau; solo pianoforte, M. Louis Breitner, Madame Sophie Menter, and Master Alfred Hollins; chorus, The Glasgow Choral Union; chorus master, Mr. Allen Macbeth. The first Concert takes place on the 12th inst.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN, the eminent London pianist, is just now engaged upon a concert tour in Germany, where she won such golden opinions on the occasion of her first professional visit to that country some three years since. At Hamburg, where the gifted artist appeared at one of the chamber concerts of the Philharmonic Society of that town, her interpretation of the pianoforte part of Rubinstein's Trio (Op. 32), as well as of solo pieces by Henselt and by the lady herself, elicited tokens of the liveliest satisfaction from the audience, a feeling which is likewise warmly endorsed in the criticisms of the local press and the reports furnished of her performance to other German journals. It must be a source of high gratification to this artist to find her talents, both as a pianist and a composer, so quickly appreciated by critical audiences outside the country where she has long since established so legitimate a reputation. Miss Zimmermann has also recently had the honour of playing before the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany and a small circle at the New Palace of Potsdam, where she met with a most flattering reception.

THE third of the series of Monthly Organ Recitals at St. John's, Waterloo Road, was given by Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac., Oxon., on Thursday evening, the 9th ult. The programme consisted of Guilman's first Organ Sonata (Op. 42), an Andante and a Fantasia by Henry Smart, two Morceaux by Salomé, Mendelssohn's Overture in C, and a century-old Concerto in G minor, composed by Dr. Arne, and numbered 5 in a set of six organ Concertos published in 1793, fifteen years after the composer's death. The works of this composer are so comparatively unknown that this Concerto is almost an absolute novelty to the present generation. It is an interesting composition, and one which we hope to have an opportunity of hearing soon again. It is superfluous to add that it, together with the rest of the programme, received ample justice at the hands of Mr. Stark. The next Recital is to be given on Thursday evening, the 14th inst., by Mr. G. E. Blunden, late of St. Mark's, Lewisham, Organist of St. Mary's, Highgate.

SIGNOR FILIPPO FILIPPI, the eminent Milanese critic, speaking from a perusal of the vocal score of "The Redemption" says in La Perseveranza:—

We cannot but receive with a hearty welcome, nay with a transport of admiration, this new, sublime, inspired work which Gounod—at once a poet and a musician—has wrought upon the grand mystery of the Redemption. Gounod, profound believer that he is, has always manifested a decided leaning towards religious subjects; and things mystical, supernatural, heavenly, have ever exercised a powerful attraction upon his genius. If, then, there exists an art-work which has been dictated by sincere conviction, assuredly 'La Rédemption' is such an one. The author has bestowed upon it all the fervour of his faith, all the glow of his enthusiasm, all the ecstacy of his mysticism. . . . In 'La Rédemption,' in fact, we find Gounod once more at his very best—inspired, original, poetic, bold yet profound, lucid, logical; a master even when he plunges into chaos, when he conducts us through the ténèbres, or leads us on to the dreamy sphere of the most ideal, yet sincere, mysticism.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society is steadily progressing in its arrangements for the coming season, and now announces that four Concerts will be given, at one of which Gounod's "Redemption" will be performed, under the musical conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé. The first annual meeting of shareholders was held on the 10th ult., and was well attended, much interest being shown in the future of the Society by a large number of those connected with the old Society, either as members of Committee, members, or assistants. The choral rehearsals are now in progress weekly at Neumeyer Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Cummings, with Mr. Fountain Meen as accompanist; and as some four-fifths of the old choir have joined the new Society, and the blanks have been filled up after a judicious process of selection, there is no doubt that this department will be maintained in an efficient state. The Council of the new Society deserve the support of all true lovers of musical art for their determined efforts in so praiseworthy a cause.

FOUR performances of the "Ajax" of Sophocles, in the original Greek, were announced to be given at St. Andrew's Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of the 29th and 30th ult. and the 1st inst. and in the afternoon of the 2nd inst. The choruses and incidental music have been written by Professor Macfarren, and the executants consist of an orchestra and a chorus of undergraduates. All the performances take place too late for notice in our present number, but there can be little doubt that they will prove in the highest degree interesting. On the evening of the 2nd inst., in addition to the representation of "Ajax," a concert will be given, under the direction of Mr. Villiers Stanford, which will include Bach's Cantata "Halt im Gedächtniss Jesum Christ" (for the first time in England), a portion of Palestrina's "Missa Papæ Marcelli," a Symphony by Emanuel Bach, and Mr. Stanford's Hymn "Awake, my heart."

At a meeting of the "Society of Professional Musicians," recently held at Manchester, Dr. Hiles read a paper on "Musical Education in England," in which he earnestly urged the claims of the art, and suggested that, in addition to the various seminaries for literature, science, and drawing, music schools should be spread throughout the country. After the reading of the paper, Mr. Wrigley eloquently advocated the principle about to be established under the auspices of the Royal Academy of Music, of opening branch schools in the principal provincial centres. Ultimately it was decided that the council should be requested to frame a resolution to be forwarded to the proper authorities in London, upon the subject of musical education, after the question has been further considered at the next meeting, to be held in Liverpool on the 2nd inst.

WE gladly give insertion to the following "Caution to the Public," which has been forwarded to us from the Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard:—

A man, age about 36, height 5 ft. 6 in., complexion fair, hair, moustache and whiskers (slight) brown; shaved on chin; eyes dark and searching; slight build, dress dark coat and vest, grey trousers; gentlemanly appearance; is in the habit of calling on organists and other members of the musical profession; invariably representing himself to be the son or nephew of some well-known organist or organ-builder, and that he is at the present time either an organist of Liverpool or of Montreal Cathedral, Canada. During the temporary absence of the person he calls upon, he abstracts whatever valuable article may be to hand; and under the pretence of having lost his purse obtains an advance of money. He also states that he has had a letter of introduction from some well-known man in the musical world; but has unfortunately lost it. Any information respecting this man will be gladly received by The Director of Criminal Investigation, Great Scotland Yard.

HAYDN'S Oratorio, "The Creation," was given in St. Stephen's Church, Westminster, on Thursday, October 26, as an anthem at the Harvest Festival. A large congregation filled every available portion of the Church, and hundreds were unable to obtain admission. There was an efficient orchestra composed of well known members of the profession, led by Mr. Dean Grimson. The solo parts were rendered by Madame Worrell, Messrs. Charles Chilly and Frank Ward, all of whom were highly successful. The Choir numbered about a hundred voices, and gave evidence of good training, reflecting great credit on Mr. W. H. Baker, the Choirmaster. Mr. Henry Baker conducted, and Mr. Trotter was the Organist.

A Musical Service was held in St. Philip's Church, Regent Street, on Thursday evening, October 26, when the new chancel was opened, and a Harvest Thanksgiving celebrated. An efficient orchestra assisted in the accompaniments, and the organ was replaced by a pianoforte and large harmonium, the Organist of the church presiding at the former instrument. A large body of singers, including the St. Philip's choir and the choirs of the Parish Church, Camden Town; St. James's, Hampstead Road; and St. Matthew's, City Road (guild choir), gave great effect to the music. Mr. A. H. Crowest, the director of the choir at St. Philip's, conducted throughout.

AN Organ Recital, interspersed with vocal music, was given at the Church of St. John, Waterloo Road, on Tuesday, the 21st ult., by Mr. Henry J. Dart, Organist of the Church. The instrumental selection included Mendelssohn's First Organ Sonata, Handel's Cuckoo and Nightingale Concerto, the short Prelude and Fugue in C minor by Bach, and several other works; the vocal music being contributed by Miss May Moon and Mr. Ruthven Finlayson, both of the Royal Academy of Music, the former of whom sang Cherubini's "Saviour of sinners" and Handel's "Angels, ever bright and fair," and the latter Mendelssohn's "O God, have mercy" and "It is enough."

ON Saturday, the 4th ult., Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" was performed, in the place of the regular weekly Organ Recital, at the Bow and Bromley Institute. The choruses were sung by the choir of the Institute, and the solos by Miss Marianne Fenna, Mr. Alfred Kenningham and Mr. Kempton—the composer, Dr. Stainer, presiding at the organ, and Mr. W. G. McNaught, A.R.A.M., conducting. The large audience followed the performance with the greatest interest, and at the close gave the composer an enthusiastic ovation. The hall was quite filled long before the time of performance, and many hundreds were turned away.

THE 166th monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms on the 3rd ult. The programme was miscellaneous. The solo vocalists, were Miss Alice Roselli, Miss N. Watts, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. C. Pounds, Mr. R. E. Miles and Mr. Theodore Distin. Pianoforte selections were contributed by Miss E. Mahon. The part-singing by the choir included "Silent night" (Barnby), "The hunt's up" (G. A. Macfarren), "Where art thou, beam of light?" (Bishop), &c. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Smithers, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE first Annual Choral (Dedication) Festival was held at All Saints', Clapton, on All Saints' Day, when the choirs present numbered over 100 voices. The anthem was "O give thanks" (Goss), and Handel's "Hallelujah" was sung as an act of praise before the Benediction. The Lord Bishop of Colchester preached an eloquent sermon. Dr. J. Gordon Saunders, of St. John's, Hackney, presided at the organ, and Mr. Wm. M. Wait, Organist and Choir-master, conducted and played the concluding voluntary. The service was repeated on the following Sunday, being within the octave.

THE Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in Christ Church, Woburn Square, on Thursday evening, October 26, when the regular choir was augmented by the choirs of St. George's, Bloomsbury, St. Giles's, and the boys of Lincoln's Inn. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was sung to Stainer in A, and the anthem was "He in tears that soweth" and "Praise the Lord," from Hiller's "Song of victory," all of which were admirably rendered. "The heavens are telling," from "The Creation," was also sung before the Benediction. Mr. E. H. Turpin ably conducted, and Mr. W. G. Wood presided at the organ.

IN a book recently issued by Cassell, Petter, Galpin and Co., called "The History of the Year," an article appears upon the musical events of the past season. As forming an important portion of the year's history, it fits well into its place in the volume; but the paper contains little beyond a catalogue of the subjects mentioned. We note with much satisfaction, however, that a record of the events of the year is now not considered complete without including those connected with music.

THE Meadowcroft Memorial Prize, offered annually through the College of Organists, for a four-part Anthem, has this year been awarded to Dr. Henry Hiles, of Manchester. There were no fewer than sixty-nine manuscripts sent in for the competition, and of these one, bearing the motto "Pro patria semper"—the composition of Mr. C. E. Miller—was selected by the judges for "special commendation." The prize on this occasion was a double one of the value of sixteen guineas, the compositions sent in last year not having sufficiently satisfied the umpires to justify them in making the award.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of Handel's Oratorio "Samson," in St. John's Church, Kilburn, on Thursday, the 2nd ult. The soloists were Miss Alice Brooks, Miss Tomalin, Mr. A. Montagu Shepherd, Mr. Albert Orme, and Mr. Harben. A second performance of the Oratorio was given by the choir, on Wednesday, the 15th ult., in St. Paul's Church, London Docks, the soloists being Miss Agnes Allen, Mrs. Oram, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Albert Orme, and Mr. Ap Herbert. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ.

THE Dedication Festival of the church of All Saints, Margaret Street, was observed on Wednesday, the 1st ult. At the High Celebration the music selected was Hummel's Mass in B flat, adapted to the requirements of the English Communion Office, and at Evensong J. Barnby's Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in E flat (composed for the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, in 1881) was the service, and Sir George Elvey's "I beheld and lo" the anthem. The whole of the musical arrangements were under the direction of the organist and choir-master of the church, Mr. W. S. Hoyte.

THE prospectus of the London Musical Society announces for its fifth season, 1882-83, two Concerts, to be given at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, March 14, and Thursday evening, June 21, the programmes of which will include the following works:—"Stabat Mater," Anton Dvorák; "Messe Solennelle de Pâques," Ch. Gounod—both performed by the Society for the first time in England—"Manfred," Schumann, &c., &c. We are glad to say that the Society remains under the able conductorship of Mr. Joseph Barnby.

WE understand that the members of the Strolling Players' Amateur Dramatic Club have resolved at this, the beginning of their eighth season, to form an Orchestral Society, to be incorporated with the Dramatic Club; and that it is intended to invite lady instrumentalists to participate in the advantages of the society as orchestral members. The band will meet once a-week for the study of high-class music, under the conductorship of Mr. Norfolk Mengone, late Hon-conductor of the Royal School of Mines Orchestral Society.

THE reopening, after repairs, of the organ at St. Saviour's Church, Herne Hill Road, took place on Sunday, the 19th ult. The evening service included the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to W. S. Hoyte in B flat; anthem, "Plead Thou my cause" (Mozart); and Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus. The choral singing was very satisfactory throughout. Mr. John Harrison presided at the instrument, playing the overture to Handel's "Samson" as a concluding voluntary.

UNDER the direction of Mr. W. H. Holmes, organist of All Saints', South Lambeth, an excellent Concert was given at the Institute, Priory Grove, on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., the proceeds being devoted to the District Visiting Fund. The principal vocalists were Madame Worrell, Miss Marian Burton, Misses Edith Umpelby and Sarah Mears, R.A.M.; Messrs. Arthur Thomas, James Budd, and Collins Frost. Mr. W. H. Holmes accompanied, assisted by Mr. C. B. Budd.

THE annual performance of "The Messiah" by the Royal Society of Musicians took place at St. James's Hall, on the 24th ult. The soloists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Jessie Jones, Madame Isabel Fassett, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. F. King and Mr. Hilton. Principal violin, Mr. Carrodus; trumpet, Mr. Harper; organist, Dr. E. J. Hopkins. Mr. Barnby conducted for the first time at these Concerts.

THE South London Choral Association gave its first Concert of the season at the Institute of Music, Camberwell, on Tuesday evening, the 7th ult., when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was performed. The choral portion of the oratorio was interpreted with that excellence which always characterises the work of the choir. The principal vocalists were Madame Lita Jarratt, Miss Marie Newton, Miss McClean, and Mr. John Williams. Mr. Leonard C. Venables conducted with his customary precision.

THE following gentlemen will act this year as honorary adjudicators of the musical prizes annually offered for competition by the Academical Board of Trinity College, London: Quartet for pianoforte, violin, viola and violoncello (ten guineas and gold medal), Sir Michael Costa; Essay on a musical subject (gold medal), Mr. G. A. Osborne; Choral or hymn-tune prize (three guineas), Dr. Longhurst; Musical history prizes (three guineas and two guineas), Dr. Gordon Saunders.

THE Belle Sauvage Glee Union opened the season with a Dinner at Anderton's Hotel on Thursday, the 9th ult.—J. Hamer, Esq., in the chair—followed by a Musical Entertainment. Some glees were excellently rendered, and solos were given by Mr. Flegg, Mr. S. W. Beckley, and Mr. F. Crowest. Mr. G. F. Bruce presided at the pianoforte, and the musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. C. H. Hewitt.

AN evening Concert was given at Wellington Hall, Islington, on Wednesday, the 15th ult., when the following artists rendered valuable service: Miss Ethel Harwood, Miss Amy Smith, Miss Annie Young, Mr. Alfred Probert, Mr. Henry Warne, Mr. Hector Hillier, and the band of the Cornelius Musical Society. Mr. Walter Lockitt was an efficient accompanist, and the Concert proved a great success.

A HARVEST Festival Service was held at Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, on the evening of October 26. The choir of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, combined with that of the Church in giving excellent renderings of Hubert Parry's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D and Goss's anthem, "Fear not, O land." The sermon was preached by the Vicar, the Rev. Canon Boyd Carpenter, and Dr. F. E. Gladstone presided at the organ.

MR. WALTER WESCHÉ was the organist at the Saturday Recital at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 11th ult. The programme included the Overture to "Athalie," Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D minor, and the Andante from the "Surprise" Symphony. Miss Clara Myers was the vocalist, Miss Adelina Dinelli contributed solos on the violin, and Mr. Guiseppé accompanied.

THE Assembly Musical Society gave a successful Concert at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on Thursday evening, the 16th ult. The principal artists, all of whom were well received, were Misses Margaret Hoare, R.A.M. and Grace Godolphin; Messrs. Edward Collins, Arthur Thompson, Albert James, Edward Moss, Franklin Clive, and Collins Frost. Mr. S. Physick accompanied.

It has been decided to continue during the coming season the Drawing-room Concerts at Nottingham, which were originated last year, and to which we drew attention in this journal. Three performances are to be given, and amongst the artists engaged are to be found some of the most eminent performers of chamber music. The first Concert was announced for the 30th ult.

MR. VILLIERS STANFORD has nearly completed a grand Opera on the subject of Savonarola. The work consists of a prologue and three acts, and the libretto has been written by Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett. In view of the success of Mr. Stanford's former opera "The Veiled Prophet," when produced last year in Germany, the new work will be looked forward to with much interest.

WE have received a letter from Bristol respecting our remarks upon the want of sufficient rehearsals at the recent Festival. As we found no fault with the choir, our correspondent's defence of the excellent body of vocalists of which he is a member is unnecessary, and there can be no reason, therefore, for reopening the subject.

SPOHR's "Last Judgment" is to be sung at St. Stephen's Church, Westminster, on Wednesday, the 6th inst., and Handel's "Messiah," with orchestral accompaniments, on Thursday, the 21st. The soloists will be Mesdames Worrell and Emma Buer, Messrs. C. Chilley and Frank Ward; Conductor Mr. Henry Baker.

WE are informed that Mr. Julian Adams has, during the present year, conducted a series of twenty-five concerts at St. Leonards-on-Sea, and 182 at Eastbourne, assisted by some of our most eminent vocalists and his own band of thirty performers. We are glad to add that the programmes of these concerts have invariably been of a high class.

A CONCERT will be given at Langham Hall, Great Portland Street on the 14th inst., by Mr. A. Schliebner, on which occasion his setting of the 13th Psalm will be sung by the members of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, the Countess Leiningen assisting in the solo part.

THE special Advent Service at St. Paul's Cathedral, at which Spohr's "Last Judgment" is sung in its entirety, will take place on Tuesday next, the 5th inst., commencing at seven p.m. The admission to the cathedral is free, without ticket.

UNDER the heading "Cambridge University Intelligence," it is announced in a morning contemporary that F. E. Gladstone, Mus. Doc.; R. Pendlebury, M.A., John's; and H. C. Banister, Professor at the Royal Academy of Music, are appointed Examiners in Music for 1883.

THE Civil Service Vocal Union gave its first Smoking Concert of the season at Ashley's Hotel, Covent Garden, on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult. Mr. J. H. Maunder conducted.

WE understand that Mr. H. W. Wareing, Mus. Bac., has been elected Conductor of the Worcester Musical Society, in the place of Mr. A. J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., resigned.

A VERY successful Organ Recital was given in Finchley Parish Church, by the Organist, Mr. A. A. Yeatman, on Tuesday evening, the 21st ult. The programme included compositions by Handel, Henry Smart, Bach, Merkel, &c.

WE regret to announce the decease of Mr. Francis Howell, the composer of "The Land of Promise," and several other works, many of which are frequently performed, especially in Australia.

REVIEWS.

Franz Liszt, Artist and Man (1811-1840). By L. Ramann. Translated from the German by Miss E. Cowdery. Two vols. [W. H. Allen & Co., 1882.]

HERDER has made the ironical observation somewhere that the least we can demand of a piece of poetry is that, even if converted into the language of prose, it shall still convey some sort of a meaning to the reader. It may be urged, in an inverted sense, that the least we can expect from the translation of a literary work is that it shall not misrepresent or distort the ideas set forth in the original. To maintain that the translator of the present work has succeeded in fulfilling even this moderate condition would be gross flattery. Miss Cowdery possesses neither a sufficient knowledge of German nor the requisite familiarity with musical technicalities to qualify her for the task she has undertaken, and she consequently exhibits the fact on almost every page of the two volumes before us. Indeed, it is not unfrequently quite impossible to divine the meaning intended to be conveyed by the translator, without referring to the parallel passages contained in the original work. Or else, what are we to make of sentences such as the following (vol. I., p. 134):—"The extension of the relationship of different keys, as this master (Beethoven) has practically taught in his works, is already shown in the 'Allegro' (Liszt's) passed over bodily"—which, apart from its defective grammatical construction, would seem to attribute to "le petit Litz" qualities of a voltigeur—viz., in "passing bodily over" so abstract a thing as the relationship of the keys—more remarkable even than those exhibited by him on the keyboard. Turning to the author for an explanation, we find that what was actually said with reference to the views demonstrated by Beethoven concerning the affinity of keys, was that they were, with Liszt, in Fleisch und Blut übergegangen, i.e., that he had made them his own from an early period of his career. In another place (Vol. I., p. 299) "instrumental painting" is spoken of as a "region of art," while almost in the same breath we are correctly informed that "tone painting is not the aim of composition; it is a technical aid in the expression of ideas, things which are often confounded. Berlioz," it is added, "has made them one and the same." The absurdity of the added sentence is partly explained by the use made in the original of the somewhat doubtful words zu demselben, which, however, clearly refer only to the "aid in the expression of ideas" to which, in the author's opinion, Berlioz has raised what the Germans call Tonmalerei. Again, who is not reminded of Goethe's quaint saying, "We are apt to fancy, when listening to mere words, that some thought might be contained therein," in reading the following effusion referring to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony: "The 'lyric' of the symphony lends a dramatic charm and raises itself to the region of consciousness, of thought, and idea," which furnishes one more instance, from among a multitude of others that might be quoted, of the distortion of the original at the hands of the translator. It would be difficult, however, to conceive anything more ludicrous in this direction than Miss Cowdery's rendering of the passage commencing in the original with "Heinrich Laube's mensur-und pauk-verwandtes Wort"; a phrase borrowed from the vocabulary of German academic youth, and intended to characterise the braggadocio spirit of certain words uttered by the poet Laube. A literal rendering is here practically impossible. But Miss Cowdery has great faith in her dictionary, and finding therein both the word mensur and pauke, she cheerfully translates (vol. i., p. 316): "Heinrich Laube's diapason and kettledrum words," (sic) leaving it to her readers to divine the probable import of such terrible language!

Other more abstruse and equally untranslatable (except by analogy) German compound words Miss Cowdery attacks with a confidence which, we should think, only a superficial acquaintance with the language can inspire. Thus she speaks of the "universal contents" (i.e., Welt-Inhalt) of a symphony, and the like. We have, however, we think, quoted more than enough for the purpose of justifying the severity of our opening remarks respecting the merits or rather demerits of the present volumes, and should indeed scarcely have devoted so much of our space to the matter but for the artistic importance of the work itself, whereof they profess to be a translation. Of the latter, i.e., Fräulein Lina Ramann's biography of Liszt (so far as it has yet been published) we have already spoken at some length at the time of its appearance some two years since. It is a work dictated on its every page by the most fervent enthusiasm for its hero, and as such frequently makes use of diction the exuberance of which presents peculiar difficulties to the translator; difficulties which, while admitting their existence, it must, in justice to the author, be allowed Miss Cowdery has shown herself quite incapable to cope withal.

Balfe: His Life and Work. By William Alexander Barrett. [Remington and Co.]

In considering the career of Balfe it has been too much the custom with musicians of the present day to judge him according to the position he would have occupied had he lived amongst a musically educated people, and composed operas in consonance with, if not in advance of, the cultured taste of the time. Mr. Barrett, in the work before us, has wisely, therefore, written an introductory chapter giving a graphic sketch of the state of music in this country when the young, and certainly gifted, composer produced his opera, "The Siege of Rochelle," at Drury Lane Theatre, and thus laid the foundation of his fame in England. The extraordinary success of this work, although due chiefly, no doubt, to the excellence of the music, was partly owing to the novelty of the entertainment provided for what may be termed a popular audience, many of whom had probably never before heard an opera such as was then placed before them. Fitzball, the author of the libretto, speaking of its production, says: "It was a glorious sight, the first night of 'The Siege of Rochelle'—one to wish your whole life long the first night of a new play or a new opera. The cram there was, the fashion, the delicious music, the enthusiastic applause, the double encores, never had I witnessed anything like it. 'Vive le Roy,' 'Lo, the early beam of morning,' 'When I beheld the anchor weighed,' and 'The cottage near Rochelle,' were especial marks of approbation, and had an immense sale at the publishers, then Addison and Beale, in Regent Street." The name of Balfe was now everywhere heard; his songs were sung in drawing-rooms, and boys whistled them in the streets. He had sought popularity and worthily gained it; yet we cannot agree with Mr. Barrett that "musicians trembled at his innovations and daring ideas, and tried to make themselves believe that they were all wrong." There were indeed many musicians of the time who envied his gift of melody, but his operas certainly did not contain any "daring ideas" which could make his brother artists "tremble." Balfe had met Malibran during his travels, and promised to write an opera in which she should perform the principal part; and when Bunn engaged this great vocalist at the large sum of £120 per night, he commissioned Balfe to compose an opera for her to a libretto which he enclosed, written by himself, and entitled "The Maid of Artois." Whether this union with the "poet Bunn," as he was afterwards nicknamed, had or had not an injurious effect upon the style of Balfe we will not here discuss; but certain it is that as long as their friendship lasted the operas they produced were moulded in a form which, although thoroughly recognised, was not of a very high order. "The Maid of Artois" was another triumph for the composer, and the ballad "The light of other days," with the symphony played on the cornet—then unknown in the orchestra—produced an extraordinary effect, and made the fortune of the publisher of the song. There was a slight lull in the labours of Balfe after the production of the Operas "Catherine Grey," "Joan of Arc," "Diadeste," and "Falstaff"—the last-named being written and produced with much success at Her Majesty's Theatre, in Italian. Mr. Barrett tells us that on Balfe's return from Dublin, "the Brothers Barnett" had arranged a scheme for opening the St. James's Theatre with English Opera; but in truth this unfortunate venture was undertaken by John Barnett, the composer of the Opera, "The Mountain Sylph," and Morris Barnett, a highly popular actor, the partners being intimate friends, but not in the slightest degree related. When Balfe took the "English Opera House" the public looked somewhat coldly upon the speculation; yet the production of one of his most beautiful Operas, "Keolanthè," with Madame Balfe as the heroine, enabled him to continue a short but tolerably prosperous season, which Mr. Barrett truly says "was brought to an end by the disloyalty of the artists." Then came his journey to Paris, his meeting with Scribe, who wrote the libretto of the Opera "Le Puits d'Amour," which was set by Balfe and produced with much success at the Opéra Comique; and the performance of perhaps his most popular Opera, "The Bohemian Girl," at Drury Lane Theatre, then under the lesseeship of Mr. Bunn. In 1846 he became Conductor at Her Majesty's Theatre, one of his achievements in this capacity being the writing of Recitatives to the dialogue portions of Beethoven's "Fidelio," "The Bondman," "The Maid of Honour," and "The Rose of Castille" were amongst the best of his operas afterwards produced; but the list of his works, drawn up by himself, amounts to twenty-seven. With so prolific a composer we can scarcely expect equality of merit in his operas; but his melodies were always genial, popular, and thoroughly vocal. It is nothing to assert that he appealed to the multitude: in his day he was a "representative" man, for he created a taste which never degenerated. His fame deserves to be perpetuated by his countrymen, and we are glad, therefore, to find that a tablet to his memory has been placed in Westminster Abbey, and that a record of his "Life and Work" has been entrusted to so able and zealous an admirer of his talent as Mr. W. A. Barrett.

Philippi. A Sacred Cantata, or Church Oratorio. The words selected from the Scriptures by the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, M.A. The music composed by Francis Edward Gladstone, Mus. Doc., Cantab. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE words of this Cantata—recording the acts of SS. Paul and Silas in Macedonia—are exceedingly well selected for musical illustration, and the composition, avowedly designed for a “Church Oratorio,” will no doubt incite other composers to increase the list of such important contributions to our store of sacred works, especially when they can unite their talents with so zealous and conscientious an ally as Mr. Metcalfe. The purely religious style of Dr. Gladstone is admirably suited for the subject he has chosen; for although throughout the Cantata he has most sympathetically coloured the incidents of the narrative, in no part has he been betrayed into an ultra dramatic setting of the events which would in the slightest degree unfit the work for the sacred locality which should be its natural home. The unaccompanied Chorus which forms the Prologue, “How beautiful upon the mountains,” is an excellent example of pure and melodious four-part writing; and amongst the other choral movements, we must select for especial praise the Chorus of Disciples, “Why do the heathen,” the Chorus of Freed Prisoners, “We will rejoice,” and the final Chorus, “Now unto God.” The duet, “Thou, O Lord,” and the unaccompanied quintet, “Rejoice in the Lord,” must also be mentioned in terms of high admiration. The solos, too, breathe the spirit of true devotion, the soprano air, “O the depth,” perhaps taking higher rank than the others in a popular sense; although there is not even a Recitative which does not prove that the composer has really had his heart in the work. No doubt the Cantata would be additionally effective with the full orchestral accompaniments; but we are glad to find that a special organ part may be procured separately, which should certainly be used in the absence of a band. The growth of the “Church Oratorio” is a significant sign of the time; and sympathising as we do with the plan and design of such compositions, we heartily welcome so excellent a specimen as the one now under notice.

There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun. Anthem for Four Voices. Composed by Sir John Goss. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

QUITE apart from its intrinsic merits, this Anthem will, without doubt, excite much interest amongst the very many ardent admirers of the genius of the late Organist of St. Paul's. It was left in an unfinished state at the death of the composer, and the difficult operation of completing it has been undertaken by Dr. Arthur Sullivan, whose few remarks by way of preface we append:—

“This Anthem was left by the late Sir John Goss completed down to the fifty-seventh bar. Numerous sketches altered and modified testify to the difficulty he seemed to encounter in continuing from that point. As none of them were satisfactory to him, I have not made use of them, but have continued and finished the Anthem in the endeavour to preserve the characteristics of his writing.”

To hear the first ten bars is quite sufficient to set aside all doubt as to who the composer is. We recognise an old and well-tried friend in one of his good moods. The general style of the writing, the broad, dignified and thoroughly vocal subjects, the knowledge of choral resource, all point to the composer of “Stand up and bless the Lord” and other anthems of even a more elevated stamp.

Dr. Sullivan's share is by no means unimportant. The part which immediately follows the fifty-seventh bar, to the words “And Israel shall dwell in safety, and the heavens shall drop down dew,” is entirely new, is exactly what was required in the way of contrast to what had gone before, and must be reckoned as an important feature. Shortly after this the resumption of the opening theme takes place, and from this point to the end Dr. Sullivan has carefully made use of ideas which occur early in the Anthem, and has contrived to imitate Sir John Goss's individuality of style with much success; at the same time, it must be admitted that he does not entirely hide his own personality, and we may add that we are very glad of it.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer. The Violoncello. By Jules De Swert. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE demand for able and popular Instruction-books for stringed instruments has so increased within the last few years that we may confidently predict for this latest addition to “Novello's Primers” an extensive sale. The violoncello is rapidly becoming a favourite amongst those cultivated amateurs who devote themselves more to the performance of classical chamber music than to that of orchestral works; and the use of this instrument in the domestic circle is likely to be still further increased when the first and second violins in quartets become more entrusted to the ladies of a family. It is impossible to imagine a tutor more sympathetic with the requirements of students, both of the instrument which it teaches, and of music itself, than the one before us; for not only are the important matters of bowing and holding the violoncello clearly explained (the latter by an excellent illustration), but the work commences with a short exposition of notes, clefs, and time. The exercises throughout show that the author has fully studied his subject, those upon double stops—in practising which the pupil is wisely recommended to play very slowly, in order to ensure purity of tone—and upon harmonics being especially well considered. We should certainly not recommend the study of the violoncello without the aid of a master; but should any enthusiastic amateur resolve to dispense with such assistance, we are certain that he can have no more reliable guide than the work under notice.

La Rédemption. Trilogie Sacrée. Paroles et Musique de Charles Gounod.

Die Erlösung. Geistliche Trilogie. Verfasst und Compoirt von Charles Gounod. Die Deutsche Übersetzung von Josef Weyl.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE Octavo Editions of Gounod's popular oratorio—the one with French and the other with German words—will be warmly welcomed in the countries for which they are especially designed; but apart from this demand, which no doubt has led to so prompt a supply, there will be much interest in England, where the work was first heard, to see the original words united with the notes of the many pieces which have now become familiar in their translated form. A careful perusal of the French text shows that the composer in compiling his own libretto has evidently felt the music in every word; and bearing this in mind, much credit must be given to him for adhering so closely to the Scriptural text. The German version is excellent in every respect. It is easy enough to give a German rendering of the words, but to convey the spirit of each sentence when allied with music requires sympathy as well as knowledge, and this important requisite Herr Weyl undoubtedly evidences throughout his translation. The publication of the editions under notice sufficiently proves that the interest of the work is by no means confined to England; and, as we are informed that the copyright for Italy has been sold to Lucca, of Milan, for whom an Italian version will be prepared forthwith, it will be seen that the work is advancing on its travels throughout the musical world with a rapidity quite unprecedented. As in the editions with English words, the pianoforte accompaniment is by Mr. Berthold Tours.

Studi Critico-Musicali di Francis Hueffer. Tradotti dall' originale Inglese da Alberto Visetti. [Milano: Ulrico Hoepli.]

THERE can be no doubt of the increasing interest shown of recent years by cultivated Italian dilettanti, and finding an echo in Italian journals devoted to the art—witness among others the newly-founded and admirably-conducted Archivio Musicale of Naples—in the modern development of music, as represented outside the limits of their country. In these circumstances the present issue of an Italian edition of Mr. Hueffer's “Musical Studies”—upon the prominent merits of which we fully commented at the time of their publication in 1880—while furnishing confirmatory evidence in the direction indicated, appears to be peculiarly opportune. Mr. Hueffer has a good deal to say that is new and calculated to widen the views of the reader concerning the various phases of modern musical thought and art-aspirations, and he says it, moreover, extremely well. His literary style, indeed, being both lucid and animated, presents no special difficulties to the translator, and has, as a matter of fact, been well preserved, as far as its main characteristics are concerned, in its present Italian garb. Some of the minor essays on recent French operas, which appeared in the original volume, are here omitted, and have been appropriately substituted by the author's interesting comments in The Times on that most remarkable of modern Italian operatic productions, viz., Arrigo Boito's "Mefistofele." As we have already indicated, Signor Visetti, the translator, has performed his office—never an easy one under any circumstances—both ably and judiciously. We may add, however, that a number of mis-spelt proper names has unfortunately remained uncorrected. It would also have been advisable to have substituted, in a translation, the original German titles of some of Wagner's operas, such as "Rheingold" and "Walküre" for their Anglicised equivalents. These, however, are matters easily amended in a subsequent edition, which, we presume, in the interests of Italian amateurs, will ere long become necessary. The volume is neatly got up, and is prefaced by some eulogistic observations regarding the author's activity as a leading contributor to the field of high-class art-literature in this country.

The Office of the Holy Communion, in C. By George C. Martin, Mus. Bac., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOTHING could better illustrate the great advance which has recently taken place in the musical ordering of the Service, even in our cathedrals, than the multiplicity of settings of the Communion Office. Formerly a "Sanctus and Responses" comprised all that was sung in this most solemn portion of the Liturgy; but a better spirit now prevails, and Mr. Martin, following the practice of the metropolitan cathedral of which he is sub-organist, has given us three offertory sentences, the Sursum corda, the Nicene Creed, and the Gloria in Excelsis. Some settings include the Benedictus and the Agnus Dei, but, as there is no authority for these in the Prayer Book, they are only useful in churches where extreme ritual prevails. The present Service is by no means unduly elaborate for ordinary use, though a note on the title-page—that orchestral parts may be had—suggests the idea that it was written for festival purposes. At the outset we are slightly puzzled, for although the setting is said to be in C, the Kyrie, save for the two opening bars, is in E flat. The longer movements, however, are all in the first-named key. The Credo opens brightly in 3-4 time, and a bold effect occurs at the seventeenth bar, where the dominant seventh in E changes to the same chord in C. Other instances of greater freedom in transitions of key might be quoted, but Mr. Martin writes throughout like a practical musician, and though his progressions are frequently unconventional they are never crude. Speaking generally the music is more effective in a harmonic than a melodic sense, and the devices of counterpoint are very sparingly employed. There are no difficulties but such as may be overcome by a choir of ordinary efficiency, and the Service may be strongly recommended as one in which modern feeling is blended with church-like solemnity of style.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Otto Gumprecht, the able Berlin critic, makes the following appropriate remarks, at the beginning of the present musical season, in the National Zeitung: "The candidature en masse of the fair sex for virtuosships is a positively morbid symptom of the age. Parents should reflect twice, nay thrice before bringing up their daughters for an artistic career, or even for that merely of music-teachers. The all-important question of talent is generally the last which is consulted in such cases. And yet milliners and sempstresses are far more useful and cheerful members of society than are those pitiable creatures who without any true calling for the art, have been drilled into pianists in order to become a lifelong burden to themselves and others. The pianoforte especially, with its ready-made notes protected against all impurities of intonation, encourages to an ominous degree this deplorable state of things. Enough of abuse is carried on on the keyboard year after year in the family and in the salons, and to prevent its flourishing likewise in our public concert-rooms is an imperative duty of critics. No consideration whatever should prevent their tapping most energetically upon all mechanically trained pianoforte fingers. Our concert-halls are places consecrated to art, not exhibition windows for music-teachers' addresses, nor even passport offices for travelling musicians to obtain their metropolitan visés." The writer who still thinks, with a shudder, of the interminable pianoforte tweedledum and tweedledee of last season may be excused these remarks. The matter has, in fact, a very serious side. How much time and strength is not annually wasted in the acquisition of the most thankless and unprofitable finger-bravura? Even where there is talent the career of a pianoforte virtuoso is nowadays beset with thorns. To it may be literally applied the words once spoken by Goethe with regard to poetical productions: "The whole mischief is caused by the fact that, in consequence of the general spread of literary culture in Germany, nobody any longer writes absolutely bad verses. The young authors who send their poetic productions to me are no worse than their predecessors whom they hear so greatly praised, and they cannot therefore, comprehend why they should not be praised likewise. And yet one dare not do anything for their encouragement, just because such talents now exist by hundreds, and one ought not to further the growth of the superfluous while there remains yet so much of the useful to be done. . . . The world's requirements can only be satisfied by the extraordinary!"

The Leipzig Signale says: "A letter by Richard Wagner, of the year 1873, wherein the poet-composer confers with a person (whose name does not transpire) concerning the programme of a projected concert at Dresden, was included in one of the recent sales of autographs at Berlin. The letter is interesting as containing the following passage: 'I regret to observe that Herr ——— persists in his intention of including the "Ritt der Walküren," a piece which is in every way disagreeable to me' . . . Let the master beware. If one of the Wagner fanatics reads this dictum of his, it will go hard with him!"

Messrs. Breitkopf und Härtel, of Leipzig, announce the imminent publication, in annual series, of the complete works of Grétry, "the creator of comic opera," which will be issued under the auspices of the Belgian commission for the publication of the works by national Belgian composers. The issue will commence next month with the Opera "Richard Cœur de Lion" as the opening number, and is to be completed in 1893, when it will comprise thirty-three operatic works by the composer in question.

Madame Pauline Lucca, in reply to the remark of an interviewer that Wagner's operas had proved ruinous to the finest voices, is reported to have declared this assertion to be an entire fable, adding: "Neither Wagner nor any other composer will ruin the voice of one who really knows how to sing. Our singers of the present day, however, fancy themselves finished artists and fit to appear before the public when they have only studied for a twelvemonth; six years of diligent application being at least required to train the voice according to the rules of the art." The great vocalist also declared her intention of, at some future time, taking a professorship at the Vienna Conservatoire, where she would endeavour to perpetuate the art of singing as it had been handed down to her.

Rumours of an existing autobiography from the pen of Franz Liszt having been for some time in circulation, the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung has elicited the following denial of the statement from the Abbé himself: "Of the existence of my regularly kept-up autobiography I know as yet nothing. I have several times been requested by publishers to write my memoirs but have in every instance declined, since it is more than sufficient to me to live my life through without committing it to paper."

The recent first performance at the Leipzig Stadt Theater of Rubinstein's Opera "Die Maccabäer" was, it is stated, an eminently successful one, the composer being present on the occasion.

At the Berlin Opera a new operatic work, entitled "Raimondin," the composer of which is Herr Carl Perfall, was produced last month as the first novelty this season, without, however, achieving more than a succès d'estime.

The performances last month, at Berlin, of Wagner's "Nibelungen" have been so entirely successful as to induce Herr Angelo Neumann to add a fourth representation of the complete cycle to the three originally projected. The energetic impresario of the itinerant Wagner-Theater is said to have entered into negotiations respecting the performance of the Tetralogy next year at St. Petersburg.

Herr Louis Lüstner, the excellent Wiesbaden conductor, commenced a series of symphony concerts at the Curhaus on October 27. We have already more than once drawn attention to the sterling character of these performances the scheme of which has been enlarged this season, both as regards the number of important works which will obtain a hearing and the eminent artists co-operating.

At the Padeloup Concert of Paris, on the 12th ult., Madame Roger-Miclos, the gifted pianist, achieved a great success in a Concerto (No. 3) by George Pfeiffer, and is engaged to play the same work at the Concert Populaire de Lille on the 19th inst.

An almost-forgotten opera by Verdi, "Simon Boccanegra," has just been revived at the Vienna Hoftheater with good success. M. Gounod's "Le Tribut de Zamora" is shortly to be produced for the first time at the same establishment, with Madame Pauline Lucca in the rôle of Hermosa.

A comic opera by the rising Bohemian composer, Anton Dvorák, entitled "Der Bauer ein Schelm," was recently produced at the Dresden Hoftheater, where it was exceedingly well received.

The centenary of the birth of the famous violinist Paganini was celebrated in Genoa by a Concert in the Paganini Theatre, and a commemorative tablet was placed in the wall of the house in which he was born.

A Times correspondent telegraphs from Philadelphia under date of the 7th ult.: "Madame Patti made her first appearance here on Monday night in the part of Lucia, before a large and fashionable audience. Her reception was exceedingly warm, and repeated calls after the third act ended in a perfect ovation. She was overwhelmed with flowers."

The same correspondent telegraphs under date 24th ult.: "Madame Christine Nilsson, who achieved a great success at Boston and Baltimore, appeared at the Philadelphia Academy of Music yesterday in a concert, and was warmly greeted by a crowded and fashionable audience. . . . She drew the highest-paying audience ever assembled in the Academy, which is the largest theatre in the country. The receipts were over 8,000 dollars."

The four hundredth performance of Meyerbeer's Opera "Les Huguenots," which was produced here for the first time in 1836, took place recently at the Vienna Hoftheater.

Joseph Eider, one of the professors of the pianoforte at the Vienna Conservatorium and a pupil of Nottebohm, died on the 2nd ult.

The deaths are announced of Adolf Gutmann on October 22, at Spezzia, and of Gustav Nottebohm, at Graz on October 31. See Obituary notice on page 675.

The death is also announced, at Wiesbaden, of Kéler Béla, the well-known composer of dance music and marches, at the age of sixty-two. He was a Hungarian by birth, his real name being Albert von Kéler.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MUSIC PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—From the advertisements which frequently appear in journals circulating principally among ladies offering to supply manuscript copies of copyright music at ridiculously low prices, it would seem the advertisers are under the impression that the making copies by hand of copyright music is no breach of the Copyright Acts.

If this be the impression under which the advertisers labour, it is high time that they should be informed of their mistake; and I therefore ask you, by publishing this letter, to acquaint the public of the fact that the multiplying copies, by any means whatever, of copyright music or other works without the sanction of the owner of the copyright, is a breach of the Copyright Acts, and subjects the offender to an action.

The Music Publishers' Association has recently been compelled to take proceedings against one lady, and to threaten proceedings against another in respect of this very offence, and has only consented to stay further proceedings on an ample apology and payment of costs being made.

In the case of similar infringements of the publishers' rights being hereafter brought to light, the offenders must expect less lenient treatment.—Your obedient servant,

H. LAWRENCE HARRIS, Secretary.

MR. ROGERS'S CANTATA "BLUE BEARD."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—While thanking you for your kindly review of my Cantata "Blue Beard" in your issue of to-day, will you allow me a few lines of your valuable space to disclaim all knowledge of any former musical setting of the subject.

As a great admirer of the inimitable humour of the late Mr. John Parry, I much regret it was never my good fortune to hear him in this particular song, so that any "unconscious reminiscence" of his composition in mine must be purely accidental.

Apologising for troubling you with so small and personal a matter—I am sir, faithfully yours,

EDMUND ROGERS.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN.—On Friday, October 27, a performance of Barnett's Cantata The Ancient Mariner was given by the Aberdeen Choral Union to a highly appreciative and enthusiastic audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Isabel Fassett, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Barrington Foote. The choruses, given by the members of the Union, under the able leadership of Mr. John Kirby, were effectively rendered. The performance of the Cantata was followed by a selection of ballads, given by the four soloists.

ACCINGTON.—The annual Concert by the Members of the Vocal Union took place in the Town Hall on the 8th ult. The work selected was Professor Macfarren's Cantata The Lady of the Lake, which was admirably rendered, the solos being taken by Members of the Union. Mr. R. H. Haworth accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. Tattersall conducted.

BELFAST.—The Concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place in the Ulster Hall on the 17th ult., was one of the greatest interest. The choruses were given with excellent effect throughout, a large portion of their success being undoubtedly due to the exertions of the Conductor, Herr Beyschlag, who in addition to directing the Concert, played two pianoforte solos with much brilliancy of execution. The vocal selections were entrusted to members of Mr. Carl Rosa's Opera Company, all of whom were most enthusiastically received.

BIRMINGHAM.—The thirteenth Festival of the Church Schools Choral Union was held at the Town Hall, on the 20th ult., under the presidency of Lord Norton. The number of vocalists amounted to about 1,000—several being scholars—and the care and precision with which the music was sung amply proved the efficiency of the teaching received by the choir. Several hymns, anthems, and part-songs were included in the programme; and Mr. Stimpson (who officiated with his usual ability at the organ) performed during the evening Guilman's solo, the "Grand Chœur," Gounod's "Wedding March," and, by desire, his own arrangement of national airs, all of which were warmly applauded. Violin solos were also contributed by Mr. F. Ward. Mr. C. J. Rankior was an able Conductor.

BRENTFORD.—A Ballad Concert was given, under the direction of Mr. H. Scott, at the Town Hall on Thursday, the 16th ult., in aid of the St. George's Parochial Library. Miss Helen Sampson, R.A.M., met with a good reception, her singing being much appreciated; Miss Harrison played two pianoforte solos in excellent style, and Mr. Arthur Vitton won warm applause for his songs. Miss Edgar, R.A.M., Miss E. Scott, Mrs. Gatey and Dr. Alexander also assisted.

BRIGHTON.—The Pianoforte Recital of Mr. E. H. Thorne, given in the Banqueting Room on the afternoon of the 1st ult., was thoroughly successful. The concert-giver was assisted by his son, Mr. Herbert Thorne, Signor Pezze (violinello) and Signorina Scalzi and Signor Conti (vocalists). The programme was well chosen and highly interesting; Chopin's Posthumous Rondo, for two pianofortes, played by Messrs. E. H. and Herbert Thorne, being a noticeable feature amongst the many pieces selected.

BURNLEY.—The first Festival of the associated choirs in the Rural Deanery of Burnley took place on Saturday afternoon, the 4th ult., in the Parish Church. The main object of this association, as stated by the Rev. Nigel Maden, Rector of West Hallam, is the improvement of church music generally, having especial regard to country choirs, whose advantages are necessarily not equal to those of towns. The united choirs, 200 in number, were aided by Mr. T. Batley's band. The entire service was a splendid performance, and reflected great credit upon the talented Conductor, Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank. Mr. Geo. C. Martin, Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, presided at the organ.

BURWOLD, NEW SOUTH WALES.—The members of the Western Suburbs Musical Society gave the first Concert of their third season in the Hall of the School of Arts on Tuesday, September 19. The principal work in the programme was the Cantata Blue Beard by Mr. Rogers, which was excellently rendered and well received. Mr. H. R. M'Lean conducted. Mr. Hugh Duff presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. F. Z. Hermann led the band.

CAMBRIDGE.—On the 14th ult. a performance of Handel's Esther was given by the Musical Society, with the following vocalists: Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. H. Blower. The orchestra, largely supplemented by a London contingent, was led by Mr. F. Ralph. The work, which is so rarely heard, was satisfactorily rendered and highly appreciated. Mr. F. Dewberry presided at the organ, and Mr. W. C. Dewberry conducted.

CHELTENHAM.—The third of a subscription series of twelve Promenade Concerts was given at the Montpellier Rotunda on the 18th ult.; vocalists, Miss Clara Dowle and Mr. C. W. Fredericks; accompanist, Mr. Von Holst; Conductor, Mr. A. G. Pollock. Miss Clara Dowle, who made her first appearance in Cheltenham, was highly successful, many of her songs being encored; and Mr. C. W. Fredericks (an old favourite in the town) was also much appreciated. Messrs. Pollock and Von Holst gave a duet for harp and piano, which was extremely well received. During the afternoon several selections were performed by the Cheltenham Military Band.

COLNBROOK.—A Concert, under the conductorship of Mr. Barnaby, was given in the Public Rooms on the 23rd ult., in aid of the Fire Brigade. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Knowles, Mr. O. Christian, and Mr. Barnaby. About £20 was cleared on the occasion.

CREWE.—The members of the Philharmonic Society opened the season in the Town Hall on Thursday evening, October 25, when Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Cantata The May Queen was performed. The principal parts were sung by Madame Laura Smart, Mr. H. Parratt, and Mr. A. McCall. The choruses were rendered in a manner reflecting the highest credit on the Conductor, Mr. F. James. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. The orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. H. Hayes, Bury, was very efficient. Mr. George Young presided at the pianoforte.

CULLOMPTON.—Mr. A. J. Gosden gave his annual Concert in the Infants' School on the 2nd ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Beattie Holt, R.A.M., Miss Gosden, Mr. W. H. Richmond, and Mr. W. H. Thomas. Miss Holt's singing was greatly admired, especially in the scena "Softly sighs" (Weber) and Sir H. Bishop's "Bid me discourse." Mr. W. Hallett contributed violin solos, and Mr. Gosden officiated as accompanist.

DERBY.—Mr. Edwin C. Owston gave the first of a series of Organ Recitals in St. Andrew's Church on Tuesday evening, October 31, before a large congregation. The programme included selections from the works of Mendelssohn, Gounod, Batiste, Rossini, Macfarren, Best, Liszt, and Lemmens. Mr. A. McCall was the vocalist.

EDINBURGH.—Madame Helen Hopekirk's Pianoforte Recital, given at the Queen Street Hall on the 18th ult., was in every respect a decided success. The playing of the bénéficiaire was thoroughly appreciated by a large audience, the programme being excellently selected to display her command of varied styles, her rendering of Schubert's Grand Fantasia in C especially producing a marked effect.—The Annual Meeting of the Edinburgh Musical Society was held in the Music Class-Room on the 23rd ult., when Sir Herbert Oakeley warmly advocated the claims of the Society, and dwelt eloquently upon the rapid advance of the art within the last few years. We regret that space will not permit of our quoting some of his excellent remarks upon the changes which have taken place in the public taste since the establishment of the many associations devoted to the spread of high-class music, but we may mention that his speech was most attentively listened to and very frequently applauded.

HALIFAX.—The annual Festival of Church Choirs in the Deanery of Halifax was held on Saturday evening, October 28, in the Parish Church. The number of the choirs who took part in the Festival was twenty-two, making a total of over 500 voices. The singing generally was excellent, both as regards the tone and the precision with which the various parts were rendered, and bore unmistakable evidence of the careful training the choirs had received from their respective choirmasters, and also to the supervision of Dr. Roberts. The psalms were sung to chants by Woodward and Dr. Roberts, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (both the composition of Dr. Roberts) were fine pieces of church music. The anthem, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion," was by Dr. Stainer, and this was sung with the greatest expression. The concluding chorus was Handel's "Let their celestial concerts all unite," from Samson. Processional and recessional hymns were sung, the hymn during the offertory being "Sweet is the work, my God, my King," set to a pleasing Italian melody. The sermon was preached by the Rev. R. Hole, M.A., Vicar of Caunton and Canon of Lincoln Cathedral, from the text "Melody in your hearts." In the course of his sermon he spoke of Dr. Roberts' preference to Magdalen College, Oxford, and said he would take with him the friendship and esteem which he had gained in Halifax. The collection was in aid of the expenses connected with the Festival.

HAMILTON, CANADA.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service in connection with Christ Church Cathedral was held on Tuesday, September 5. The music, which was well rendered, included the Harvest-tide Thanksgiving Hymn (Barnby), Responses (Tallis), Proper Psalms, 65, 111, 150, to single Anglican chants by Crotch, Tallis and Humphreys, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Dr. Stainer) set to irregular chants, and Anthem, "Fear not, O land" (C. H. Lloyd). The Rev. R. G. Sutherland intoned the Service, and the Rev. O. J. Booth was the preacher. The musical portion of the Service was under the direction of the Organist, Mr. W. E. Fairclough.

HARROGATE.—On Monday, the 6th ult., a very successful Concert was given in St. James's Hall, the first part consisting of selections from Cowen's Rose Maiden, and the second part being miscellaneous. The vocalists were Miss Fannie Sellers, Miss Eliza Thomas, R.A.M., Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. Brereton, R.A.M. Mr. J. Shaw presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. Musgrove at the American organ.

HULL.—The Vocal Society, established in 1850, having been re-organised and higher subscriptions introduced, full band accompaniments will be substituted for those formerly given on the pianoforte and harmonium, and soloists of eminence engaged. The first Concert of the season is arranged for the 11th inst., when Gade's Psyche will be performed, with Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Frederick King as Psyche and Eros. The efforts of the Committee have met with great success, and the Society promises to be one of the most successful in the provinces. Mr. G. F. Jackman is honorary Conductor. The Archbishop of York is President, and ten gentlemen of position and influence in the town and neighbourhood are the Vice-Presidents.

HULME.—The "at home" Pianoforte Recitals have been given during the month by M. Cottélier, the executant being Mr. J. Greaves. The vocalists were Miss F. Harris and Mr. Thorn Latour.

IRVINE, N.B.—A Service of Sacred Song was given in Fullarton Parish Church on Tuesday evening, the 21st ult. Mr. Robert Allan conducted, and Mr. Hinchliffe accompanied.

BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrle Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song, "The silent land," the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to "The children's hour."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

PATENT ACTION

Attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

WHICH ACTION HE HAS, AFTER CONTINUED STUDY, BROUGHT TO PERFECTION, AND GAINED THE APPROVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S COMMISSIONERS OF PATENTS.

This Action is manufactured solely of mahogany, and in its working is perfectly noiseless, and as weights and springs are not used it is warranted never to get out of order, and will last as long as the Pianoforte. It must be mentioned that the keys of the Piano are not forced up at the back by this Action, but are pulled down in the most natural manner at the place where they are played upon by the fingers. The Inventor, being an Organist, can most confidently recommend his invention to those wishing for real good pedal practice at home.

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte. £ s.

TESTIMONIALS.

13, Waltham Road, St. Peter's Park, London, W.

I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER's Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the organ.

It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils.

F. E. GLADSTONE, MUS. DOC., CANTAB.
Dunsham House, Weston-super-Mare.

I have minutely examined Mr. Wm. Chinnock Dyer's Pedals and Action attached to a Piano, and find it in every way satisfactory. The points that strongly recommend his patent are:—

1. Simplicity of action, and therefore no liability of getting out of order.

2. Quick and ready response to the lightest Pedal touch, so that all degrees of tone are readily obtainable.

3. It is perfectly noiseless in working, which character, seeing that no springs are used and that all the centres are carefully bushed, it is likely to retain after constant use.

4. Compared with the roller-board action—which hitherto I have considered the only satisfactory method of attachment—this new action is inexpensive, and it is not in any way less effective.

I believe it only wants to be well known to become the general mode of attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes.

ARTHUR E. CROOK, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.,
Organist of the Parish Church, Weston-super-Mare.
Catterick, Yorkshire.

I have much pleasure in adding my testimony to the great excellence of the Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes, invented by Mr. Wm. Chinnock Dyer, of Weston-super-Mare, and am sure his invention will meet with general satisfaction from Organists and Students.

Being a purchaser I can, from experience, recommend it to Organists and others requiring pedal practice at home to be invaluable.

The Action is perfectly noiseless, works well, and can easily be attached to any Piano or Pedals.

ROBERT MACK, Organist, Parish Church.

Violins, Violas, Violoncellos, and Double-Basses

CRASKE.

THESE are the very best of all modern Violins, some of them fifty and sixty years old, perfect reproductions of the great masters, and equal to them in tone, workmanship, and varnish. Some of them have been sold by unprincipled dealers as genuine Cremonas for very high prices, and some fairly on their own merits for as much as £240.

No man, unassisted, ever made so many Violins as "CRASKE." In addition to what he made for Foster, Dodd, and Mr. Clementi, he finished with his own hands over 2,000 Violins, 250 Violas, 250 Violoncellos, and 20 Double-Basses.

After a long and indefatigable industry Mr. Craske retired from business on an income of nearly £1,000 per annum, derived from investments in the Manchester Corporation Water Works.

The principal part of his life was spent in London, Bath, Birmingham (where he kept a shop on Snow Hill about twenty years), and Stockport, near Manchester; making also short residences in Leeds, Manchester, and Salford.

Before his retirement, Mr. Crompton bought the whole of his stock, and now has it for sale at 54, Barton Arcade, Manchester, along with a large collection of almost every noted make of Italian instruments. Manchester, April 14, 1881.

Established 1874.

The Orchestra and Choir for May says: "We have had an opportunity of testing the efficiency of the Pedals for Pianofortes supplied by Mr. Hamilton, of Bristol. Their finish could not be better, and the simplicity and noiselessness of the Action is a great thing in their favour, as well as the ease with which they can be attached, and the fact that they do not injure the instrument in any way."

The Action is easily attached to any kind of Pianoforte in a short time.

PATENT ACTION FOR ATTACHING ORGAN PEDALS TO A PIANOFORTE,

Which Action he has, after continued study, brought to perfection, and gained the approval of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Patents.

TESTIMONIAL.

Withnell, Lanc.

Dear Sir,—Being myself an organist, and having purchased and used for a considerable time a set of your Organ Pedals and Patent Action, I with pleasure and confidence add my testimony to the excellence of the same. The guides represented by figures 5 and 14 in your drawings are sure to be admired by all, as they are carefully bushed with felt, which (seeing that all the moving parts are supplied with noiseless cushions) guarantees the Action perfectly noiseless and steady when actuated. I consider the repetition equal to any pianoforte Action, and as your Action works on one centre pin only (the levers bearing against each other, and weights and springs not being used), it draws down the keys with the greatest ease, thereby securing absolute immunity from any extra wear of the pianoforte, great durability to the Action, and an accurate response to the lightest pedal touch. I have seen no Action (pianoforte or otherwise) in which the adjusting parts are so convenient and reliable. I find the whole thirty notes on pedals as even and effective as on the pianoforte keys, and the touch of the pianoforte unaltered. I shall always be happy to recommend your action. Organ students and organists who desire the comforts of home practice will find it invaluable. Yours, &c.,

JAMES SANKEY,
Organist, Free Church, Withnell.

Ainsworth's Patent Lever Action is a very neat appendix to the pianoforte, as the basis is made to match polished rosewood or walnut. Those who have unsatisfactory Actions are kindly invited to correspond with Mr. Ainsworth, who has received the most gratifying testimonials from persons who have had other Actions.

Full printed "Directions for Attaching" are sent with each set. The Action is placed under the keyboard, and having a self-adjuster from keys to pedals (not to be had in any other) is by far the easiest to attach.

Ainsworth's Action is the best.

Please write for Drawings, full Explanation, and Prices.
Liberal Discount to the Profession and Trade.

Address: JOHN AINSWORTH, INVENTOR AND PATENTEE, Brinscrl, Chorley, Lancashire.

CAUTION.—This is the only legal Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a pianoforte, and infringers will be legally treated. Persons having obtained an Action on the double lever principle will greatly oblige by acquainting the above Inventor and Patentee.

Birthday Book of Musicians and Composers

Cloth, gilt edges, 3s.; Leather, gilt edges, 4s.

This elegant little book contains upwards of 500 dates and places of the births and deaths of the most celebrated, influential, and popular Composers, Singers, Instrumentalists, Musical Historians, Archaeologists, Authors, and Critics, with a short account of their lives and reference to their chief works. In the place of poetical extracts, used in the well-known Shakespeare, Tennyson, Longfellow, or Scriptural Birthday Books, more than 450 brief but highly interesting paragraphs are given, so that every day of the year may be musically associated with an unusual amount of information in a compact and agreeable form. These 450 paragraphs have been carefully selected from the biographies, letters, and essays of the most celebrated ancient and modern Musicians and Authors of England, France, Germany, and Italy, and illustrate every phase and feature of Musical Art. This little book is at once a useful and practical book of reference and a highly valuable book of information. A carefully prepared table of contents facilitates the finding of the respective dates, while its elegant appearance and convenient size especially recommend it as a useful, attractive, and acceptable gift.

TIMES.

"The power of attracting the public evinced by M. Gounod's 'Redemption' in the provinces appeared undiminished at the first performance of that sacred work in the metropolis. The Albert Hall last night was filled almost to the last seat by an audience including the Prince and Princess of Wales and many other distinguished persons. It was rumoured, indeed, that all the reserved places had been disposed of weeks ago."

TELEGRAPH.

"The business of this [the Brighton] Festival came to an end on Saturday afternoon with a performance of M. Gounod's 'Redemption.' There was an overflowing audience, gathered from all the country round, and influenced by the utmost curiosity as to the latest-born of oratorios."

ATHENÆUM.

"Gounod's 'Redemption' [at Bristol] naturally attracted a crowded audience, every seat in the large hall being filled. The work unquestionably improves on acquaintance."

GLASGOW HERALD.

"The first performance in London of M. Gounod's sacred masterwork was given to-night at the Royal Albert Hall in the presence of such an audience as is rarely seen even in that magnificent building. . . . Although the numbers could not be accurately told to-night, it is estimated that upwards of 11,000 persons were present."

WOLVERHAMPTON EVENING EXPRESS.

"On Monday evening the first of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society's concerts for the current season was given at the Agricultural Hall, Gounod's 'Redemption' being rendered with a band and chorus numbering nearly 300 performers. . . . It is creditable to the musical taste and appreciation of our town that never was a concert here better attended than that at which the life-work of the greatest living composer was performed."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

"The second concert of the current series, which took place in the Town Hall last night, brought together one of the largest audiences ever assembled there, not merely at the concerts of this society, but at any musical entertainment. The occasion was the first performance here since the Festival of the great work which is destined to make that Festival memorable, and the production of which certainly marks an epoch in the history of musical art."

JASON

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

For Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra,

THE POEM WRITTEN BY

WILLIAM GRIST

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Octavo, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

TIMES.

"Mr. Mackenzie is in every sense a modern composer. There is in his music no trace of the slavish imitation of Mendelssohn which, for years after the death of that great composer, impeded the progress of any national or independent growth of musical art among us. . . . How the composer has accomplished his task of illustrating the action I cannot for the present explain at such length as the music deserves. I may, however, say in summary fashion that Mr. Mackenzie's 'Jason' contains more clever writing and more genuine inspiration than are to be found in any English Cantata produced during recent years, with the sole exception, perhaps, of Mr. Cowen's 'St. Ursula.'"

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"An orchestral intermezzo, 'On the waters,' represents the voyage from Hellas to Colchis. This is a charming number, orthodox as to form, and poetic in spirit as though the composer of 'Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage' had written it. Indeed, Mendelssohn could not have been far from Mr. Mackenzie when he conceived this fresh and breezy music."

STANDARD.

"The Cantata of 'Jason' is not only his most pretentious, but also his most successful work. Its bright, melodious numbers will, in all probability, soon become popular. 'Jason' is described as a dramatic Cantata for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra. It is exceedingly clever in construction, and the orchestration is peculiarly picturesque in places."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"'Jason' is a composition characterised by vivid imagination, grace, and power, and it marks a further advance upon the road on which Mr. Mackenzie has already made such satisfactory progress. The Cantata left a great impression upon the audience, and the composer was heartily greeted at the conclusion from all parts of the hall."

ATHENÆUM.

"We regret that our space will not allow us to analyse 'Jason' in detail. Mr. Mackenzie's style, though not free from signs of the influence of Schumann and Wagner, shows considerable individuality; of direct reminiscences there are very few. Among the best portions of his new work are the vigorous and spirited opening chorus, broken by a charming tenor solo; the chorus 'See, the All-father approves from above'; the following intermezzo for orchestra, entitled 'On the Waters,' a lovely instrumental picture of which any living composer might be proud; Medea's scena; the duet between herself and Jason; the chorus of armed men; and the whole finale."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"It may be premature to express so decided an opinion, but I am inclined to think 'Jason' is the finest Cantata ever penned by an English composer. It is not only scholarly in a high sense, but is written with a freedom of resource and a command over the various forms of expression not often equalled. The choruses are splendid, the melodies generally striking and unconventional, and the orchestration is exceedingly rich and varied."

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of
LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."
SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).
PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).
MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

A system of construction which, by a careful application of scientific principles, Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have brought to great perfection, is now generally acknowledged as the only one calculated to render the Piano almost impervious to the deleterious influences of damp and extremes of temperature, while it stands better in tune with one-fourth of the usual tuning—a most important consideration where tuners are not readily obtained. The inestimable advantages thus secured are augmented by an increased power and purity of tone hitherto unattainable in the Upright Piano.

A selection from numerous testimonials will be a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the Pianos manufactured by this Firm:—

The Pianettes manufactured by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.—Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Opera.

I consider that Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. Their Pianettes are specially deserving of notice in being remarkable both for their cheapness and general excellence. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Brackly Villa, Dulwich.

I have on several occasions selected Pianos from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, and have great pleasure in stating they have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate.
